TO THE HONEST AND VNDERSTANDING READER.

TO giue thee good content, and to delight thy successors with the plaine knowledge of the occurrents in generall, which hapned in the daies of their fore-fathers, I haue vsed my best diligence and industry: and if in reading the same, it may please thee but to vse the tenth part of that patience, which in the collection thereof I haue endured, thou shalt doe thy selfe a great pleasure and me a high fauor. What I might say more, and that very iustly I now forbeare, hauing spoken somewhat to that purpose in the Epistle Dedicatorie of my abridgement: which for a generall answer vnto all scandalls, calumny, and malicious obiections against me, I haue annexed it at the end of this booke. If these my tedious labours of impart all truth, be kindly accepted and honestly construed: then perhaps some other in time to come may be encouraged to enterprize the like. Expect no fyled phrases, Inke-horne termes, vnpoath words, nor phantastique speaches, but good plaine English, without affectation, rightly befitting Chronologie: If Cicero's eloquence, Plato's Oratorie, or Virgils lofty verse, be thy chiefe desire; Pauls-church-yard is now plentifully furnished to satisfie thee: yea, and that so excellently well written in thy mother-tongue, as no forraigne Nation may compare with thee: no, not the Germans, of whom it hath beene said, to haue all Stories, Arts and Sciences in their vulgar language.

Doe not backbite me for my good meaning, nor play the Momus when thou heareſt truth. It is extreme baseneſſe to abuse him, that in all his endeauours seekes to loue and honour thee. Read vnderstandingly, and iudge indifferently.

The ancient Britaines amongst many their ancient Prouerbs, say: it is the least requitall of honest courteſies, to accept them kindly, and it is the smalleſt frendship that may be, to giue good words of the absent. But if neither desire, nor deſert may gaine thy fauour, it shall euer remaine as much thy fault as my hard hap. Therefore freely vse thy speach and wit at thy own pleasure for lauſhing toungs, and vile encounters of the ignorant, proud, and enuious, haue so tyred me, that henceforth I will reſt sans feare or care of their braine-sick imitations. But to generous spirits, honorable mindes, learned heads, and vnderſtanding hearts, I humbly proſtrate my life and labours at their reuerend feete:

knowing they will expect no more then may be had, and rest content with what they find, giuing their censures fauourably. Truth was, and is both subiect and soueraigne of what I sought, and haue composed, without intent of flattery or offence. Lay not then the PRINTERS fault vnto my charge, perhaps there may be too many escapes of my owne, the which if comming to thy knowledge, with all meekenesse I doe intreate thee to amend, or kindly for thy country sake, instruct me to reforme my error, and thou shalt find my honest diligence answer thy true expectation, one day iudgeth another, and the last iudgeth all, Bernardus non vidit omnia, I presume thou art wise and honest be assured I wish thee so, and hoping thou wilt proue so, I cease, recommending all things to thy good acceptation, euer praying that peace and good though tsmay possesse thee.

Thy friend euer assured,

EDMOND HOVVES.

AN HISTORICALL PREFACE TO THIS BOOKE.

THE Law of God forbiddeth vs to receiue a false reportt, and the law of Histories is, that we ought to publish no falshood, nor dissemble any truth. If in any thing this should be obserued, it ought to be in the preseruation of those Monuments which do set forth the memory of our ancestors, the honor of our ancient Fathers, the mercies of God vpon our country, and his iudgements warning vs what to follow and auoyd: this excellent vse of aged stories, we are depriued of, by those who when they haue laid hold vpon some one or two mistakings in the life of some one man, do by and by not onely deny that there was any such man, but dash and cashire a whole succession of Princes and the consenting testimonies of many learned and worthy Hystorians. The example hereof is in Brute, the first King of this Monarchy, who in that age, when almost all the world, especially Europe, ran doting in desire of the Troian or Italian ancestors, some writers fabled to be the sonne of Siluius, descended of Aeneas, and that he killed his Father, and came by Oracle into Brittaine: these things learned men, finding to dissent from the Roman Story, some left out the Pedigree of the British Kings. Nuberigensis maketh a solemne inuectiue against Galfridus, one of the penmen of that Chronicle, speaking, as may appeare more of spleen, then of iudgement. The most learned and diligent Antiquary, M^r. Camden for his owne censure, doth not deny the person of Brute, but relating the opinions of others. Iohn of Whethampsted, the first that I read of in the yeere 1449. setteth downe some exceptions taken to the particular narrations of Brute, namely, that he was the son of Siluius, and killed his father, and such like. Polydor Virgil is the only man I find, who vpon those particular exceptions, although hee confessed those things to be registred Per duos egregios historicos, yet he reiecteth the whole hystory of Brute and his successors: by the same reason, he may reiect all ancient hystories, & himself deserueth to be reiected for his many fabulous narrations, as also Nuberigensis, otherwise called W. Petit, who hath not a few, who wrote bitterly against the hystory of Ieffrey of Monmouth, but neuer wrote a word against Hen. of Huntington, that wrot of the same things before the publication of Ieffries booke: his malice against the Brittanes, was, because being an earnest suitor for a Bishopricke in Wales, he was reiected by Dauid Aberconen then Prince of Wales. This Newberigensis liued in the yeere 1165. and was the first that wrote against the Brittish hystory, but I will not stand to confute or answer their obiections, for it is already done at large by S^r. Iohn Price, in the defence of the Brittish hystory, and briefly by M^r. Doctor Powel in his Epistle prefixed to Pantieus, and most gravely, and iudiciously by M^r. Lambert in his perambulation of Kent, to me, it shall suffice to write that the first that I find directly to oppugne the hystory of Brute, is Iohn of Whethampsted not 200. yeeres agoe, and I doe not read of any of our owne, that agree with him, but Polydor, Bodin, and other strangers, who may well be excused for their ignorance in Brittish Antiquities, and deserue not to be laid in ballance to counterprize the authority of so many learned Authors of our country, who, with ioynt consent, haue affirmed the Brittaine hystory, whose names, or so many of them as haue come to my knowledge I haue here set downe to be perfued of such as desire to be satisfied.

Gildas Sapiens, cited by Cestrensis Ponticus, Sir Iohn Price, and others, or as some call him, Nennius.

Thomas, Archbishop of Yorke, in the time of William the Conquerour, cited by Fox, in his booke of Monuments, ex Chronico Sigeberti.

Henry Huntington, stiled by Polydor Egregius historicus, in other bookes, but especially in the booke de origine Britannorum, cited by Master Lambert.

Mathew of Paris, a most wise, faithfull, and learned hystorian saith of Monmouth, that he did translate the Brittish hystory into latine.

Mathew of Westminster, in floribus, nameth Brito for Brutus, calling him the sonne of Hector, descended of Iuuan, which Pedigree is also found in Gildas, and the ancient Brittish hystories, as it may appeare by Sir Iohn Price.

Giraldus Cambrensis, who carped at Galfridus, and yet followed the hystory of Ponte.

Ranulfus, Cestrensis, Alfredus cited in Polichronicon, and Sir Iohn Price.

Fasciculus temporum, Iohannes Anglicus, Honeian.

Cornubiæ, these three last are cited by Sir Iohn Price.

Galfridus, Simon Dunelmensis.

Petrus Langtoft, about the time of Edward the second, or Edward the third.

An ancient Chronicle in french verse, these three I saw in the study of Sir Robert Cotton, a most learned iudicious and diligent Antiquary.

Alanus ab insulis in prophetias Merlin, Ponticus Virrunnius.

Sir Iohn Price, in defensione Britanicæ Historiæ, Iohannes Baleus in Centuriis, Iohn Leyland, Iohn Cooprane, Robert Kelway, in his reports of Law, Folio 161. speaketh of Mulmutius, the Brittish King.

Fabian Grafton, Languet, Cooper, Stow, Hollingshead, and Master Lambert in his perambulation of Kent, and many others.

Of these, some doe set downe the common report, whom therefore I cannot much blame, but others more iu licious, defend, or teach the hystory briefly, or make short narrations, that there was one Brute, King of the Realme, who left this kingdome to his three sonnes, whose iudgements I must needs commend, but those that preferre the Coniectures of a few incompetent witnesses, before the grauity and authority of so many ancient Authors, whereof most are very learned and sincere, and by all likelihood, had seene diuers ancient writings and Monuments, which are now vtterly vnknowne and extinct, doe violate both the rules of Wisdome and of Iustice: of Wisdome, first, in preferring incompetent witnesses, before competent, strangers before natiue, few before many, arguments before testimonies: secondly, in not discerning betwixt fables and truth, betweene that which may stand with other hystories, and that which cannot, but for some aspertions of fiction, reiecting altogether: of Iustice, towards their country, in depriuing it of the glory of so many antient Kings; and towards God, in suppressing many examples of his diuine iustice, whose iudgements as vpon other sinnes, so especially vpon Idolatry, heresie, cruelty, dissentions, rebellions, murders, and confused lusts, registred in our records, ought now to be so many Trumpets to summon vs to repentance. These ought we therefore alwayes to remember in regard of our Ancestors, and for that purpose, I will say no more but this: qui parcit alterius dignitati, suam seruat, and whoso without cause, dishonoreth antiquity, deserueth, little or no credit of posterity. But if neither these obseruations, nor the traditions of the Brittaines from age to age, which neuer faild to keepe memory of Brute, nor the authorities before alledged, then let such as will search further, read the ancient Chronicles of Italy, France, Spaine, and Germany, or the Cosmography of Sebastian Munster, Macrobius or Æneas Siluius, other wise called Pius Secundus in his Bohemyan hystory. And for as much as of my owne knowledge, I well wot, that there are some, that daily make as causeless doubt and question concerning Troy, that is, whether euer there were any such City or Prouince as Troy, and that if there were, then where it stood: for whose modest satisfaction, sith neither the authorities before rehearsed, nor the foure and twenty Bookes of the most wise and learned Homer, called Homers Iliads, who liued in, or neere the time of the destruction of Ilyum doe nor satisfie, I will therefore set downe an abstract out of sundry Authentique Authors the state and scituation thereof, and after that a briefe relation of the chiefe seuerall alterations of this kingdome, according to the obseruation of the reuolution and change of euery fiue hundred yeeres, from Brute vnto this time present.

IN Asia the lesse, are many particular Regions, as Acolia, Meonia, Ionya, Misea, Lidea, with others, and haue also diuers famous Cities in the lesser Phrigia, amongst which, of ancient time, was a City called Ilyum, being then the most renowned of all the world, and vulgarly of the countrey wherein it stood, was called Troya, from whence many famous and great men were dispersed thorow the whole world, after the Grecians had destroyed it. Some write, that this City was builded, 828. yeeres after the deluge, and 1200. yeers before the incarnation of our Lord Iesus. In the Region, or Citty, there raigned sixe Kings, namely, Dardanus, Erichtonius, Tros, Ilus, Laomedon, and Priamus, in whose time it was subuerted by the Greekes, because when Priamus vpon certaine occasion being absent, the Grecians violently entred into his Kingdome, and ouerthrew Ilyum, and returned with great spoyle, and carryed away with them, Hesione, the Kings sister, vpon knowledge whereof, and considering what was fit to be done, Priamus repaired and strengthened his Citty, and holds against all further incursions of his enemies. He had to wife, Hecuba, and by her had fiue Sonnes, viz. Hector, Paris, who was also called Alexander, Diophobus, Helenus and Troylus: he had also three daughters, viz. Andromache, Cassandra, and Polixena, and for that he would be reuenged of the late outrage, done by him and his people, he sent his kinsman, Prince Anthenor, into Greece, who required that Hesione might be restored, but they proudly refused it, vsing the Ambassador reprochfully, and so sent him away, whereupon Priamus, by aduice, prepared a Nauy of ships, and an army of men, ouer which, he appointed Paris for their Generall, who with a prosperous wind, sailed into the Isle of Citherya, wherein was an ancient Temple of Venus, of high estimation amongst the Grecians. In this Temple, and at that time, it chanced to be the celebratin of the feast of Venus, and great multitudes of people to be there assembled, mongst whom was the most beautious, Helena, wife to Menelaus, King of Lacedemonia, whose kingdome was not far distant from that Isle. She hearing of the Troians arriuall, was wondrous desirous to see the strangers, for which purpose, vnder pretence of performing her vowes, went in all haste to the Isle where she was very honorably receiued of the Inhabitants, and in the morning earely, with great pompe she entred the Temple, and Paris hauing heard before of her beauty, and of her comming, entred likewise into the Temple, in all princely brauery, and as one of them beheld the other, they both became enamored one with another: Paris, desirous to take aduantage of all opportunities, forthwith commands his men priuately to conuey away their ships by night when they had feasted, taken Helena, and spoyled the Temple, all which they performed. This exployte being known to Priamus, he was very ioyful, hoping that Helena would ransome Hesione, but Castor and Pollux hauing intelligence of their Sisters surprizall, they embaked themselues with all expedition to make pursuite, but there arose a very fierce tempest and they were drowned at Priamus began his raign in Troy, in the yeere of the world, 2237. and before the incarnation of our Saiuour Christ 1229. read Dictis of Candy.

David, King of Israel, began his raigne in Hebron in the yeere of the world, 2891. and before the comming of our Saiuour Christ, 1071. Hesione was Ant vnto Dionelaus, and was giuen in marriage by Hercules vnto Telemon, for Hercules not long before, had sack Troy, and tooke Hesione prisoner read Dares of Phrigia, and Ouid.

Helena was the daughter of Iupiter and Leda.

Menelaus was son to Atreus, or as some say, to Pelopheres, & Europes read Dares the Phrigian, & Ouid.

Menelaus was not so much grieued for the losse of his wife, as for his two kinsmen, Bibra, and Cymera, when were taken away in the company of Helena: read Dictis of Candy, Dares and Ouid.

Helena was rauished in her infancy by Thiseus, as I gest Athens, who began his raigne in the yeere of the world, 2720. read Iustin, 2. Booke, and Plutarch and Ouid. Agamemnon was the Grecians generall, and king of Micena, in the yeere of the world, 2762. he reigned 18. yeeres, and Helena was rauished by Paris in the first yeere of his raigne which was before sheouth of our Saiuour, Christ Iesus, 1194. read Euripides in the Tragedy of Orestes. Vlysses and Achilles came not in their owne persons to the warres of Troy, vntill the yeere of the world, 2771. and then they came together, Vlysses was the subtillest and Achilles was the strongest of all the Princes of Greece: read Homer, and Virgil.

sea neere the coſt of Lesbos. And Menelaus hearing that his wife was gone, hee by the inſtigation of his brother Agamemnon, ſtirred vp all the Kings and Princes of Grecia to reuenge his wrong, whereupon the Kings of Mycena, Sparta, Boeotia, and of Phocis, with Vlyſſes, King of the Iſle of Ithaca, and Achilles, King of Theſſalia, and others, who hauing with all ſpeed prepared a mighty army by Sea and land well furniſhed, aſſailed the kingdome of Troy, and from the Iſle of Tenedos they ſent an Ambaſſador to require Helena, with ſatisfaction for the ſpoyle of their Temple, but Pryamus abſolutely denied all, except they would firſt reſtore Heſione, whereat the Grecians were greatly diſpleaſed, very wrathfully entred vpon the borders of the Troians, and executed great ſlaughter and violence, and many periſhed on both ſides, and many deſpights were done by the Grecians, vpon their Citties, in the Iſle of Lesbos, they tooke alſo young Polidorus, ſonne to Pryamus, being but lately borne, who was ſent into Thracia, to his wiues brother, Ciſſeus, King of Thracia, becauſe that if Troy ſhould chance to be ſurprized, yet this childe being left, might repayre the Citty and reſtore his blood. This Polidorus was offered in exchange for Helena, but Pryamus would not accept thereof, whereupon they ſtoned the childe in the ſight of the Troians, for his brothers fact. Hector, in the meane ſpace iſſued forth of the Citty with an army, and aſſailled them fiercely: many battells, with great valour and ſlaughter were performed betweene them. Hector ſhot Menalaus thorow with an arrow, and wounded Achilles, for which cauſe, hee purſued Hector, vntill he had ſlaine him, and put the Troians to flight. Within a while after, Achilles, ſeeing Polyxena, the daughter of Pryamus, became ſo extremely in loue with her, that he promiſed to renounce armes and enmity, if he might haue her: and thereupon Captaine Palamedes, ſucceeded him, and fought manfully againſt the Troians, by whom he was ſlain, and Troilus right worthily exerciſed his brothers place, and wounded Menelaus, Dyomedes, and Agamemnon, and ſlew many others. * The Greekes perceiuing their great loſſe of Chiefetaines and Souldiers, conſtrained Achilles to enter againe into Armes againſt the Troians, he eſpied Troilus, and ſeing his horſe ſoundred, purſued him, and thruſt him thorow. Hecuba hauing bewailed the death of her ſonnes, Hector and Troilus, deuiſed how thee might entrap Achilles to kill him, and knowing that hee loued Polyxena, tooke opportunity, in time of a truce betweene both armies, cauſed it to be giuen out, that ſhee would giue him her Daughter, requiring him to come into the Temple of Apollo, neere vnto which place, in ſecret manner, Paris lay armed, and ſlue Achilles as hee was entring into the Temple vnarmed, and then fled. The Grecians vnderſtanding thereof, and being very forward to fight with their enemies, very eagerly aſſaulted the Troians, and in battell ſlew many, amongſt whom, Paris was ſlaine, and the reſt purſued to the gates of Troy, and had almoſt won the walls of the City. The next day, Agamemnon ordred the battell, and fought with Penteſilea, Queene of the Amazons, whom the Troians had called to their ayde (as they did many other their adioyning neighbours, and others) with her he had many ſharpe fights, but at laſt hee ſlew her and deſtroyed her army. By this time, Pryamus hauing well obſerued his many hard euents, called his friends to Councell, which conſiſted in three parts, ſome whereof aduiſed him to reſtore Helena, with her ſpoyles, that were taken out of Venus Temple: others aduiſed him to ſound, and ſee if the third ſort would ſtand firme, and couragi-

Achilles fought to kill Hector, becauſe hee had ſlaine his deare friend, Patroclus, and Proteſilaus.

Achilles was Son to Peleus and Thetis, King of Theſſalia.

* Achilles, not long before, had got Pirrhus by Deydamia, the daughter of King Licomides, and in the Campe hee alſo deflowred from hoſtility, for the loue of Briſeis, and haſtily fell into treaty of marriage with Polixena, read Homer and Virgil.

Agamemnon was ordained the Grecian Generall, who at his returne from the wars into Greece, his wife, Clytemnestra, cauſed Egiſtus his Minion, to killhim, in reuenge whereof, his ſonne Oreſtes ſlew his mother, and Egiſthus, read Sophocles, in the Tragedy of Electra, Euripides, Cicero, and Ouid. Some write, that Helena knew of this Treaſon, and held the burning Torch, which was the Signall to the enemy, hoping thereby to regaine her husbands fauour, and after his death, the bee me a fugitiue, and fled towards Poliſpe, where ſhe was ſtrangled by the young Ladies of that country: read Herodotus his 6. booke. Part of the ruins of the walls, gates, and vaults vnder ground, remaine to this day, as will be iuſtified by Engliſh men, now liuing, that haue ſeene and obſerued the ruines, for the City was exceeding large, hauing within the walls great woods, ſweete waters, many corne-fields, and fayre paſtures Tyndarus, the Grandfather of Helena, whileſt Menelaus was in the campe, did giue Hermyone their daughter, in marriage, vnto Oreſtes, not knowing that Menelaus had promiſed her to Pyrrhus, who, at his returne to Greece, made loue to Hermione, whereupon Oreſtes ſlew Pyrrhus. There fell great and ſtrange ſtrifes and ſlaughters amongſt the Greekes after their returne: read Sophocles in the Tragedie of Electra, Euripides, Cicero, and Ouid.

ouſly fight and dye in defence of their country, and their counſell onely preuailed, and therewithall Pryamus feared leſt thoſe which deſired peace might be the loſſe or betraying of the Citty, hee thereupon commanded his friends of the warre faction, priuily to kill the other: of which faction Antenor and Æneas were the chiefe, who ſo ſoone as they vnderſtood thereof ſent priuily to the enemies with promiſe to deliuer the city into their hands, vpon condition that themſelues and their goods ſhould be freed and ſecured, thereupon the enemy came the next night according to the appointed time. Antenor and Æneas found a gate open, and there ruſhed in and ſlew all they met. When Pryamus knew the treaſon, though all in vaine, yet he attempted to fly to the Altar of Iupiter, for he could not imagine any certaine place of refuge, plainly perceiuing deſtruction and death in euery corner. Menelaus entred the Kings Palace, tooke Diophebus, and after he had cut off his eares and noſe, hee killed him. Pirrhus killed Pryamus at the Altar: finally, the Citty was ſackt and burnt to aſhes. Agamemnon brough Helena as if ſhe had ſuffered violence, and ſo reſtored her to her huſband Menelaus. This Troian warre continued 10. yeeres, and 8. moneths, in which time there periſhed of the Argiues or Peloponeſians, eyght hundred and ſeuenty thouſand, of the Troians before the Citty was Sackt, ſix hundred threeſcore and ten thouſand, and at the taking there was ſlaine two hundred threeſcore and ſixteene thouſand. Antenor, Couſin to Pryamus, was then mad King of Ilium by Agamemnon, where he raigned almoſt 22. yeeres, and all the ſcattered Troians which returned, acknowledged him for their King.

But Æneas, the ſonne of Anchiſes and Venus, came into Italy with all his family and goods, and entring the mouth of the Riuer Tyber, he planted himſelfe not farre from the Citty Laurentum, where he obtained certaine land of King Latynus, wherein he built a new Troy, and at length he obtained the kingdome of Latinum. He raigned three yeeres: from him are deſcended Remus and Romulus. Antenor being expulſed Troy by the ſonnes of Hector, when he had raigned two and twenty yeerers, trauelled to the Prouince of Venice. Hee laid the foundation of the Citty of Padua. Preſently after the facking of Troy, Cyrus, King of Perſia ſubdued Greece, and made the Grecians tributary and vaſſalls, which were euer vntill then a free people.

About a thouſand yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Chriſt, Brute of the race of Troians with his company poſſeſſed this whole Iland of great Britaine, containing England, Scotland and Wales. He left one part thereof to his ſonne Locrine, and ſo founded the kingdome, ſince which foundation, there hath happned in the ſame, the laſt onely exeepted, ſundry ſtrange alterations of Kings, Princes, and Religion, people and Nations: the firſt alterations haue beene moſt great and vniuerſall, about the ſhifting of the period, or reuolution of fiue hundred yeeres, ſomewhat more or leſſe, but alwayes after the fourth hundred yeeres, and before the ſixt.

The alteration of this kingdome vpon the reuolution of the firſt fiue hundred yeeres after the foundation thereof, was preſently vpon the death of Corboduc. After he had raigned ſixty and three yeeres, he would needes ordayne and cauſe his youngeſt ſonne, Porrex to be crowned King ioyntly with his eldeſt ſonne Ferrex, who within fiue yeeres raigne, fell at mortall hatred for Soueraignty, and entred furiouſly, and vnreconcileably into armes one againſt another. Porrex ſlew his elder brother, then came his mother vnto him, vnder colour of kindneeſſe, to congratulate her younger ſonnes victory: ſhe murthered him treacherouſly in his chamber, her moſt affection was to her eldeſt Son, and was wholly againſt their ioynt gouernment: when the multitude vnderſtood her vnkind bloudy act, they fell into an vproare, and ſlew her, whereupon the Crown became vacant & the Land fell into extreme miſery and confuſion. The ciuill warres continued 54. yeeres and ceaſed not, vntill Don Wallo Molmutius after infinite battells and blood-ſhed had ſubdued all other Competitors, and then from him began a new lyne.

The firſt Alteration.

Porrex.
Ferrex.

The causes and effects.

The causes of this ruine of the Realme, was the folly of Gorboduc, to ioyne his youngeſt ſonne with his eldeſt, the diuelliſh malice of the old Queene to butcher her youngeſt ſonne, hauing then no iſſue to ſucceed, and the peoples wantonneſſe and ſecurity after long peace. The effects of this alteration, was the laying open of the Crowne to be as a prey for him that could winne it, and the change of the gouernment into another Lyne.

The ſecond alteration.

The ſecond Alteration vpon the ſecond reuolution of fiue hundred yeeres, was by Iulius Cæſar in the time of Caſsibelan, and was perfected in the time of Claudius the Emperor. This Iulius Cæſar, although he was the moſt ambitious and greateſt traytor that euer was to the Romane State, yet his high valour, and braue victories made him ſo renowned, that many of his ſucceſſors would be called Cæſar, and at this day, the generall word in Germany for an Emperor, is Ceſar, by which name he is better knowne, then by any other ſtile or Title, and call all the Emperors quoine Cæſars money, or Keaſers quoyne, vſing K. for C. pronouncing it Keyſar, as Keyſars dollors, and it was hyſtorically obſerued, that they all periſhed that were Actors of the death of Iulius Cæſar.

The cauſes and effects.

Amongſt other cauſes of this Alteration, one was a particular grudge of Iulius Cæſar againſt the Brittaines, becauſe they intermedled with the affaires and quarrells of the Gaules, and for aſſiſting the Gaules, who are now called French, for the kingdome of France was anciently called Gallia, of the Gaules, which were a valiant people, which at firſt inhabited vpon the borders of Germany and afterward ouerſpread all France, and the name of Gall and Gaules continued long after this, vntill the time of the famous Duke Franchion, of whom a particular chiefe Prouince therein was called France, and the inhabitants French: the fame of which Dukedome, in time, drew the whole kingdome to be called France, and at this day, the Chronicles of Italy, France, and Spaine in their Languages, call our Prince of Wales, Prince of Gaules: another cauſe was the ambitious minde of Androgens, and others, pretending Title to the Crowne, of which and of all things elſe, Iulius Cæſar had good intelligence: for there were ſome of them that fauoured his fortunes, and hoped by him to haue aduancement; and for breuity, I will omit to ſhew other generall cauſes, concluding thus, that the vniuerſall vexation of the world at this time for ſinne, was Propheſied by Daniel, when he foretold of the Romane Monarchy. The effects of this alteration were very violent and horrible according to the nature of a conqueſt, ruling by force and will, making a free people ſeruile, tributary and vaſſall, exerciſing daily all manner of cruelty and exceſſe.

Ther in ſtandeth the Citty Paris.

The third alteration.

The third alteration and reuolution of fiue hundred yeeres, was preſently vpon the raigne of Vortiger, and then this Land, which is now called England, was conquered by the Saxons, being then an Idolatrous people, worſhippers of Planets and Diuells, as Sol, Luna, Iupiter, Mars, Venus and Saturn, of whom the dayes of the weeke, both then and now beare their names, as you may read at large in that excellent hiſtoricall worke of Maſter Verſtegan: the cauſes of this conqueſt, according to Gildas, and other ancient Records, was the extreme couetouſneſſe of the Nobility, the iniquity and partiality of the Iudges, the ſecurity and ſloth of the Clergy, and the cuill life of the people; the other cauſes were the diuiſions and ciuill diſſentions of the Brittains, whoſe weaker faction, to be reuenged of the ſtronger, called in the forraine ayde of the Saxons, who moſt ſubtilly aided and ſeconded them for their own aduancement; by which means & purpoſe, they forced the ſtronger faction to forſake their own ancient Cities, Caſtles and Habitations, and all their neer neighbourhood and alliance with the French and others, and flye into the remote mountaynes, where euer ſince they haue right valiantly and worthily remained, and continued their proper race and language in deſpite of their enemies: and preſerued their Records of time and ſtate better then any other people of this Land. When the Saxons faction had put the one part of the Brittaines to flight, then they practiſed practiſed all rigor and vſurpation vpon the other, who had kindly entertained them, and after that, when the Saxons were fully ſetled and ſeated here in others poſſeſſions, then they receiued Saint Auſtin and his complices, and very actiuelly became Chriſtians: for ſeeing alſo that by that meanes they ſhould ſecure their eſtate by hauing league and alliance with forraine Chriſtian Princes, and preuent the Brittaines of all their former forraine ayd and amity, and whereas it was generally ſuppoſed and wiſhed, that the Saxons being conuerted, that there would haue preſently followed a firme peace and reconciliation, betweene them and the Brittaines, but through the inueterate malice of Satan, the ancient enemy of Chriſtian vnity, it hapned quite contrary, for ſtill there continued great diſſentions and ſharpe warres betweene the Brittaines and Saxons, by reaſon the kings of Saxons, with many of their Peeres, being brought to Chriſtianity by the great paines, deuoute prayers, and preachings of S. Auguſtine and his aſſociates, by vertue whereof they were not onely ſtrengthened in their ſoules health, but alſo ſtrongly backed and ſeconded in their faction and aſſuredneſſe of ayd from Italy, France, and other parts, whereat the Brittaines were ſore vexed, not becauſe of their conuerſion from Heatheniſme to Chriſtianity, for ſo much good they wiſhed them, and would willingly haue brought them that glad Tydings, rather then they ſhould haue wanted it, though they were their mortall enemies and vſurpers of their natiue inheritance, but by that meanes they politickly preſented them of all hope of recouery of all ſuch Cities and Territories as the Saxons now held, or might get in like vſurpation, hauing depriued them of all their nauigation, and preuented them from all their ancient ayd and amity with France, and other forraine parts, who therewithall obſerued the Saxons milde receiuing of the Goſpell, became inſtantly not onely their good friends, but alſo their confederates and allyes againſt the Brittaines; whereupon began great ſtrife and ha red betweene the Clergy on eyther part, and the rather being thereunto daily prouoked by the ſeuerall Princes with whom they held reſidence, ſo as the Prieſts and Monks of Bangor, and other Eccleſiaſticall perſons who, before the arryuall of Saint Auguſtine, had endured great miſeries, and at laſt with ſingular paines, piety, and preaching, conuerted moſt of the Brittons vnto the Chriſtian faith, and therewithall knowing that the ancient inheritance of this part of the Iland, which is called England, of right appertained to their proſelytes, in whoſe defence they had deuoted themſelues without any great hope of extraordinary preferment to Eccleſiaſticall dignities, became thereupon the more oppoſite againſt S. Auſtin and his company, whom they plainely beheld, as it were ſuddenly in reſpect of that time, not onely to be entertained, receiued and beloued, but alſo highly preferred, dignified, and endowed with ſtately houſes, goodly poſſeſſions, large priuiledges, and Immunities, and themſelues in daily want of indifferent maintenance, being in ſome ſort conſtrained to vſe extraordinary meanes and paines for ſuſtentation. Theſe moues with the great difference in matters of State, which was daily vrged and preached at their Altars, to approoue their ſeuerall quarrells, cauſed the Britiſh ſide with great bitterneſſe, to write, preach, and muay againſt the other, and S. Auguſtine with his followers on the other ſide, being animated by that authority which ſent him, and by the ſtrong hand ſtate of thoſe who had receiued him, and beleeued his doctrine, vſed like inuectiues and reproches againſt the Brittaines and their Clergy, and againſt the reſt of their faction. Each ſide, thus ſet on, preſumed their practice to be warranted by Religion, Law, and Conſcience, and yet in all this controuerſie, the religious perſons on either part agreed in the full ſubſtance of faith and adminiſtration of the Sacraments, and would haue beene in vnity and amity, if it had not beene for the diuiſion of their Princes in their temporal eſtates and affayres, as they did afterwards, although for a time they wrote and preached very vehemently one againſt another, omitting nothing that might tend to the reproch and ſcandall one of another, which was done

Saint Auſtine his ſurname was Mellitus.

The Weſtſaxons vſed them with as great kindeneſſe and reſpect as their ability would permit, ſeuen of them inclues for the moſt part but as ſtrangers in their Cloyſters, which were not greatly inhabited.

more for their seuerall politicke affayres of estate, then for any maine matter iñ Religion: the Ministers being thus diuided, it was not possible the people could be vnited, whereupon for many yeeres ensued extreme hatred, warres, and bloodshed.

The fourth fiue hundred yeeres.

About the end of the fourth fiue hundred yeers, here hapned a double blow as it were in the necke one of another, within few yeeres, for about this fiue hundred yeeres came a two-fold conquest of this Land, both which in respect of time, was but a little one before another, the first by the Danes, somewhat before the expiration of fiue hundred yeeres, and the other by the Normans, presently vpon the expiration of fiue hundred yeeres: that of the Danes, because it ceased, and had not any long continuance, may be compared vnto a violent storme, who for want of issue, this kingdome returned againe to the Saxons race, and the Danes in the time of the Conqueror, had prepared and were fully purposed to haue inuaded England againe, and doubtlesse had performed their determination, if it had not beene hindred by the charitable care and industery of the Archbishop of Hambro, who at that time was Metropolitaine of Denmarke, and of diuers other large Teritories, who with great piety in meere commiseration of this distressed Nation, dissuaded the Danes from their setled determination: touching this, I set it not downe as one of the vniuersall Reuolutions and Alterations, although it fell about the like period, or fulnesse of time. Whilest the Danes held their residence here, there hapned many great and grieuous battells, great destructions on both sides, and in all respects, such oppressions, rapes, violences, and deuastations, were vsed and performed, as the sinnes of the Princes and people drew vpon them the wrathfull hand of God. Let the vnderstanding Reader iudge what a hellish misery it is, to haue vnreconciliable warres in one small kingdome, between two mighty people, striuing deadly, the one for Empyre and wealth, and the other for naturall liberty and safety.

The effects of the Danes warrs.

The conquest by the Normans.

The conquest of the Normans was more great and vniuersall, and fell neere vpon the reuolution of fiue hundred yeeres: the causes thereof are said to be many, but principally next vnto the impiety and sinnes of the people, who neuer cease to prouoke the wrath of God, was the vncertainty of the heyre and succession of the Crowne: for King Edward vpon diuers reasons, gaue ouer his regall gouernment, entred into a Monasticall life, and willingly became a Confessor, not hauing any issue, and from his will and Testament the Conqueror pretended his claime to this kingdome, and the rather, because the Confessor establisshed no knowne Succession, the causes thereof are diuersly conceiued, which for breuity I heere omit. Edgar in the opinion of some deepe iudgements that looke exactly into this matter, is said to be the lawfull heyre: but whether his minority or being absent, or his remissnesse in his carriage were the causes, hee had not the peoples fauour to preferre him before Harald, cannot directly be said: The ambition of Harald was such, that being appointed regent during Edgars minority, by popularity and fraud he got the Cowne, which was the cause of Englands ruine, but whosoeuer had most right, certaine it is, the Conqueror being a Bastard, was absolutely illegitimate, and therefore he had least right, yet neuertheless, he obtained the Crowne, when Harald was establisshed in the regall Throne, and had got the Nobility to doe him homage and fealty, and had also defended his kingdome from inuasion of his owne brother, and of the Danes, but he had liued wickedly, and was guilty of much blood: besides, the murther of Alured, brother to the Confessor. The people tooke offence against Harald, for that hee did not liberaly diuide the spoyle of the Danes. The issue of this alteration was, the conquest of this kingdome of England, the slaughter of the King, Nobility and Common people, the alteration of ancient lawes, and the translation of the Crowne, with the thraldome of the Nation: for the word conquest, of it selfe, sheweth it could be no otherwise, nor want ought that might adde heauinesse vnto the vexed English Nation.

Nation. The great admiration of this alteration, was not so much in the Conquest of this Land: which may be said to be done, as it were, vpon the sudden, because it is but part of an Iland, and therefore the Conquest thereof is not so admirable, as that the Conquerour and his heyres should keepe it, by reason the French King neither fauoured his attempt, nor fortunate successe, neither were the Scots and Brytons any way pleased with the spreading of his strength ouer this land, by which meanes he might doe them double annoyance, as he, and his daily exercised vpon the poore English, as well vpon the Clergy, as Laity, the Nobility, as common people, all which would haue beene glad of his extirpation, and yet in dispight of them, and all others, hee royally, and peacefully swayed the Kingdome, which is the greatest wonder of all.

The fifth Alteration.

The fifth Reuolution, or Alteration of time, may be said to be in two sorts, and in all respects, farre milder and more peacable then any of the former, the first, in the time of Henry the eighth, when the Clergy was exceeding rich and powerfull, and were endowed with wondrous stately Palaces, and great possessions, so as in euery Citty, and County, and townes corporate, and in very many remote places, then were very strong and sumptuous houses for Religious persons: as Abbayes, Priories, Friaries, Monks regular, Minories, Chauntries, Nunneries, and such like, at which time, the Clergie grew proud, negligent, and secure, presuming like the Knights Templers, vpon their proper greatnesse, as well in regard of the reasons aforesaid, as that euery Lord Abbot and Lord Prior, that wore Miters, sate in the vpper Parliament and had free voyces, as Barons subsistant with the Bishops. The Lords and Ladies Abbesses of which houses were vsually of noble birth, and sometime of the blood Royall, as well women, as men, for by this time, through the charitable deuotion, and special affection of former Kings, Princes, Peeres, and common people, the Monasteries were so much increased, gloriously builded and adorned, and plenteously endowed with large priuiledges, possessions, and all things necessary. Albeit, they relieued the poore, and raised no rents, nor tooke excessiue Fines, yet they many wayes neglected their duty to God and man, being verily perswaded, their estate and safety to be more safe and secure then euer was any condition of people, because their houses were repayred, their rents encreased, their Churches new builded and beautified, euen to the very day of their generall dissolution, which came suddenly vpon them, like the vniuersall deluge. For whilest the Religious persons thus flattered and secured themselues, the King obtained the Ecclesiasticall Supremacy into his particular possession, and there-withall had power giuen him by Parliament, to suruey and reforme the abuses of all those houses and persons aboue said: but the King because hee would goe the next way to worke, ouerthrew them, raced them, many ruins of them remaine a testimony thereof to this day: whereat many of the Peeres and common people murmured, because they expected that the abuses should haue beene onely reformed, and the rest haue still remained. The generall plausible proiect which caused the Parliament consent vnto the reformation, or alteration of the Monasteries, was that the Kings Exchequer should for euer be enriched, the kingdome and Nobility strengthened and encreased, and the common Subiects acquainted and freed from all former seruices and Taxes, to wit, that the Abbots, Monks, Fryers and Nunnes, being suppresst, that then in their places, should be created forty Earles, threescore Barons, and three thousand Knights, and forty thousand Souldiours, with skilfull Captaines, and competent maintenance for them all, euer out of the ancient Churches reuenewes, so as in so doing, the King and successors should neuer want of Treasure of their owne, nor haue cause to be beholding to the common Subiects, neither should the people be any more charged with Loanes, Subsidies, and Fifteenes. Since which time, there haue beene more statute Lawes, Subsidies and Fifteenes, then fiue hundred yeeres before. And not long after that, the King had Subsidies granted, and borrowed great summes of money, and died in debt, and the forenamed religious houses were vtterly ruinated, whereat the Clergy, Peeres, and common people were all sore grieued, but could not helpe it. Hee also suppreſt the Knights of the Rhodes, whose ſtately Pallaces, and large poſſeſſions, were no way inferiour vnto the welthyeſt Abbaies, by which ſuppreſſion, many were aduanced, and sore that reſiſted, were called in queſtion of their liues and goods. This alteration was long ſince foretold by Merlin, saying.

dyed

The hare ſhall kindle vpon the Harth-ſtone,
And lads ſhall wed Ladies, when Loras are gon.

He likewiſe suppreſſed many fayre hoſpitalls, whereat the cõmons began to thinke that the King had no intent, eyther to relieue the poore, admit maintenance for maimed ſouldiours, or to eaſe them of any common charge, notwithſtanding all former pretences and proiects. This was done after the King was diuorced, from Katherine of Spaine, his firſt wife, with whom he had liued aboue twenty yeeres, and by her had fiue children, whereof foure dye in their infancy. The Clergy, nor Parliament, notwithſtanding the Kings importunity, would neuer yeeld to the diuorced, by reaſon they could not find any iuſt cauſe. Then the King made Cranmer Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was very apt and ready to performe the Kings will, and hee denounced the ſentence of diuorce. Then the King, contrary to the good liking of all men, married Anne Bullen, by whom he had the Lady Elizabeth, and then by Act of Parliament made it high Treaſon, againſt all men that ſhould ſay the marriage was not lawfull. And preſently after her birth, he pickt a quarrell againſt Queene Anne and then repealed the former Act, and made a new Act of Parliament, wherein it was enacted, that it ſhould be high Treaſon for any to iuſtifie his former marriage to be lawful, and the next day after her beheading, he maried her hand-maide, Jane Seymor, and then declared the Lady Elizabeth to be illegitimate, as he had done before by the Lady Mary. All this while, he ſtill maintained the Roman Catholike Religion, with ſeuere puniſhment to ſuch as did impugne it: and to that purpoſe, he publiſhed the ſixe Articles, which ſome called the whip of ſixe ſtrings, ſo as many were amazed, and could not vnderſtand the Kings meaning: for many Catholiques which applauded the ſixe Articles, denyed the Supremacy: and many that approued his Supremacy, reſiſted the ſixe Articles, of which ſort in both kindes, there were ſome executed at one time, as Maſter Fox very well noteth: and thereupon thoſe that were of the Kings Religon, and denyed his Supremacie were called Papiſts, and the other were termed the new Aſſumptimus, or Innouators.

Shee was daughter to Sir Thomas Bullen.

And albeit he vpheld the Maſſe, yet hee cauſed the Epiſtle and Goſpell with the Morning and Euening Prayer to be read in both languages. With the great riches of the Monaſteries, he raiſed an Army, inuaded France, and won Bullen, and many yeers before that, he won Turwin & Turney: for the which his iudgement was generally called in queſtion, becauſe thoſe cities lay ſo far within the Land, that it was not poſſible for the Engliſh to keep or relieue them. He began his raigne prodigally, raigned rigorouſly, liued proudly, and dyed diſtemperately. In his latter time he waxed very fat and ſlothfull, and made engins to lift and remoue him vp and downe, which engins were taken downe about the yeere 1612 Through feare and terror, he obtained an Act of Parliament to diſpoſe of the right Succeſſion to the Crowne, and then by his Will and Teſtament contrary to the Law of God and nature, conueys it from the lawfull heyres of his eldeſt ſiſter, married vnto the King of Scotland, vnto the heyres of Charles Brandon and others, thereby to haue defeated, preuented, and ſuppreſt the vnqueſtionable and immediate right from God, of our gracious Souereigne Lord, King James, as if it had beene in the power of his will, or of the Parliament, to diſ-inherit and preuent the diuine free gift and grace of Almighty

Which was then called Mattins and Vesper.

Almighty God, by which the Kings of this Land doe hold their crownes, borrowing this his preſident from King Pepin of France, and from William the Conquerour: who obtained their ſeuerall Crownes in their owne particular rights, way of conqueſt, and not by ſucceſſion and the law of nature, and thereupon diſpoſed of them at their free pleaſurus: Pepin deuiſed and diuided his kingdome, part to Charlemaigne, and part to his other ſonne, and the Conqueror diuided his kingdome vnto his younger ſonne, William, and his Dukedome of Normandy, to his elder ſonne, Robert, which hee might doe, being Conqueror. King Henry the eighth, had ſixe wiues, to wit, Catherine of Spaine, Anne Bullen, Iane Seamor, Anne of Cleane, Catherine Howard, and Catheryne Parre. Hee appointed his body to be buried at Windſor, and ordained a Prieſt to ſay Maſſe, for euer, and two Obits to pray for him for euer: at his death he was much perplexed, and ſpake many things to great purpoſe, but being vnconſtant in his life, none durſt truſt him at his death.

His ſonne Edward, at nine yeeres of age ſucceeded him, and then the Church was fleec't againe, the Biſhopricks cut and pared, all Chauntries ſuppreſt, and the Biſhopricke of Durham alienated, by all which, the Kings Exchequer was very little enriched, neither was the common-wealth eaſed or benefited, nor the ancient Nobility any way dignified, onely ſome few preferred. The Earledome of Northumberland, was giuen to the houſe of Suttons, who obtained the Title of Duke of Northumberland. In the firſt and ſecond yeere of his raigne, the Maſſe was wholly ſuppreſt, and part of King Dauids Pſalmes were turned into Engliſh verſe, by Hopkins and Sternehold, Gromes of the Kings chamber, and ſet them to ſeuerall tunes: the reſt of the Pſalmes were turned into verſe in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth, and for diuers yeeres were called Geneua Pſalmes. The Duke of Somerſet, vncle to the King by the mothers ſide, being the Kings Protector, did all things in the Kings name, and inclined ouermuch to the ſubtill counſell of his ſecret enemy the Duke of Northumberland, who was fully bent to defeat and ſuppreſſe the apparant heyres of God and nature vnto the Crowne, and to preſerre the heyres of the Duke of Suffolke, according to the iniurious determination of Henry the eyghth. For the better effecting whereof they made a combination which had as good ſucceſſe, as ſo bad a practice deſerued. The Protector among other things that croſt his greatneſſe in popularity, was the ſpoyling of Churches and Chappells, the defacing of ancient Tombes and Monuments, his attempting to pull downe all the Bells in Pariſh-churches, and to leaue but one Bell in a Steeple, whereat the whole Comonalty were ready to rebell. The young King, by reaſon of vntimely birth, was weake in body, in ſuch ſort, that riding in State thorow London to be ſeene of the people, he had a faire chaine of gold about his necke, which was then held a Kingly ornament, though at this day contemned to be worne, by meane ſubiects, the weight of his chaine, cauſed his feeble body to bow: hee was of a delicate ſpirit, wel tutored, courteous of ſpeach, well fauoured and very faire, he raigned ſeuen yeeres and by many coniectures he could not haue liued much longer, though he had not met with a tricke of Treaſon.

After Edward, his ſiſter Mary ſucceeded him, notwithſtanding the great confederacy of the new Northumberland Duke and his faction, which for a time was wondrous great and ſtrong, conſiſting of many Noblemen, and moſt of the Iudges and Officers of the Land: againſt all which in the right of Mary, the Earle of Oxford was formoſt, whoſe forwardneſſe within few houres, made the aduerſe faction to renounce their confederacy and follow his courſe. Queene Mary was Crowned with great popularity, and the generall loue of all her ſubiects: but ſtriuing too violently to ſtop the gap, and ſtay the ſtreame, which her father & brother had laid open, beeing then made the free paſſage and common way, ſhe was onely affected of ſuch as preferred her proceedings. Shee reſtored the firſt fruits, and Eccleſiaſticall Supremacy vnto the Papacy. Shee reduced the Biſhoprick of Durham vnto the Church, which the late Protector had had otherwise appointed, and restored Piercy to his birth-right of the Earle-dome of Northumberland, and by her best meanes, began to set vp the ruinated Monasteries, endeauouring with some extremity, to re-establish the Roman Catholike Religion. The matter of it selfe, though it were very gracious vnto all Catholikes in generall, yet the manner was mis-liked of by many, because the multitude were so roughly dealt withall, which needed not, if some few of higher nature had been called in question, and made examples to the common people. The Emperour Carolus Quintus had so reuerend an opinion of her vertues, and princely high perfections, that hee resigned his kingdome of Spaine, and the seuentéene Prouinces to his sonne Philip, thereby to make him worthy of so great aduancement, as to match with the Queene of England. King Philip arriued in England with great magnificency, being in all things furnished and attended like a lusty wooer, and the sonne of an Emperor. The Queene, after marriage, was conceiued with childe, but it mis-tortuned. Shee raigned fiue yeeres, in which space, though the Clergy were aduanced, yet the Commons through the difference of Religion were many waies vexed, and alwaies that of her selfe she was wise and learned, of a milde nature, and gentle disposition, yet by reason of the generall course she tooke in so different and pernitious a time, she seemed cleane contrary: and the rather for that in her time, as some did afterwards in the raigne of Queene Elizabeth, that executed their particular malice, and practised priuate reuenge, vnder colour of Religion, and preferring the iustice of the Law.

ELIZABETH succeeded her Sister, and began not her raigne with so generall applause as her Sister did, by reason the Clergy, the Nobility, and most of the Commons were Roman Catholikes, who neuertheless, although they well knew her full determination was to alter their setled course in Religion, yet they all with one consent, being set in the Parliament-house, when the certaine newes was brought them of Queene Maries death, they acknowledged her immediate right, and presently declared the same by diuers Proclamations: and forthwith prepared themselues to performe their homage & fealty, which she very graciously accepted: and in the next Parliament, shee suppresst the Masse, resumed the Ecclesiasticall Supremacy, and recalled the first fruits, and repreast all Religious houses, which her Sister had erected. In this Parliament notwithstanding the presence of the Queen with the apparant likelihood of her long life, and hope of issue to succeed her, yet the Maior part exceeded the Minor but in fiue voyces: at which time, the Queene openly pronounced, that she would neuer vexe nor trouble the Roman Catholikes, concerning any difference in Religion. She swayed the Scepter with great mildenesse, and ministred Iustice carefully vnto her Subiects, and within few yeeres, obtained great popularity: which of all things else, thee held the applause of the multitude but as a blast of wind. The state and forme of Religion being established, the Booke of Common-Prayer was published, which with some reformation was Correspondent to that, lately published in the time of Edward the sixth. Whileft the Queene was young, she was often importuned by Parliament to marry, in hope of issue to establish the Crowne, and when shee grew in yeeres, shee was as earnestly moued by Parliament to appoint and declare her lawfull successor, but neither of them preuailed. In her latter time, shee was grieued with the French King, because hee entred into league with Rome and Spaine, contrary to the Tennor of a league offensiue and defensiue, lately made between the Queen and him. She was vexed with the pernicious rebellion of Hugh Tyrone in Ireland. She was endowed with many excellent gifts and high perfections, which I here omit, because I haue set them downe at large at the end of her raigne. In the time of her sickenesse, the people were sore amazed, and distracted, not knowing which way, nor vpon whom to fixe their eyes for safety, euery man double furnished his house with sundry kinde of Muni-

Munition, & some fled the Land, and some laid in competent store of corn for diuers monethes, and most men desired to haue their being in London, but none could tell what course to take, vntill by the ineffable goodnesse of Almighty God, the hearts of the Nobility, and other the priuy Councellors of estate vnto the Queene, beyond all humane expectation, and merit, were inwardly vnited, and with her long feared death, euen at an instant, according to the diuine saying of holy writ, Griefe and feare was ouer-night, but ioy and gladnesse came in the morning, all gronings ceased, feare and doubt banished, and all vexed spirits cheared, by hearing the name of King IAMES proclaimed. She was the last of her Fathers Line, and then notwithstanding her fathers many wiues, and iniurious will and Testament, which was seconded and preferred by the combination in the time of Edward the sixth, and since that further ed by sundry Acts of Parliament, to obscure the true Successor, with other practises and deuices to impeach, if not to defeat all future right of Succession, all these forenamed temporall policies, perished and came to nought, to the eternall praise of God, by whose diuine prouidence, the Crowne returned vnto the next and immediate heyre of Henry the seuenth, after the thrice blessed and memorable coniunction of the houses of Yorke and Lancaster, and King IAMES in all loue and peace was tryumphantly established.

This last Alteration vpon the Reuolution, which by Gods diuine prouidence, was farre more admirable, milde, gracious, and propitious to this kingdome, then euer hapned since it first was inhabited, came in the height of period, or fulnesse of time, when the hearts of the English were bigge fraught with griefe, and ouergrowne with feare, and the eyes of forraigne neighbours fixed vpon this Land, expecting more strange and terrible euents, to haue suddenly ensued vpon the Queenes death, then at any of the former Alterations vpon the Reuolutions, because by them, all the forenamed time, policies and practices were more obserued abroad, then noted or knowne at home: being free from the danger of Lawes, which with great penalty, no lesse then high Treason, forbad the English eyther to dispute, or determine any person in the right of Succession. When the Queene, according to the course of nature was past child-bearing, thee was often very importunately vrged by Parliament with many humble petitions for the vniuersall, and euerlasting safety of her kingdome and Subiects, that shee would vouchsafe to appoint and declare her Successor, but she would neuer consent thereunto by any meanes, wherear the Subiects feare hourely encreased, and the more, because no cure could cure their long feared misery. Then the rich began to hoard vp money for a rainy day, and a generall prouerbe past currant among all men, that the time would come, which could not be farre off, that a hundred pound of real worth should be better then an hundred pound of yeerely Reuenewes.

terror, diuers times there were more that offered Land to sell, than thus were the hearts of young and old perplexed, for such as had reputions, were at their wits ends, in deuising which way they might leaue their some in good estate in time to come, without hope or meanes for their redress, but onely humble prayers to the King of kings, whose arme in mercy, as in iustice, is neuer shortned, nor his hand wearyed, inspired the forenamed Nobility and priuy Councellors of estate, uniting their hearts with due acknowledgement of our Soueraignes right, and he as graciously approued their actions and desires in due obedience to his Soueraignety, whose long patience, in digesting wrongs of sundry kinds offered to him and his, without the least disturbance, or impeach of any practice or proceedings which were vsed to impaire his right, and without all attempts of interruption to his land or state, or will to shew his strength to take reuenge, being daily thereunto prouoked, and most strongly allyed and backed by all Christian Princes, besides his proper power and assured friends within this land, who were alwaies prest to lay downe their liues and goods in his true seruice and defence, all which laid together with his said admired admired patience and free spirit duely considered, hee hath giuen to all posterity a lasting president worthy his honour, and the greatnesse of so gentle and speedy an alteration. The Queene being but sixe houres dead, his right hand dignity, was straight way proclaimed and receiued with the greatest ioy and peace that mans heart could wish, without any signe of faction or interruption: being vniuersally glad, to haue a King of Chastity, Patience, Piety, Mercy, and Iudgement, Wisdome, Learning, Bounty, Peace, and Munificence, hauing a hopefull issue, and healthfull Race, descended from the most ancient Kings of Europe, and from his infancy had continued in perfect amity with all Christian Princes, to the generall good of all Christendome, and weakning of the common Enemy the Turke.

The effects of this Alteration were in all respects cleane different from all former changes, and was no lesse wonderfull to all other Regions, then beneficiall to the English Nation: who in a moment had their Kingdome settled, the Crowne rightly established, the Clergy cherished, the Nobility aduanced their common Lawes continued, and the people resting in all Tranquility, enioying their ancient Customes, Lawes, and Liberties, in as good and as ample manner as eyther their heart could wish, or is inioyed by any other Nation: who were no sooner sensible, of what high blessings they possest but were instantly lulled in security, and became sensleise, forgetfull, and vnthankfull of Gods aboundant grace and mercy, and of the vnspeakeable benefit of the vnity and concord of King and Peeres of both kingdomes: being absolute instruments and good meanes that brought this wondrous worke vnto desired effect: to the vtter daunting of all aduersaries, and endlesse admiration of all posterities.

AND thus much briefely, touching the Law of Hystory: the authority and proose of Brute and Troy, and the fiue seuerall changes, and alterations, or reuolutions since the first habitation of this most famous and renowned Island of great Britaine. And also of the effects and obseruations of euery of those seuerall changes, alterations, and reuolutions.

All which, both generally and particularly, though here but briefely mentioned: yet their extremities, alterations and effects, worthily deserue iudicious obseruation, and lasting memory: especially by the rusty mindes of this Iron Age, whose extreme wilfull forgetfulnesse and ingratitude for infinite benefits and boundlesse blessings receiued, haue compelled me in discharge of my duty diligently to search into the depth of our ancient English Chronicles, and others; to place before their eyes, a mirror of the miseries of former times. In setting downe whereof, I haue vsed all diligence, and layd away partiality with both my hands; I was bred and borne free from schisme and faction, hate contention.

The Originall and true purpose of Chronology, as I said before, was to shew Successors, the Actions good and bad of their Ancestors, and to remaine as documents to pursue the good, and eschew the bad, and not to fill vp great Volumes with superfluous curiosity, lofty stile, and needlesse Eloquence, such as our fore-fathers neuer knew or heard of.

Plaine truth was the marke I aym'd at in the beginning, midst, and end, and in that simplicity or solid truth I end, leauing this short discoure as a Token and Remembrance to after ages, but chiefely to those to whom it shall please Almighty God to giue vnderstanding of his diuine Mercy and Iudgements, hoping it will be as kindly accepted; as it is freely offered, Vale.

EDMOND HOWES.

TO THE KINGS MOST EXCELLENT MAIESTY.

MOst Gracious Soueraigne, The manifold Vertues & Princely Perfections wherewith it hath pleased Almighty GOD most plenteously to enrich your Maiesty, are so infinite and eminent, as well by the diuine instinct of GOD and Nature, as by endeauour and royall education, that to expresse them but in the least part, would worthily fill vp large Volumes; but at this time, and in this place I am tied to breuity, whereby my duteous integrity is preuented from manifesting your matchlesse Gifts and Graces, and the present time onely permitteth me to pray for their continuance and encrease.

May it therefore please your MAIESTY to pardon my defect, and graciously accept into your most royall Patronage, these my thirty yeeres labours of impartiall Truth, which with all faithfulnes I haue composed, according to my oath and promise made to the late most reuerend Prelate, Doctor Whitegift, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury; by whose especiall instruction and encouragement I vndertooke this general Worke, in honor of my Prince and Country, as who please to read vnderstandingly, and iudge religiously, shall find more benefits befalne vnto this Monarchy of GREAT BRITAINE, since the first yeere of his late MAIESTIES, your Highnesse Royall Father of euerlasting blessed memory, his most happy Inauguration, then euer happened since the first Foundation. And your euer renowned Wisedome continuing the same, is more obserued by all forraigne Nations, then is either acknowledged, or thankefully receiued by those that wholly enioy it, who rather surfet in excesse, then taste of want: Yet neuertheless in discharge of my place and duty in this Seruice, I haue set downe good testimony of the premises, which with all humility I dedicate vnto your Maiesties benigne and gracious acceptation and protection, and my zealous prayers to the King of Kings, for your long and happy raigne, prosperous estate, and eternall felicity.

Your Maiesties most humble loyall vassall,

EDMOND HOVVES.

A BRIEFE DESCRIPTION
OF ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, WALES and CORNWALL.

BRYTAINE, or BRVTANNE, which by 2 names is called England and Scotland, is an Iland in the Ocean sea, situate right ouer against Fráce, one part of which Ile, Englishmē do inhabit, another, Scots, the third part Walshmen, and the fourth part Cornishmen. All they, either in language, conditions, or lawes, do differ among themselues.

Forty Counties or Shires.

England (so called of Englishmen, which did win the same) is the greatest part, and is diuided into 40 Counties, which we cal Shires: whereof ten (that is to say) Kent, Sussex, Surry, Southhaupton, Barkshire, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, Deuonshire, and Cornwall, doe contain the first part of that Iland: which part bounding toward the South, standeth betweene the Thames and the Sea.

From thense to the Riuer of Trent, which passeth thorow the midst of England, be fifteene Shires wher of the first fiue (standing Eastward) are Esser, Middlesex, Hartfordshire, Suffolke, Norfolke, and Cambridgeshire: the other ten which stand more in the middle of the Country, are these: Bedford, Huntington, Buckingham, Oxford, Northampton, Rutland, Leicester, Nottingham, Warwick, and Lincolne. After these there be 6 which border Westward vpon Wales, as Glocester, Hereford, Worcester, Shropshire, Stafford, Chester and Monmouth. About the middle of the Region, lie Darbishire, Yorkshire, Lancashire and Cumberland. On the left hand toward the West, is Westmerland. Against the same is the Bishoprycke of Durham, and Northumberland, which boundeth vpon the North, in the Marches of Scotland.

The antiquity of the Common Law of England.

This diuision into Shires or Shares, is by some that cite, and perhaps mistake Ingulfus, ascribed vnto King Alfred, the Saxon. But some others doe affirme it to be much more ancient, and doe verily thinke it to haue beene shortly after the first inhabiting and plantation of this Iland. For the first point, that it is more ancient then King Alfred, is most euident by the Lawes of King Ina, 100 yeares before Alfred, as they are extant in the Saxon tongue, and by the lawes of Kennethus King of Scots, in which diuers times there is mention made of Shires and of the Shireman or elderman, whom we now call Shiraue or Sheriffe. And truly the learned Bishop Offer, for ought that I can find in the life of Alfred, maketh no mention of any such diuision to be made by him, but nameth diuers Shires, namely Esser, Kent, Sussex, Surrey, and Barkshire, and the seuerall Earles of the same, before he commeth to speake of that King: and before him also Cæsar, Tacitus, Ptolomy, Marcellinus, and other histories doe name the seuerall Nations of the Brittaines, Cantios, Trinobants, Brigants, and the rest which had seuerall parts of the Kingdome, as also appeareth by the learned M. Camden. For the second it is very probable, that the ancient Coomery or Cymbry descended of Iapher the first possessors of this Iland, after the dispersion of Babel, did as other ancient Nations in their seuerall Territories: for not only of the Iewes, but of many other people it is recorded, that they were diuided into Tribes, which possessed their seuerall shares or parts of their Countries. The Persians, the Medians, the Grecians, and Scythians, as is reported by Xenophon, Herodotus and other Authors, yea the Canaanites, and the Ismaelites, retained the same order, as appeareth in the sacred Scripture: wherefore it seemeth this diuision in Britain was likewise very ancient, which is also proued by that elder law of Mulmutius, recited by Polydore. And so the diuision made by Alfred, was but some description or more plain distinction of the former, for so doth Ingulfus in another place expound his meaning.

The Bishopricks in England.

These Shires be diuided into two and fiuety Bishopricks, which by a Greeke word, be called Dioceses. Of which Dioceses, Canterbury hath Kent: Rochester hath part of Kent: London hath Esser, Middlesex, and part of Hartford. Chichester hath Sussex: Winchester hath Hamphire, Surry, and the Ile of Wight. Salisbury hath Barkshire and Wiltshire: Exeter hath Deuonshire and Cornwall: Bathe & Wels hath Somersetshire. Worcester hath Worcestershire, and part of Warwickshire: Glocester hath Glocestershire: Hereford hath part of Shropshire, and Herefordshire. Countrey and Lichfield hath Staffordshire, Darbishire part of Warwickshire, and part of Shropshire. Lincolne, which is the greatest, lying betweene the Thames and Humber, hath Lincolne, Leycester, Huntington, Bedford, Buckingham, and the residue of Hartfordshire. Ely hath Cantabridgeshire, and the Ile of Ely. Norwich hath Suffolke and Norfolke, and part of Cantabridgeshire. Oxford hath Oxfordshire. Peterborow hath Northamptonshire and Rutland. Bristow hath Dorsetshire. And this is the province of the Archbishop of Canterbury, which is the Primate of all England, with Wales. The Archbishop of Yorke, hath Yorkshire, Nottinghamshire, and a piece of Lancashire. The Bishop of Durham, hath the Bishopricke so commonly called, and Northumberland. Chester, hath Cheshire, most part of Lancashire. Richmond, part of Flintshire and part of Denbighshire. Carlile containeth Cumberland, and Westmerland: and this is the other province of the Archbishop of Yorke, which is another Primate of England, and was of long time also Primate of all Scotland: but these Dioceses take their names of their Cities where their Seas bee placed, the chiefe whereof, is London, where in the beginning was the Archbishops Sea, but afterwards transposed to Canterbury, a City in Kent, placed in a soyle amiable and pleasant.

The River of Thames.

London standeth in Middlesex, on the North side of the Thames. That most excellent and goodly River hath first the name of Isa. and beginneth in Cotteswold in Glocestershire, about a mile from Cirbery, and as much from the high way called Fosse: and it taketh first the name of Tamise, neere to Dorcester-bridge, where the River Tame, and the foresaid Isa meete, and so with a marvellous quiet course, it passeth by London, and then breaketh into the French Ocean by meane tides, which twise in foure and twenty houres space doth ebbe and flow more then three score miles, to the great comodity of travellers, by which, all kindes of marchandise be easily conveyed to London, the principall Store and staple for all commodities within this Realme. Upon the same River is placed a stone bridge, a work very rare and marvellous, which bridge hath (reckoning the Drawbridge) twenty Arches made of foure square stone, of height three score foot, and of breadth thirty foot, distant one from another twenty foot, compact and joyned together with Vaults and Cellers: Upon both sides be houses builded, that it seemes rather a continuall Streete, then a Bridge.

London-bridge.

The Ocean Sea doth bound England, the first part of Britaine, East and South, Wales and Cornwall West. The River of Twede diuideth England and Scotland, North. The length of the Iland beginneth at Portsmouth in the South part, and endeth at Twede in the North, containing 700 miles.

This Realme above other is most fruitfull on this side Humber: for beyond, it is fuller of mountaines. And all ought to the beholders of that Country a farre off, it may seem plaine, yet it is full of many hils, and those for the most part voyd of trees, the vallies whereof be very delectable, inhabited for the most part by Noble men, who according to ancient and old order, desire not to dwell in Cities, but neere into vallies and rivers in severall villages, for avoyding of vehement windes, because that Iland naturally is stormy.

Humbre hath his beginning a little on this side Pozke, and by and by runneth Southward, and then holdeth his course Eastward, and so into the maine Sea, greatly increased by the Rivers of Dun and Trent.

The River of Humbre.

Trent beginneth a little from Staffordshire, running thorow Darbishire, and Leicestershire, passing by Lichfield and Nottingham on the right hand, and Dune on the left hand: so that both those Rivers doe make an Iland which is called Auxolme, and then joyning together on this side Kingstone upon Hull, a goodly Marchant Towne, they fall into Humbre: by which River they map arrive out of France, Germany and Denmarke.

The River of Trent.

England is fruitfull of beasts, and aboundeth with cattell: whereby the inhabitants be rather for the most part, graziers then plowmen, because they give themselves more to feeding, then to tillage. So that almost the third part of the Countrey is imployed to cattell, Deere, redde and fallow, Goats, (whereof there bee store in the Northparts) and Conies: for every where there is tolly maintenance of those kinds of beasts, because it is full of great woods: whereof there riseth pastime of hunting, greatly exercised, specially by the Nobility and Gentlemen. (Andrew Bourd saith, there be moe Parks in England then in all Europe beside.)

Andrew Bourd.

Scotland, another part of Brytaine, (whereof in this place I have thought good to treat at large, that no further mention of the situation thereof might be made hereafter) it beganne sometime at the hill called Grampius, now called Gantesbein stretching to the furthest coast Northward, but after the over-throw of the Picts, it beganne at the River Twede, and sometimes at the River of Tyne, the footsome of the warres altering the same, as it doth all other things. Therefore the length of Scotland from Twede to the furthest coast, is esteemed to be 480 miles: but as Scotland is longer then England, so it is narrow, and endeth like a wedge: For the mountaine Grampius is cuilt-fauoured and craggy, which Tacitus in the life of Julius Agricola doth remember, peircing thorow the bowels of Scotland, from the coast of the Germaine Sea, that is to say, from the mouth of the River of Dee to the Irish Sea, euen to the Lake of Lomond, which lyeth betweene that Countrey and the same hill.

Scotland.

Cornelius Tacitus.

The River of Twede (which springeth out of a little hill, not farre beyond Norborough) is marked with the Germaine Ocean, joyning Southward with that Countrey which is called the Marches, being the East bounds betweene England and Scotland. The said River, of Twede separateth the Marches from Northumberland, the furthest Countrey of England, having ing prospect to the Germane Sea, the chiefe Towne whereof is Barwicke, now in possession of the English.

The Westerne limit of Scotland whilom was Cumberland, which the River of Solue diuideth from Annandale. Betweene these two Regions the Cheuiot hils appeare. Nert to the Marches, Pictland boundeth, now termed Loughdean, bounding upon the East, a very hilly Countrey, barren almost of any trees. The most famous Townes of the same be Dunbarre, Haddington, Leith, Northberwick, and Edenborough the Kings seat, where also is the Castell of Maydens, a very strong and defensible place. The same City the River of Forthes (commonly called the Frith) doth water and passe by: which being carried into the Germane Ocean, maketh great armes or meres, comonly called the Scottish sea: wherein besides other is the Iland of Saint Columbe, by name called Aemonia. The same River again diuideth from Loughdean a Country adioyning (abundant of all things) called the Fife, in which Countrey are many Townes, as Donfermile, Cupre, but the notable Towne of Saint Andrew, specially famous for the Vniuersity, and beautified with the Sea of the Archbishop and Primate of all Scotland. On the other side towards the Irish side Northward, is Nidisdalia, so called of the River that passeth thereby, where be the strong Townes of Douglasse and Donfriese.

Upon the South adioyneth Galloway, more abundant of fodder for Cattell, then of Wheat, where is the Towne of Candida Casa, now called Whitherne, and the ancient Temple of S. Ninian, adorned also with an Episcopall sea. In those parts besides the Town of Wighton is a lake of a wonderfull nature, because the one side in Winter doth freeze and the other not. By that standeth the Countrey Caricta, once renowned with the Towne Caricton, whereof perchance it take the name. Above Caricta towards the West, is Elgonia (by which name Ptolemy calleth the Countrey) bordering upon the Ocean, wherein is the Lake Lomond, which is very broad one large, containing many Ilands, situate at the foote of the mountaine Gantesbeine, 8 miles from the Castle of Dunbryton, besides the River Bodotria, now named Leuinus, entring into the River of Glota or Glude. Here some doe contend that the name of Bodotria, is not well applied to Leuinus, because it appeareth by Cornelius Tacitus, that Bodotria and Glota have sundry passages into the sea and are clearely direpnt one from the other, as Leuinus and Glota are not: wherefore they judge rather the River now called the Frith, to be that which of old time had to name Bodotria, and to prove the same, they adde many other reasons, which here I omit. But a good space on this side Grampius riseth the River of Taus, the greatest in all Scotland, taking his name of a lake from whence it springeth, which falleth by Athola and Calidonia by many places, but chiefely by Perthum now called Saint Johnstown, and lastly by Dunde, in time past called Alectum, and there breaketh into the German Sea, and at the mouth forth creth great ebbes or armes of the sea, whereof Tacitus maketh mention. Against Taus is Anguise, which by meanes of that River is fertile and prosperous, and is diuided from Fife. To the same upon the North adioyneth Athol, not the barrenest country as well for water as for plenty of soile. On the other side Arguile (weeth it self) which being full of lakes, yeldeth greater plenty of fodder then fruit, whose bitterwost bounds stretch so far, as Ireland is not distant past 12 miles about which the Promontory of Lorne called Lanos head standeth. That coast whilome the Silures did inhabit, as Polidor gathereth by these words of Pliny in his 4 booke, the 16 chapter.

Ireland being situate ouer against Britaine, is distant from the station of Silures by the shortest cut 20 miles. Howbeit, some other, for that it is manifest by the same Pliny in the same chapter, and also by other Writers, that Britaine was not in his time well knowne so farre South, suppose hee meant not by this, that the Silures should inhabit Arguile, but rather South-Wales, from whence the passage ouer was better knowne (and as hee might have vnderstanding) hereof. Where also as well Tacitus as Antonius seeme to place that people.

Betweene Arguile and Leniox Westward lyeth the Countrey of Sterling, so called by a Towne there. Here the forrest of Calidonia began on the left side, which with his fruitfulness fat and broad. This forrest sometimes dyed white Buls, long maned like Lyons, which were so wilde as they could not be tamed, but because the flesh was pleasant and dainty to the mouth, the whole race of them almost is extinguished. There likewise is the Castle of Calidone, situate by Taus called Doucheloins. From a little hill of the forrest riseth Glota, or Cluid, which by a broad channel falleth into the Irish Ocean: for shaped in a manner by the banks of the mountaine Grampius it sloeth into the Sea by great tides, so (as witnesseth Tacitus) the Romanes thought it to be another Iland. Of that river the Dale was called Glotevale, which Country the River runneth by: and as the same is the City of Glasco, a goodly Vniuersity. Against towards the East is joyned the Country of Anguish and Merne upon the Sea coast, wherein Fedoms by situation is very strong, and for the reliques of S. Palladius the Scottish Apostle, famous.

Of the same side of Scotland, is the Countrey of Marre, garnished with a City called Aberdone, standing betweene the two Rivers of Dona & Dea, with a Schole also adorned. Then followeth Morrey, which the two notable Rivers doe compasse about, called Nessa and Spea. At the mouth of this last River, standeth the Towne of Elgin, about the banks whereof be huge woods replenished with all sorts of wilde beasts. There is a lake also called Spina, stored with plenty of Swans: but in the middle part, standeth the broad Country of Rossia, now called Beane Rozen, stretching to the bitternose angle, euen to both the Seas, and the farthest goeth Eastward, the better it is inhabited. In the same is a bosome of the Sea, now and then so conuenient for Sailers, as commonly it is called the port of health, (or the Hauen of Safety) and the Towne Thana. The breadth of the Iland is very short, for falling into the forme of a wedge, it is scant 30 mile ouer, which defended with three promontories like towers, repelleth the great waues and surges of the Sea: and incironed with two gulfes, which those promontories doe inclese, the entries bee quiet and calme, and the water peaceable. The trait of that Land, is at this day called Cathanes, consisting vpon the Sea Deucalidon.

Thus much of the particulars of Scotland. But the same is in euery place full of good Hauens, and nauigable entries, Lakes with Marshes, floods, fountaines, very full of fish, and mountains, vpon the tops whereof, be pleasant plains, yeelding great store of grasse, and plenty of fodder for Cattell, woods likewise full of wilde beasts; that part of the Land is well stuffained with commodities, and therefore the people hard to be vanquished at any time, by reason the woods and Marshes be at hand for refuge, and hunger eased with venison and fish. Without Scotland, in the Irish Seas, are many Ilands now discouered, to the number of 140: some of these in length are 30 miles, but in breadth not aboue 12. Amongst them is Iona, beautified with the Tombes of the Scottish Kings. The Ilanders generally speake Irish, which declareth them to take their Originall of the Irish Nation. Beyond Scotland toward the North, be the Iles of Orchades, which (as Ptolomy sayeth) be three score in number, some lying in the Deucalidon Sea, and some in the Germane Ocean, the principall of which Ilands, is Pamonia, because it is a Bishoppes Sea, and is vnder the gouernment of Scotland. The Ilanders vse the Gothes speech, which argueth them to proceed from the Germanes. They be tall of stature, but very healthy and lusty of body and minde, liuing very long, although their chiefest food is fish, for the Land almost continually beset with cold, in many places is not able to beare corne, and generally almost without tree or bush. Beyond the Orchades be the Ilands of Scotland, vnder the king of Scots obedience, and beyond those standeth Thule, in the frozen Sea, now called Ieland, to which our Marchants repaire for fishing once euery yere in the Summer. And thus much haue I to say of the site of Scotland: now of the nature and maunerss of the people.

The Scots which inhabit in the Southerne part, be well nurtured, and liue in good ciuility, and the most ciuill vse the English speech. And for that wood there is geason and scant, their common fewell is of a blacke stone, which they dig out of the earth. The other part Northerne and full of mountaines, a very rude and homely kinde of people doth inhabite, which are called the Redshankes or wilde Scots. They be clothed with a mantle, and shirt saffroned after the Irish manner, going bare-legged to the knee. Their weapons are bowes and darts, with a very broad sword and a dagger, sharpe onely at the one side. All speake Irish, feeding on fish, milke, cheese and flesh, hauing a great number of Cattell. The Scots differ from the English in Lawes & Customes, because they vse the ciuill Law, as almost other Countries do. The English haue their owne Lawes and Edicts. In certaine other conditions they be not farre vnlike, but their language is one, their habit and complexion like, one courage in battell, and in the Nobility, one desire and pregnancie in hunting. The Countrey houses be narrow, couered with straw and reede, wherein the people and beasts doe lodge together. Their Townes besides Saint Johns Town, are vnwalled, which is to be ascribed to their animositie and hardinesse, trusting all their succour and helpe allway in the valiancy of their body. The Scots are very wise, as their learning declareth. For to whatsoeuer Art they doe apply themselues, they easily profit in the same. But the idle and slothfull, and such chiefely as shunne and auoyd labour, liue in great pouerty, and yet will not sticke to boast of their Nobility and Gentry, as though it were more seemely for the honest to lacke, then comely (by exercise of some honest Arte) to get their liuing. But the Scots generally be deuoute obseruers of Religion. And thus much of Scotland.

Wales, the third part of Britaine lieth vpon the left hand, which like a promontory or forelande, or an Ile (as it were) on euery side is compassed with the maine Sea, except it be on the South-East part with the Riuer of Sabzine, commonly called Seuerne, which diuideth Wales from England, although some late writers affirme Hereford to be a bound betweene Wales and England, and say, that Wales beginneth at Chepstow, where the Riuer Wey (augmented, with another Riuer called Lugge) passing by Hereford, doth runne into the Sea, which Riuer riseth in the middle of Wales out of that hill (but vncertaine whether out of that spring that Sabzine doth) for euen to that place there goeth a great arme of the sea, which passing through the Land Westward, on the right hand leaueth Cornwal, and on the left Wales: which Topography or description, although it be new, yet I thought good to follow. Wales. Therefore Wales is extended from the Towne of Chepstow, where it beginneth almost by a straight line a little aboue Shzowsbury, euen to Westchester Northward. Into that part, so many of the Britaines as remained aliue after the slaughter and losse of their Countrey, at the length being driuen to their shifts, did repaire, as ancient Writings report, where partly through refuge of the mountaines, and partly of the woods & marishes, they remained in safety, which part they enioy euen to this day. That land afterwards the Englishmen did call Wales, and the Britaines the inhabitants of the same, Wallmen: for amongst the Germans, Wallman signifieth a Stranger, and an alien, as out-borne or Strange man, that is, such a one, as hath a contrary language from theirs, for Wal in their tongue is called a Stranger borne, as an Italian or Frenchman, which differ in speech from the German: Man signifieth Homo, which is

Wales

This arme of the Sea, as I iudge, is now called Iust, where is a passage betweene the village of Iust, and Chepstow.

is a man in English. Therefore Englishmen, a people of Germany, after they had won Britaine, called the Britains, which escaped after the destruction of their Countrey, after their Country manor, Wallmen, because they had another toung or speech besides theirs: and the land which they inhabited, Wales, which name afterward both to the people and Country did remaine. By this meanes the Britaines with their Kingdome lost their name. But they which affirm that name to be deriued of their King or Duene, without doubt be deceiued. The Country soile towards the seacoast, & in other places in the vallies and plaines, is most fertile, which yeldeth both to man and beast great plenty of fruit & grasse: but in other places for the most part it is barren and lesse fruitfull, because it lacketh tillage: for which cause husbandmen doe liue hardly, eating Oaten cakes, and drinking milke mixt with water. There be many Townes and strong Castles, and foure Bishoprickes, if the Bishoprickes of Hereford be counted in England, as the late Writers declare. The first Bishoprick of Menew, so call'd of Menena, which at this day they call Saint Dauids, a City very ancient, situated vpon the seacoast, & bounded Westward toward Ireland. Another is Landaffe, the third Bangor, and the fourth S. Asaph, which be vnder the Archbishop of Canterbury. The Wallmen haue a language from the Englishmen, which (as they say that fetch their pedigree from the Troians) doth partly sound of the Troian antiquity, and partly of the Greeke. But howsoeuer it is, the Wallmen do not pronounce their speech so pleasantly and gently as Englishmen doo, because they speake more in the throate: and contrarywise, the Englishmen rightly following the Latines, doe expresse their voice somewhat within the lips, which to the hearers seemeth pleasant and sweete. And thus much of Wales, the third part of Britain.

Foure Bishops in Wales.

Cornwall.

Now followeth the fourth and last part of Britaine named Cornwall. This part beginneth on that side which standeth toward Spain Westward: Toward the East, it is of breadth fourescore and ten miles, extending a little beyond Saint Germains, which is a very famous village, situate on the right hand vpon the Seacoast, where the greatest breadth of that Country is but 20. miles: for this parcell of land on the right hand is compassed with the coast of the maine Sea: and on the left hand with that arme of the Sea, which (as before is declared) parteth the land, and runneth vp to Chepstow, where the Country is in forme of a horne: For at the first it is narrow, & then groweth broader a little beyond the said Towne of S. Germaine. Eastward it bordereth vpon England: West, South, and North the maine sea is round about it: it is a very barren soile, yeelding fruit more through trauell of the tillers & husbandmen, then through the goodnesse of the ground: but there is great plenty of Lead & Tin, in the mynes and digging whereof, doth specially consist the liuing and sustentation of the inhabitants. Their tongue is farre dissonant from English, but it is much like to the Welsh tongue, because they haue many words common to both toungs: yet this difference there is betweene them, when a Wallman speaketh, the Cornishman rather vnderstandeth many words spoken by the Wallman, then the whole tale he telleth, whereby it is manifest, that those three people do one vnderstand another, in like manner as the Southern Scots doe perceiue and vnderstand the Northern. But it is a thing very rare and marueilous, that in one Iland there should be such variety of speeches. Cornwall is in the Diocese of Exceter, which was once worthy to be counted the 4th part of the Iland, for the cōtrariety of the language. Afterwards the Normans, which constituted a kingdom of all these 3. parts, reckoned Cornwall to be one of the Countries or Shires of the Countrey. Thus much of the particular descriptiō of Britain, that the whole body of the Realme (by the members) may be the better knowne to some peraduenture that neuer heard the same before.

The forme of the Iland is Triquetra, or three-cornered, hauing three corners, or three sides: two thereof, that is to say, the corner toward the East, and the other toward the West (both extending Northwards) are the longest. Strabo lib. 4.

The third side, which is the South side, is farre shorter then the other: for the Iland is greater of length then of breadth. And as in the other two parts is contained the length, euen so in the last, the breadth, in which place the breadth beginneth: and so continuing from the South part to the North, it is but narrow. The first and right corner of which Iland Eastward, is in Kent, at Douer and Sandwich. Frō whence to Caleis or Bolein in France, is the distance of 30. miles. From this Angle which is against France to the third Angle, which is in the North in Scotland, the maine whereof boundeth vpon Germany, but no land scene (and there the Iland is like vnto a wedge, euen at the very Angle of the Land in Scotland) the length is seuen hundred miles. Againe, the length from this corner at Douer in Kent, to the vttermost part of Cornwall, being Saint Michaels mount (which is the West part, or West Angle) is supposed to be three hundred miles. From this left Angle being the West part, & the vttermost part of Cornwall, which hath a prospect towards Spaine, in which part also standeth Ireland, situate betweene Britaine and Spaine to the North Angle in the further part of Scotland, in which part the Iland doth end, the length is 800. miles, in which part there be very good hauens, and safe harboroughs for ships, and apt passages into Ireland, being not past one daies sayling: but the shorter passage is from Wales to Waterford, a Towne in Ireland vpon the Seacoast, much like to that passage betweene Douer and Calcis, or somewhat more: but the shortest passage of all is out of Scotland. From this last Angle to Hampton, which is a Towne vpon the seacoast, with a hauen so called toward the South, and therefore called Southhampton, betweene the Angles of Kent and Cornwall, they do measure by straight line the nu[illegible]ele length of the Iland, and doe say, that it containeth eight hundred miles, as the breadth from Menena or Saint Davids to Yarmouth, which is in the vttermost part of the Iland towards the East, doth containe two hundred miles: for the breadth of the Iland is in the South part, which part is the front and beginning of the Land, and endeth narrow, or as it were in a straight. So the circuit, or compasse of this Iland, is 1800. miles, which is 200. lesse then Cæsar doth reckon or accompt.

A short Note to the Reader.

Iapheteos.

HEre it is recorded by the sacred and most ancient Historyy, that after the vniuersall Flood, the Iles of the Gentiles were diuided by the posterity of Iapheth the sonne of Noah, wee doubt not but this Ile of Britaine was also then peopled by his progeny, the History whome, as it is to be wished, and appertinent to this purpose, so fith it is irrecouerable, not onely vnto vs, but also to other nations, I thinke it better to say nothing therein, then to set downe heere Samothes, Magus, Sarron, Druys, and Bardus for his successors, which are vpholden and bolstered onely by the credit and authority of a new small Pamphet falsely forged, and thrust into the world vnder the Title of the ancient Historian Berosus. For that is the censure of all the best learned, as concerning our common Berosus, which at his first appearing, about one hundred yeeres since, was partly suspected by Lodouicus Viues, afterward conuicted to be fabulous, by the learned Gaspar Varrerius, in a seuerall Treatise, and now vniuersally reiected of all skilfull Antiquaries, as a meere fable, vnworthy the name of Berosus. Therefore I dare not ground the beginning of our history vpon the credit thereof, vnlesse I would be preiudiciall to the truth, whereunto I leuell all my endeuour. I hope it shall be sufficient in this History for the Britaines time, to follow the authority of the receiued British History, which Geoffrey, Archdeacon of Monmouth, translated out of the British toung about 400. yeeres since, beginning with Brute, who after the progeny of Iapheth seemeth to be first namer, and Ruler of this Land. Yet before we enter into the History of Brute, it shall not be impertinent to note here, that whereas Pomponius Mela mentioneth that one Hercules kild Albion a Giant about the mouth of Rhosne in France, many learned men haue iudged the said Albion to haue ruled heere, (sith the Greeke monuments doe alway call this Ile Albion) and after his death that Hercules came hither, Lilius Giraldus writeth. An ancient Altar also containing the inscription of a vow, told in the vttermost North part of Brytaine 1500. yeeres since, as Solinus reporteth, plainely proued that Vlisses the renowned Grecian in his 10. yeers trauels, after the sacking of Troy, arriued in this our countrey. And thus much is found only in approued Historics, as concerning Brytaine before the time of Brutus.

A briefe Proofe of BRVTE.

THe History of this Brute, is affirmed by very many ancient and learned Historians, vpon whose vniforme consent, although I dare not precisely conceit, that he was descended of Æneas or Silvius, or came hither by Oracle accompanied with Troians, yet I dare boldly say, that neere the time heereafter mentioned, there was one Brute, or Brito, King of this Realme, which left it to his posterity. And the impugners of this ancient History, must not with so light a breath as they doe, seem to blow away the authority of so many graue testimonies, the succession of so many Princes, the founders of so many monuments and Lawes, and the ancient honors of the nations, that first with publike authority receiued Christianity. The names of the learned men that affirme this History, or so many as are come to my knowledge, are these:

Gildas Sapiens cited by Cestrensis Ponticus, and others, Nennius before the Conquest.

Thomas Archbishop of Yorke, in the time of King William the Conqueror, cited by Foxe in his fourth Booke of Monuments, ex Chronico Sigeberti.

Henricus Huntingtonensis, stiled by Polidor, Egregius Historicus, specially in his booke, de origine Regum Britannorum, cited by Master Lambert.

Matthew Paris the Authour of a golden history, who saith of Galfridus Monmouthensis, that he did translate the British history into Latine.

Matheus Westmonasterienſis in floribus nameth Bryto, for Brutus, calling him the son of Ilicion, descended of Iauan, which pedigree is also found in Gildas, and the ancient British histories, as it may appeare by Sir John Price.

Giraldus Cambrensis, Ranulfus Cestrensis, Alfridus cited in Polichronicon, and Sir John Price, Fasciculus Temporum, Iohannes Anglicus, Houeden, Geruasius.

Galfridus Monmouthensis.

Simon Dunelmensis.

Petrus Langtoft, about the time of Edward the second, or Edward the third.

An ancient Chronicle in French verse, these three I saw in the study of Sir Robert Cotton a most diligent Antiquary.

Alanus ab Insulis in prophetias Merlini.

Virrumnius Pontius,

Sir John Price, in defensione Britannicæ Historiæ, John Leyland, John Capgraue.

Robert Kelway, in his reports of Law, Folio 191. speake of Mulmutius the British King.

Fabian, Grafton, Languet, Cooper.

And the most graue and iudicious master Lambert in his perambulation of Kent.

Against these so many, so ancient, so learned and iudicious Authours, who had more bookes to enforme them then wee haue, and tooke more paines to be informed both by forraigne, and domesticall monuments then wee can, are produced some fiue or six strangers, that either could not, or would not looke into British Antiquities, and not aboue one or two of our owne nation. Of these, the chiefe is Iohannes de Whethampsted, admitted to be an Englishman, yet not 200. yeeres agoe, who rather oppugneth the processe and circumstances of the narration, then the person of Brute, saying, that no such thing is found in the Romane Historics, nor any mention made of any such Brute. To him Sir John

Price, Master Lambert, and Doctor Powell, shortly answer, that an argument negatiue ab authoritate humana, is not good, & much worse it is to say, that it is incredible that Brute should kill his father, and so come hither; Therefore no such Brute was. For by such inferences, not onely our owne antiquities, but the Romane, and all other ancient Chronicles shall be reiected, seeing not one of them is free from such imputations. And againe, though many things be obiected against this Troian Pedigree, yet neyther he, nor any other obiecteth any thing against the Brytish Pedigree, set forth by Floriligus, Gildas, and other Brytish Authors: as Sir John Price affirmeth. The next therefore is William Petit, a Frenchman borne, as his name importeth, who most sharply inuayeth not against Brute, but against Galfridus Monmouthensis, calling him the forger of the British History: this man liued in the time when Wales not wholy subdued, stirred vp wars against the English, and therefore not only speaketh of ignorance, being a stranger, but of spleene, to disgrace the Brytaines. And himselfe hath some things not very credible, as the tale of the greene children caught in the sea, and such like. The last Polidore an Italian, though learned, yet with a vaine-glorious enuy, so aduance his owne Country, will not endure that any other Countrey shall haue monuments of antiquity. And whereas the rest onely except against Brute, this man with one dash of a pen, cashireth threescore Princes together, with all their histories and Historians, yea, and some ancient Lawes also: a iudgement so inconsiderate, as of it selfe deserueth a censure, besides the manifold grosse errours by euery man now discouered in the rest of his story. To these are added, Boccas, Viues, Iunius, Buchanan, Bodin, although learned, yet strangers, like Pedarij Senatores, to fill vp the number, and vnfit to be witnesses in this case, seeing it cannot be presumed they had any vnderstanding of the English tongue, and much lesse of the Welsh. Wherefore there is no reason, that such weak testimonies and arguments should remoue the setled and approued authority of our ancient Historics, whereof who desireth to be better informed, let him read Sir John Price, John Leland, Mr. Lambert, and other Authours, who haue defended it more copiously.

The race of the Kings of Brytaine after the common receiued opinion since

Brute, &c: and in the margent are placed the yeeres before Christ his birth, when euery King began their Raignes, till Cassibelanus, in whose time Christ the Sauiour of the World was borne, and then following, the yeeres from Christ his birth are placed.

Brute. Vrsidide.

BRVTE therefore, according to the common opinion, the Sonne of Siluius, the Sonne of Ascanius, the Sonne of Aeneas, after the death of his Father being banished into Greece, deliuered there the remnant of the Troianes from their long captiuity, wherein they were detained vnder the Grecians, with whom he departed thence for to seeke some habitation: and associating to himselfe Corineus with his Troians whom he found in the way, after a long and weary iourny, and many notable acts atchieued in Aquitain, he arriued in this Iland, which was called Albion, at a place now called Totnes in Deuonshire, the yeere of the world, 2855. the yeere before Christs nativity, 1108. wherein he first began to raigne, and named it Brytaine (as some write) or rather after his owne name Brutaine, as Aethicus that wonderfull Philosopher (a Scythian by race, but an Illirian by Country) translated by Saint Hierom aboue a thousand yeeres past, teacheth both it & the Iles adiacent Insulas Brytannicas. And for more proofe of this reckoned name, not onely the said Philosopher (who trauelled thorow many lands, and in this land taught the knowledge of mynerall works) may be alledged, but sundry other, as the Sibils Oracles, wherein the name of the Brytaines is written with y, that is the Greekes little u, which Oracles, although they were not the Sibils owne worke, as some suspect, yet are they very ancient indeede, and that they might seeme more ancient, vse the most ancient of Countries and peoples. And some English writers more then two hundred yeeres since, vsually doe name it Brutaine, and not otherwise, though a large Hystory of this Land, translated out of French, Brute builded the City of new Troy, now called London, hee stablished therein the Troian Lawes, and gaue the vttermost Westerne part of the Realme to his companion, Corineus, of whose name it was called Corinea, and to this day Cornewall. Iohn Harding saith that Brute bare Gules, two Lyons rampant endorsed Or. Also a Banner bert, a Diana of gold with hir crowned and inthronized, that were Aeneas armes, when he entred the land of Latins. Iohn Hanuille in Architrenio, and Nicolas Vpton, and other ove ancient Heralds say he bare Or, a Lyon passant, Gules, &c. Many are desirous (saith Aeneas Siluius) to know how the name of Heralds came first in vse, who first ordained them, and what office and authority they haue amongst men. Of the which thing I once stood in doubt my self: but as the nature of man is to desire knowledge of many things, and seeking to be satisfied therin, I found in the reuestry, or treasury of Saint Pauls Church in London (in anno. 1451.) an old Hystory written (as the title did specifie) 600. yeers before, which if it be true, it may both satisfie my desire, and others in the premisses: the Authour of the booke was Thucydides the Grecian, but the translatours name was not therein noted: but truly, it was right eloquently set forth in the Latine toung. The content of the words I do not now well remember, but the tenure of the sentence was well-neere in this sort, as I shall declare. Heralds be they, which our Elders were wont to call Heroes, that is to say, those which were greater, or surpassing all men in maiestie, yet inferiors to the gods. For, when the people of antiquity did perceiue to be notable, and surmounting all others in his acts, and feates, renowned in vertues, & friendly, or gracious vnto them, him would they magnifie and exalt in the highest degree, and as it were, with their good words, make them cousins to God almighty, placing them amongst the gods, if it so were, that they had wrought some miraculous feats aboue the comon course of nature. But if there were no such miraculous or wonderful deeds, but that through their vertues they seem wonderfull & honorable: then thought they to call such persons, not altogether gods, nor yet simply men, but inuented out a mean word and name for them, calling them Heroes, as it were halfe gods. And of this word Heroes, or Heros, groweth by corruption of vse this name Herald, albeit some say that those Heroes were old souldiers, that had spent all their age well-nar in the wars: out of the which sort the Heralds ought to be chosen, and so the terme Herald seemeth to be a Dutch word, and to sound as much as an old souldier, or man of warre. But the first that begunne and ordained this order, was Dionysius, the which was the first also that inuaded India with an armed power, and gathered the rude people there together, which liued in Woods and Desarts like wilde beasts, feeding on leaues, barks of trees, and raw flesh: teaching them to liue after a ciuill order and fashion: also to build Townes and Villages, to worship the gods, to till and plow the earth, to plant vineyards, & make wine, to weare apparell, to anoint & trim their bodies, & to be short, to liue after a humane maner. And now, following the comon opinio, after Geffrey Monmouth: Brute deuided the whole Iland among his 3. sons, which he had by Innogen his wife, Locrine, Camber, and Albanact. Vnto Locrine he gaue the middle part betweene Humber and Seuerne, which of him was called Loegria. To Camber, he gaue all the region beyond Seuern, which which of him tooke the name of Cambria, and is now called Wales. To Albanact he gaue all the Lands beyond Humber, which of his name was called Albania: after which partition hee deceased, when hee had raigned 24 yeeres, and was buried at new Troy.

1084. Gaufride. LOcrine, the eldest Sonne of Brute, raigned twenty yeeres: hee chased the Hunnes, which inuaded this Realme, and pursued them so sharply, that many of them with their King were drowned in a River which then parted England and Scotland. And for so much as the King of Hunnes, named Humber, was there drowned, the River is till this day named Humber. This King Locrine had to wife Guendoline, Daughter of Corineus, Duke of Cornwall, by whom he had a Sonne named Madan. He also kept as Paramour, the beautifull Lady Estrilde, by whom hee had a daughter named Sabrine. And after the death of Corineus, he put from him the said Guendoline, and wedded Estrilde: but Guendoline repaired to Cornwall, where shee gathered a great power, and fought with King Locrine, and slew him. Shee was buried at new Troy. She drowned the Lady Estrilde, with her daughter Sabrine in a River, that after the yong maidens name is called Seuerne.

GVendoline the daughter of Corineus, and wife to Locrine (for so much as Madan her sonne was too young to gouerne the Land) was by common assent of all the Brytaines, made ruler of the whole Ile of Brytaine: which shee well and discretly ruled, to the comfort of her subiects 15 yeeres, and then left the same to her Sonne Madan.

1049. The King deuoured by wolues.

MAdan, the Sonne of Locrine, and Guendoline, was made ruler of Brytaine: he lyued great ty: amongst the Brytaines: and being at his disport of hunting, hee was deuoured by wild Wolues, when he had raigned 40 yeers. He left two Sonnes, named Mempricius and Maulius.

1009. A traitor to his brother, deuoured of wilde beasts.

MEmpricius, the Sonne of Madan, being King, by treason slew his brother Manlius, after whose death, hee lyued in more tranquility, where through hee fell in sloth, and so to lechery, taking the wiues and daughters of his subiects: and lastly, became so euill, that hee forsoke his wife and concubines, and fell to the sinne of Sodomy with beasts, whereby he became odible to God and man. And going on hunting, he lost his company, and was deuoured of wilde Wolues, whereof the Land was then full, when he had raigned 20 yeeres.

989. Gaufride. Flores Historiar.

EBranke, the sonne of Mempricius, was made ruler of Brytaine, he had 21 wiues, of whom he received 20 sonnes, and 30 daughters, which were sent by their father to Alba Siluius, the 4th King of Albanois in Italy, to be married to the Albanes. This Ebrank first after Brutus attempted to inuade France with an Army, as Iacobus Bergomas sayeth in his first of his Chronicles, and Iacobus Lessabeus in the description of Henalt affirmeth the same, and that he was driuen backe by Brunchildis, Lord of Henalt, with no small losse of his men. Assaracus the second Sonne of Ebranke, with the rest of his young brethren 18 at the least by the ayde of Alba Siluius, conquered all Germany, which was then no great matter, for then Europe was very smally inhabited, saue onely about the seacoasts, as Dalmatia, Italy, and the coasts of France, as in the reading the hystories may easily be seene, how the East people at sundry times, came swarming into Europe. Of these brethren had Germany the name, a Germanis fratribus, that had subdued it. Ebranke was a founder of many Cities (saith Bergomas) as Alleuid in Albania (now Scotland) which is after Hector Boetius, Dunbytaine, but other think the same to be cleane destroyed. He made the Castle of Maidens, called Edenbrough. He made also the Castle of Bamburgh. In the 20 yeere of his raigne, he builded Kayrbrauke, since by the Saxons called Eurowicke, now corruptly Yorke, wherein hee builded a Temple to Diana, and set there an Archdiamine, and was there buried, when he had raigned 40 yeeres.

Germany took the name of Ebranke his sonnes, who conquered the same. Bergomas Hector Boetius. Dunbytain. Edenbrough Bamburgh, and Yorke builded.

John Rouse saith, he builded Caer Pennin, after it was called Bellestitum, at length Caer Bossa Rhydohen, and Orenford, of a certaine Ford, which John Leiland calleth Ifs, in English Vse. and saith it is now called Orefordfor Vuleford.

929. BRutus 2 the eldest Sonne of Ebranke, succeeded in the Kingdome, and for that his father had received such a repulse at the hands of Brunchildis, Lord of Henalt, hee in reuenge thereof, inuaded Henalt with a great army in the Fennes and Marshland, at the mouth of the Riuer Scaldis (of old time named Stadon) and encamped himselfe vpon the Riuer Hania, where betweene Brutus and Brunchildis, was foughten a strong battell in that place, which to this day is called Estam-binges, of the station and campe of Brutus, as Iacobus Lessabeus writeth in his description of Henalt. This Brute, of his lusty courage, was surnamed Greeneshield, he raigned 12 yeeres, and was buried at Yorke.

Iacobus Les. sabeus.

917. LEill the sonne of Brute Greeneshield, being a louer of peace, builded Carleile, and repaired Carleon, which was since by the Romanes redified, when a Legion of souldiers was sent thither, and by them named, The City of Legions, now called Chester, of the ancient building with vaults and Towers, each house like a Castle, which sometime had beene of great pleasance. A Legion of the Romanes (as Vigetius reporteth) contained 6000 warriours or more: which Legion was diuided into ten bands, but the first passed all the rest, both in number of souldiours, and also in estimation: for this band bare the Eagle, which was the chiefest standard of the Romanes. This first band contained 1105 footemen, heauy armed horsemen 132, and was named Cohors Militaria, that is to say, a company of a thousand and more souldiours. This band is the head of all the Legion: whensoeuer they must fight, these begunne the battell, and are first set in order in the Front of the battell. The second band containeth 555 footmen, and 66 horsemen of heauy armour, and this

The fourth band hath 555 footemen, and 66 horsemen. The fifth band hath as many. These fiue bands are set in array in the first battell. The first band hath 555 footemen, and 66 horsemen. The seuenth band hath 555 footemen, 66 horsemen. The eight band hath 555 footemen, 66 horsemen. The ninth band hath 555 footemen, 66 horsemen. The tenth hath 555 footemen, 66 horsemen. These ten bands make a full and perfect legion, containing 6100 footemen, and 726 horsemen. King Leill in the end of his raigne, fell to sloth, and lust of the body, by meanes whereof, ciuill strife was raised, and not in his daies ended. He raigned 25 yeers, and was buried at Carleile alias Chester.

Canterbury, Winchester, and Shaftesbury built.

RVdhudibras, alias Ciculer, the Sonne of Leil, builded Caergant, of the Englishmen called Canterbury, (that is to say, the Court of the Kentishmen) Caiergueint, now Winchester, and Caerlepton, now called Shaftesbury, wherein hee builded three Temples, and placed in the same Flammes. He raigned 29 yeers.

863. Stamford an Vniuersity.

BLadud the Sonne of Rudhudibras, who had long studied at Athens, brought with him foure Philosophers to keep Schoole in Britain: for the which, hee builded Stamford, and made it an Vniuersity, wherein he had great number of Schollers studying in all the seuen liberall Sciences: which Vniuersity, dured to the coming of Saint Augustine, at which time the B. of Rome interdited it for heresies that fell among the Sarons and Brytains together mixt, so lastly Harding. He builded Caier, Badon, or Bath, and made there a Temple to Apollo, and placed there a Flamine: hee made also the hot Baths, and practised his Necromancy: he decked himselfe in feathers, and presumed to fly, but by falling on his Temple, he brake his necke, when he had raigned 20 yeeres.

LEir Sonne of Bladud succeded his father. Hee builded Caier Leir vpon the River of Soze, now called Leicester, and made there a Temple of Ianus, placing a Flamine to gouerne the same. He had three daughters, Gonorill, Regan and Cordeilla, which Cordeilla, for her vertue and wisedome towards her father, succeeded him in the Kingdome. When he had raigned 50 yeeres, he deceased, and was buried vnder the channell of the River Soze, within Leicester. This vault vnder the earth was built in honor of Ianus Biirons. There all the workmen of that City, when the solemnity of the day came, begunne all things that they had to doe the yeere following.

800. MOrgan, the eldest Sonne of Dame Gonorilla, claimed Britaine, and warred on his nephew Cunedagius, that was King of Camber (that now is Wales) and of Cornwall, but Cunedagius met with Morgan in Wales, and there slew him: which place is called Glamorgan till this day. And then Cunedagius was King of all Brytaine. He builded a Temple of Mars at Perth, that now is S. Hee raigned 33 yeeres, and was buried at new Troy.

RIuallus, Sonne of Cunedagius, succeded his father, in whose time it rained blood three daies: after which tempest, ensued a great multitude of venemous flies, which slew much people, and then a great mortality throughout this Land, caused almost desolation of the same. This Riuallus raigned ouer this whole Land, 46 yeeres, and then deceased, and was buried at Caerbranke that now is Yozke. SIcilius, brother of Gurgustius, succeded in the kingdome: of whom is left but little memozie: he raigned 49. yeres, and was buried at Bathe. 684.

These Lawes holy Gildas wrote out of the Brittish speech into Latine. He gaue priuiledges vnto Temples, and ploughs, and begunne to make the foure notable wales in Brytaine. Hee raigned forty yeeres, leauing after him two sonnes, Belinus, and Brennus. 401.

BElinus and Brennus, Sonnes of Mulmutius Band Cornoenina, diuided the whole Ile of Baptaine betweene them. Vnto Beline the elder brother was appointed England, Wales, and Cornwall. Vnto the other, the North part beyond Humber. This Brennus, a young man, desirous of glozy and dominion, raised warre against Belire. But in the conclusion, by the weanes of their mother, they were accozded, and Brennus being wholly giuen to the study of warres, left his Countrey to the gouernance of his brother, and went into France amongst the Galles, where for his excellent qualities, hee was greatly esteemed, and made of them their Soueraigne Captaine, with whom hee passed into Italy, sacked Rome, and expelling the Tuscanes, builded Millaine, Bzescia, Como, Bergamo, Vincenza, Trent, and Verona, which he called after his owne name, Brenona. After this (as writeth Trogus Pompeius abzidged by Iustine) Brennus, leader of the Galles, (he named him not a Baptaine) raised an host of 15000 footemen, and 15000 horsemen, and inuaded Macedon againe. Whome when Sosthenes saw how they wasted the Countrey and Villages, he met them with his host of Macedons, well appointed. But by reason they were few, and their enemies many, they were soone put to the worse. Wherefore, while the Macedons being beaten, kept them within the walls of their Cities, Brennus like a Conqueroz, against whom, no man durst shew his head to make resistance, spoiled all the Ile of Macedon. And from thence, as though those battles and spoyles seemed to base and simple in his eye, he turned his minde to the Temples of the gods, scozning that the gods were rich, and ought to depart liberally to men. Therefore hee take his iourney towards Delphos, setting more by the gaine of the Gold that had beene offered to the gods, then by their displeasure. Iustinus Historicus. Lib. Leland. Comment.

The Temple of Apollo at Delphos, is situate in the mount Pernassus, vpon a cliffe on euery side falling steepe downe. There the confluence of men hath made a populous Citty. Moreouer both the Temple and the Towne are enclosed with the steepnesse of the rocke. The middle part of the rocke inward, is in fashion like a Theatre, by meanes whereof when men make any shouting, or any trumpet is sounded, the same breaketh and redoubleth in such wise vpon the stones front one to another, that the Eccho is heard double and triple, the noise resounding farre lowder then it went forth. The which causeth the ignozant to stand in more feare, thinking it to be the presence of the Godhead. In the winding of the rocke, almost midway to the toppe of the hill, there is a little plaine, and in the same, a deepe hole pight to the ground, which (except to giue oracles) out of the which, a certaine cold breath ascending vpward, stirreth the mindes of the Prophets into a madnesse, and so compelleth them to giue answer to such as come for counsell. In the same place therefore, there are to be seene many and rich gifts of kings and peoples. Wherefore, when Brennus came within the view of the Temple, hee was in doubt a great while, whether hee were better to attempt the matter forthwith, or giue his souldiours that nights respite to rest them. Euridanus and Thessalonus, who for couetousnesse of the pray, had ioyned themselues with him, willed to cut off all delay, while their enemies were vnprouided, whereas by giuing them that nights respite, their enemies thereby perchance, get both courage and succour: but the common souldiours of the French men, when after long penury, they found a Country replenished with wine, and all other kinde of victualls, they dispersed themselues in the fields, making hauocke of all things like Conquerours, by which meanes, the Delphians had respite to lay for themselues, and wanned the Towne by the helpe of their neighbours, or euer the French men could bee called from the Winesat to the standard. Brennus had therefore and fiue thousand chosen footemen of the best in all his host, whereas the Delphians were in all but 40000 fighting men. In disdaine of which small handfull, Brennus to the intent to sharpen the mindes of his men, shewed them all what a rich and plentifull pray they should haue. The Frenchmen beeing by this botching of their Captaine, or rather by their olune beholding, stirred vp, and also wounded with the wine they had powred in the day before, without respect of any danger, ranne headlong to the encounter. On the contrary part, the Delphians putting more trust in God, then in their olune strength, resisted their enemies, and what with stones, and what with their weapons, threw the Frenchmen (as they scaled) headlong from the top of the mountaine. While the two parts were thus striuing one with another, suddenly the priests of all the Temples, and the Prophets with their hayre about their eares, &c. like men distraut and out of their wits, came running into the forefront of the battell, crying out, that while they were all making their supplications to God for aide, they met a young man of beauty and personage, farre excelling any mortall creature, and by his company two Virgins in armour, wherefore they beleeued them, seeing the Gods did guard their standard, they should not strike to dispatch their enemies. And there withall the two things hapned, that God was present on their side. For both a piece of the mountaine being broken off, by a sodden earthquake, ouerwhelmed the French host, and the thicket of their enemies (not without great slaughter) were opened and put to flight. In the necke whereof, there ensued a tempest with haile, thunder, and lightning, consuming as many as were any thing sore wounded. The Captaine Brennus himselfe, not being able to abide the smart of his wounds, tooke a sword and killed himselfe. Thus farre abridged out of Iustine.

Beline in the meane time (saith Gaufride) both in ciuill iustice, and also Religion, greatly increased his Realme. He made three Archflammes, whose Seas were at new Troy, Kayebzanke, and Lavelegion. Hee finished the foure great wayes, begunne by his father: he subdued and made tributary vnto him, Denmarke. In new Troy, hee made the hauen, which at this day retaineth the name of him, called Belines gate: He married his daughter Cambria, vnto a Prince of Almaine called Antenor, of whom these people were calle Cymbri, and Sycambri.

Finally, after hee had raigned with his brother, and alone 26 yeeres, hee dyed: and after the Pagan manner, with great pompe was buried, and his ashes in a vessell of brasse set on a high pinacle ouer Belines gate. He builded Caerheon vpon the River Vske, which since, by a legion of the Romanes there placed, was named Caerlegion, now cleane destroyed.

375. GVrguntius, Sonne of Beline, succeeded his father. I. Rouse saith, hee builded Caerwerith, that is, Longcastra: he subdued Denmarke, compelling them to continue their tribute, and in his returne home, met with a fleete of Bafonefes, comming from the parts of Spain, which were lacking for habitations, because their Country was so populous, and not able to sustaine them, to whom the King granted the Ile of Ireland to inhabit, and to hold the same of him as their Soueraigne Lord: But the Scots write, that Spaniards arriued before this time in Ireland. This Gurguntius builded Porchester and Warwicke in the middle of the Realme (saith I. Rouse.) He raigned 29 yeres, and was buried at Caerlheon.

356. GVinthelinus, Sonne of Gurguntius, was crowned King of Brytaine. A Prince sober and quiet, who had to wife a noble woman, named Mercia, of excellent learning and knowledge. She deuised certaine Lawes, which long time among the Brytaines were greatly esteemed, and named Mercian Lawes. This Prince raigned 26 yeres, and was buried at new Troy.

Mercian Lawes the third.

359. CEcilius the Sonne of Guincheline and Mercia, raigned 7 yeeres, (as the Scots write.) In the first yeere of his raigne, a people called Picts, arriued here in Brytaine, and possessed those parts, which now be the Marches of both Realmes, England and Scotland. Cecilius was buried at Caerligeon.

The Picts first arriue-ed in the North parts.

373. KImarus succeeded Cecilius, who being a wilde young man, and liuing after his owne lust, raigned but 3 yeeres, and was slaine as he was hunting of wild beasts.

ELanius, called also Danius, was King of Brytaine 9 yeeres. 376.

MOrindus the bastard Sonne of Danius, began to raigne in Brytaine: he fought with a King who came out of Germany, and slew him with all his power. Moreouer, out of the Irish Seas in his time, came forth a wonderfull Monster, which destroyed much people: whereof the King hearing, would of his valiant courage needes fight with it, by whom he was cleane deuoured, when he had raigned 8 yeeres. 385. Gaufride. Ж

GOrbomanous, eldest Sonne of Morindus, raigned 11 yeeres: a Prince iust and religious: he reuiued the Temples of his gods, and gouerned his people in peace and wealth. This Gorbomannus builded Grantham in Lincolnshire. Our English Chronicle saith, he builded both the Towns of Cambridge and Grantham: but seeing that Cambridge in ancient Chronicles is called Gant (as it is also Grantchester, Caiergrant, and Gantbridge) it was an easie matter (as Grammarians know) to translate Grantham into Cambridge, and so ascribe the building of both Townes to him that builded but one, or neither of them both. 393. Caxton. Grantham builded. I. Rouse.

ARchigallo, brother to Gorbomannus, was crowned King of Brytaine: he was in conditions vnlike to his brother: for he deposed the noblemen, and exalted the vnnoble. He extorted from men their goods to enrich his treasury: for which cause by the estates of the Realme, he was deprived of his royall dignity, when he had raigned 5 yeeres. 402. The King deprined.

ELidurus, the third Sonne of Morindus, and brother to Archigallo, was elected King of Brytaine, a vertuous and gentle Prince, who gouerned his people iustly: as he was hunting in a Forrest, by chance hee met with his brother Archigallo, whom most louingly hee embraced, and found the meanes to reconcile him to his Lords, and then resigned to him his royall dignity when he had raigned 5 yeeres. 286.

ARchigallo this restored to his royal estate, ruled the people quietly and iustly 10 yeers, and was buried at Yorke. 282.

ELidurus aforenamed, after the death of his brother Archigallo, for his piety and iustice, by the generall consent of the Brytains, was againe chosen King. But he raigned not passing 2 yeres, for his younger brethren, Vigenius and Peredurus raised warre against him, tooke him prisoner, and cast him in prison, where he remained during their raigne. 272.

VIgenius and Peredurus, after the taking of their brother, raigned together 7 yeeres. 270.

Vigenius then dyed, and Peredurus raigned after alone, 2 yeeres. He builded the Towne of Pithering, in the North parts of Yorkeshire. The Towne of Pitherington built. Caxton. I. Rouse.

ELidurus the third time was made King, who continued his latter raigne honourably and iustly: but being sore vexed with age and troubles, hee finished his life, when he had now lastly raigned in Brytaine 4 yeeres. 261.

Gorbonian raigned in Brytaine 10 yeeres. 258.

Morgan guided the Realme peaceably 14 yeers. 248.

Emerianus

EMerianus his brother, when hee had tyrannously raigned seuen yeeres, was deposed. 234.

IVal was chosen King for his iustice and temperance, which gouerned peaceably twenty yeres. 222.

Rimo gouerned this Realme fifteene yeeres, his time was peaceable. 207.

Gerumcius raigned in Britaine twenty yeeres. 192.

CArellus raigned peaceably ten yeeres, hee chang by all oppressors of the poore, to giue example vnto other. 172. A good example.

Coilus succeeded Carellus, who quietly raigned twenty yeeres. 161.

Porrex, a bertuous and gentle Prince, raigned fiue yeres. 142.

Chirimus, through his drunkennesse, raigned but one yeere. 136.

Fulgen, his son raigned two yeres in Brytain. 135.

Eldred raigned in Brytaine but one yere. 133.

Androgius likewise raigned but one yeere. 132.

VRianus, the sonne of Androgius, wholy gaue himselfe to the lusts of the flesh, and raigned three yeeres. 131.

Elind raigned fiue yeeres, who was a great Astronomer. 126.

Dedantius King of Britains raigned 5 yeers. 124.

Detonus raigned in this Land two yeres. 120.

Gurgineus raigned three yeeres in Brytaine. 118.

Merianus was King of Brytaine two yeeres. 115.

Bladanus gouerned this Land of Brytaine two yeeres. 113.

Capenus raigned King of Britaine three yeres. 111.

Quinus ruled this Land of Britain two yeers. 108.

Silius raigned in this land of Brytaine 2 yeres. 106.

Bledgabredus raigned ten yeres, and gaue himselfe to the study of musicke. 104.

Archemalus was King of Britaine two yeres. 94.

EIdolus raigned foure yeeres. In his time diuers prodigies were seene, as Globes of fire, burning out of the ayre with great noyse, &c. 91. Prodigious signes.

Rodianus was King of Brytaine two yeeres. 88.

Redargius raigned King of Brytaine 3 yeeres. 86.

Samulius raigned King of Brytaine 2 yeeres. 83.

Penifellus was King of Brytaine three yeres. 81.

Pyrrhus ruled this Land of Brytaine 2 yeeres. 78.

Caporus was King of Brytaine two yeeres. 76.

DInellus the Sonne of Caporus, a iust and bertuous Prince, gouerned this Realme foure yeeres. 74.

HElius his sonne raigned not fully one yere. Of this Prince the Ile of Oly tooke the name, saith Geffrey. 70.

Vd the eldest sonne of Hely, succeeded his father: hee amended his Lawes, and tooke away all blages that were naught: moreouer, hee repained the Citty of new Troy with faire buildings and walls: and builded on the West part thereof, a strong gate, which vnto this time retaineth the name of him, and is called Ludgate. Finally, hee dyed, leauing after him two sonnes, Androgius, & Auarous, and Theomantius: who not being of the age to gouerne, their vncle Cassibelane obtained the Crowne. London tooke the name of Lud, and was called Ludstone, as saith Geffrey. 66. Lud repaired and fortified London. Flores Historiarum. Ludstone, or London took the name of King Lud.

CAssibelanus, the son of Hely, after the death of his brother Lud, was made gouernour of Brytaine, which ruled 19 yeeres. In the 8 yeere of his raigne, Iulius Cæsar comming vnto that part where Calcis and Bolougne now stand, determined to make warre into Brytaine, which vntill that time remained vnfrequented and vnknowne of the Romans. His quarrell was, because that in the warres of France, he perceiued the Frenchmen to haue much succour and ayde from thence: And because hee could not vnderstand, nor learne the greatnesse & state of the Iland, neyther what Nations they were which inhabited the same, nor what Lawes, Customes, or kinde of gouernment they vsed, nor yet what Hauens they had able to receiue any number of shippes, hee sent Caius Volusenus before with a galley to discouer as much as hee could, concerning those matters, who within fiue dayes after returned to Cæsar, declaring such things as he had learned by coasting alongst the shore, for he durst not for feare of the Brytaines stirre out of his galley. In the meane space there came Embassadours from many Citties of the Ile, and deliuered him Hostages, with whom he sent Comius of Arras, charging him to exhort and perswade the rest of the Citties and Countries to doe the like. And hee himselfe shortly after hauing prepared 80 shippes, sailed into Brytaine, where at the first being wearyed with an hard and sharpe battell, and after with sudden tempest, his Nauy almost destroyed, hee returned againe into France there to winter his men. 58. Iulius Cæsar for his first voyage into England. Eutropius. Cæsars Commentaries.

The next Spring (which was the yeere before Christ 51) his Nauy being new rigged and encreased, hee passed the seas againe with a greater army: but whiles hee went towards his enemies on the Land, his shippes lying at anchour, were driuen on the sands, where they stacke fast: or else through beating one against another, with force of the tempest, they were destroyed, so that fourty were lost, the other with much labor were saued. In the meane space, Scæua one of Cæsars Souldiours, with foure others, who before in a small bessell were conueyed to a Rocke neere the Ile, and by ebbing of the Ocean being forsaken, a great number of Brytaines fell on a few Romans, and some of his companions (though but few) found meanes to returne by boate, but Scæua remained without feare in the middest of his enemies darts: first with his speare he resisted them, after with his sword hee alone fought against many of them, and when hee was both weary and wounded, and had lost his helmet and shield, with two light harnesses, hee ran to Cæsars tents, and asked pardon of the Emperour for his ouerboldnesse, who not onely forgaue him, but honoured him with the office of a Centurion. Vpon Land Cæsars horsemen at the first encounter were vanquished, and Laberius Durus the Tribune slaine in a place now called Eutropius. Two voiages of Cæsar.

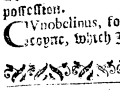
Cæsars Commentaries, touching the Brytaines barbarousnesse of Brytaines.

Chester was, here vnto Rochester, as saith the Chronicle of Wigmore. At the second conflict, not without great danger of his men, he put the Brytaines to flight: from thence he went to the River Thamis, on the further side whereof, Cassibelanus with a great multitude of people was keeping the bankes, who had set all the said bankes, and all the shallow places vnder the water, with sharpe stakes, euery one of them as bigge as a mans thygh, bound about with Lead, and driuen so fast into the bottome of the River, that they can neuer be remooued, (so saith Bede and Aller) who affirme that in their times, the said stakes were easily perceiued to remaine as afore said. But Cassibelanus and his Brytaines, not being able to resist the violence & force of the Romans, hid themselues in woods, and with a sudden eruptions often times manded them: but in the meane time, the Trinobants, which is the strongest City welneere of all those Countries, submitted it selfe, and deliuered Hostages to Cæsar, who at their request, placed Mandubratius to be their gouernour, whose father called Imanentius, being chiefe Lord & Ruler of the Trinobants, Cassibelane had before slaine, where with Mandubratius fled, and comming to Cæsar, not only submitted himselfe, but also was a great meanes (as many doe write) for Cæsar to subdue the rest: yet did Cassibelane send messengers to the foure Kings that ruled in the quarters of Kent, that with all their puissance, they should set on the Romanes that lay next them: their names were Cingetorex, Carullius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, who obeying his request were discomfited, & Cingetorex taken, whervvithall Cassibelane being dismaied after many losses, was constrained to giue pledges and to agree that Brytaine should become tributary to the Romans, as Cæsar for himselfe affirmeth: but Horace and Propertius long after called Brytaine vntouched, to which agree Lucan, Paterculus, and Seneca, with others. This action of Cæsar was in the yeere of the world, 3951. after the building of Rome 698. before Christ birth, 53. Then Cæsar like a Conqueror, with a great number of paiseners sailed into France, and so to Rome, where after his returne out of Brytaine, hee consecrated to Venus a sureote of Brytaine pearles the desire whereof partly moued him to inuade this Country: shortly after, hee was by the Senate slaine in the Councell house.

Cæsar in his Commentaries, describeth the Brytaines thus. The inner part (saith hee) is inhabited of such, as by tvitnesse of their ancient Records were borne and bred in the Ile, and the Sea coast, by such as haue passed thither out of Belgike to fetch booties, and to make warre. All the vvhich vvinners are called by the names of the Cities, vvhere they were borne, and from vvhence they first came, remaining there still vvhen the vvarre was done, and tilling the ground. The country is marueilously well replenished vvith people, and there be very many buildings, almost like in fashion to the building of Gallia. There is great Rore of Cattell. The Coyne they vse, is eyther of brasse, or else rings of yron, sized at a certaine vvaight, in stead of money. In the inner parts of the Realme groweth Tin: and in the Sea coast groweth yron, but hereof is small store. The brasse that they occupy is brought in, from beyond the Sea. There is timber of all kinds, as in Gallia, sauing Beech and Firre. They thinke it a hainous matter to taste of a Hare, a Henne, or a Gose: nevertheless, they cherish them for their pleasure. The ayre is vvoxe temperate in those places, then in France, and the cold lesser. Of all the Inhabitants of this Ile, the ciuillest are the Kentish folke, the which Country marcheth altogether vpon the Sea, and differeth not greatly from the manner of France. Those that dvvell more into the heart of the Realme, for the most part sow no corne, but liue by milke and flesh, and cloath themselues in Leather. All the Brytaines doe die themselues vvith vvoad, vvhich fetteth a blevvish colour vpon them, and it maketh them vvoxe terrible to behold in battell. They vveare their hayre long, and shaue all parts of their bodies, sauing the head, and the vpper lippe. They haue ten or twelue vvives apiece, common among themselues, specially brethers vvith brothers, and parents vvith their children, but the issue that commeth of them, is accounted his that first marrieth the mother vvhen she vvas a mayde, &c.

THeomantius the sonne of Lud, and nephevv to Cassibelane, succeaded in the Realme of Brytaine, and raigned quietly 23 yeeres, paying the tribute to the Romans vvhich Cassibelane had granted. 37.

OCtauius Augustus desiring to be like Iulius Cæsar his father (for so he alvvaies termed him) prepared an expedition into Brytaine, but being come forvvard into France, vnderstanding that the Pannonians lately subdued, rebelled, he turned his power against them, and altred his mind, as touching our Countrey. 34. Dion Cassius lib. 49.



The fourth yeere after, he opened the Temple of Ianus at Rome, fully determining to inuade Brytaine, but vvhen he had marched on his vvay, as far as Ariminum, Ambassadors of Brytaine met him, humbly suing for peace and submitting themselues vnto his obedience and protection. Whereupon he staied againe to settle some troubles then raised in France. 25. Dion. 53. Goloxius.

The yeere following, because the covenants betweene him and the Brytaines could not be agreed vpon, he made promision for a third expedition into this Ile, but an actuall rebellion in Biscay and Sauoy withheld him then also. But shortly after, Ambassadors came from Brytaine to Rome, entreating for peace, svvearing fealty in the Temple of Mars, offering gifts in the Capitell to the gods of the Romanes: and submitted part of the Ile vnto Augustus. Now the Brytaines began first to pay tolls and tribute without grudging, for all vvares which they traded, which were for that time, Iuory bores, tongues, owches, & other trinkets of Amber and Glasse. And all here were so quiet, that 24. Strabo. lib.

one band of Souldiours and a few horsemen, were sufficient to keepe the Ile in the Romane possession.

CVnobelinus, for so is the inscription of his Coyne, vvhich I haue seene, and read, and therefore corruptly called Kimbeline, the sonne of Theomantius, raigned King in Brytaine thirty and fiue yeeres. In the 14th yeere of his raigne, Christ our Saviour was borne in Bethlehem of Iudea. Clau.

HEere, right Christian, and friendly Reader, for thy better vnderstanding of ancient Histories in generall, I haue thought good to insert these Histories following, which I haue painfully and carefully abstracted out of many graue and authentique Authours, which I haue cited at the end of euery seuerall History. I pray thee to accept them as kindly as I offer them freely, which if thou doe, and indifferently obserue may giue thee good knowledge of the time and chiefe persons from the vniuersall deluge, with the inuention and originall of many excellent and memorable matters vnto the time.

NOah, the beloued of almighty God, of whom the holy Scripture speaketh at large, entred into the Arke with his wife, his three sons and their wiues with paires of all manner of beasts, cattell and feathered fowle, in the yeere of the world 1656. and before the comming of our Saviour Iesus 2306. Noah.

SEm the son of Noah had 5 sonnes, viz. Aelam from whom are descended the Aelamites, who were chiefe amongst the Persians, the second was Assur, of whom came the Assyrians, his third son was Arphaxad, from whom issued the Arpharades, which were afterward called Caldeans, the fourth was called Lud, of whom the Lidyans take their name, the fift was Aram who gaue the name of the Aramites, whom the Gréekes call Syrians: Read Gen. 10. 11. chap. the first booke of Paralip. and Iosephus first booke. CHam, the Sonne of Noah, who for his contempt, and neglect of reuerence vnto his Father in his drunkennesse, became accursed. He had 4 Sonnes, viz. Chus, of whom are descended the Aethiopians, whom he called Chusseans: the second was Mesraym, from whom are descended the Pethreans, otherwise called the Egyptians. Melrim in Hebrew signifieth Egypt: the third was Phut, of whom are descended the Libians, whom he calleth after his owne name Phuteans: the fourth was Chana, from whom are descended the Chananites. Cham.

IAphet the Sonne of Noah, had seuen Sonnes, viz. Gomer, from whom are issued the Gomerites, who are since by the Gréekes called Galates: the second was Magog, from whom the Magogs tooke their beginning, whome the Gréeks called Scithians: the third was Maday, of whom came the Medes: the fourth was Iauan of whom were descended the Ionians in Grece: the fifth was Tubal, he peopled those Regions anciently called Iberyes, now called Spaniards: the first was Mosoch, from whom came the Molchins, which shortly after were called Cappadocians, the last was Thiras, who called those at his owne race Direntians, from whom the Gréekes derive the name of Thracians: Read those Authours before named. SAle was the sonne of Arphaxad aforenamed: at 30 yéeres of age he begat Heber, and after that hee lined 403 yeeres, in which time he had diuers sonnes and daughters. From this Sale, are descended the Germanes, which came into Europe into Germany, neere Polonia, and another part of them went into Tartaria which is in Asia Maior. Sale.

HEber the sonne of Sale, at 34 yéeres of age begat Phaleg in the yeere of the world 1758. and before Christ, 2204. and after that, he lined 430 yeers, and from him are the Iews descended, and were called Hebrewes, after his name. And at the diuision or confusion of languages, the Hebrew tongue remained onely in his house. In his time, the Hebrew speech was called the humane, or mans speech, because all men spake the same. Heber had another sonne called Iecton, of whom Moses maketh mention. Heber.

PHaleg the son of Heber, at 30 yéeres of age, begat Reu in the yeere of the worlds creation 1788. and lived after that, 239. yéeres, his name by interpretation, signifieth diuision, for in his time, the earth was diuided into kingdomes and prouinces, viz. the kingdome of Scithia, &c. NEmrod Saturnus, the sonne of Chus, which was the sonne of Cham, sonne to Noah, he became mighty vpon the earth. He builded Babylon, Arach, Achad, and Chalanna, in the Land of Sennaar, about the yeere of the world 1788. and before the nativity of Iesus Christ, 2174. In his time was the confusion of tongues, at the building of the Tower of Babel, as Iosephus saith, alledging those words of one of the Sibels, vvl ilst all men spake one only Language in all places, some of them builded a very lofty and strong Tower, as if by that meanes, they ment to aspire the heauens, but the gods sent mighty windes and ouerthrew it, and gaue proper Languages vnto euery man, and was therefore called Babylon, which is to say, confusion: read Ge. 10. 11. Iosephus his 1 booke, Paulus, Constantine, Phrygion, and the Chronicle of Fuscius. Hee raigned 56 yeers: his son Belus Iupiter raigned after him 62 yeers, he enlarged the foundations of Babylon, he raigned in peace vntill towards the end of his raigne. About this time, Comerus Gallus taught the Italians to build Cities after the Scithian fashion from whence he came. Nemrod Saturnus. Belus Iupiter. Comerus Gallus.

REu 63 Rhagau, ſonne to Phaleg, at 32 yeres of age, begat Sarug in the yere of the world 1820. and before Chriſt, 2142. and lived after that 207 yeres, and begat other ſons and daughters. In this time, diuers Princes were worſhipped of their Subiects. Hee builded many Temples, alſo foure kingdomes tooke their beginning: the firſt was the kingdome of Scithians, whereof ſomething is already ſpoken. Their King was called Tanais, from whom the River Tanais taketh the name: the ſecond was the kingdome of the Amazones, which were deſcended of the Scithians, and inhabited nere Tanais, and from thence, nere the River Termodone, and by that meanes, it hath been called Amazonius: the third was the kingdome of Egypt, the firſt that reigned there in, was called Sores, or as ſome write, Vexores: the fourth was the kingdome of Bohemia, which take that name of a Prince called Boemus, touching which kingdomes: Read Iuſtin. Ninus the firſt that taught Idolatry.

NInus the ſon of Belus, was the 3 King of Babylon, he ſet up his fathers Image, and proclaimed free pardon vnto all offenders, if they would fall down and worſhip it, which they did, and after that, many ſimple honeſt people in plaine deuotion did the like. This Ninus was the firſt that began this groſſe Idolatry: he began to raigne in the yere of the world 1906. and before Chriſt, 2056. hee builded the great City Niniue, and was ſlaine by the hand of Arioch. Niniue was afterward deſtroyd by Cyrus, King of Aſſyria. By his ill president, other Princes ſet up their fathers Images, and cauſed people to commit Idolatry vnto them, and the Diuell in his willingnes to procure man vnto wickednes, would oftentimes giue anſwer by thoſe Idols, and thereof came the name of Bel, Baal, Bel-phegor, and Belzebub: Read S. Zoroaſtes, ZOroaſtes, as ſome think, was the ſecond ſon of Noah, called Cham, he was the 1 King of the Bactrians, he was very ingenious, hee was the firſt that taught the Arte of Magicke, hee found out the Arts of the ſeuen liberall Sciences, he taught the courſe of heauen, and the rule of the Starres: ſome Philoſophographers write, that he was borne laughing, which is contrary to nature: he was ouercome in battell by Ninus: Read the foreſaid Authors.

Tuyſcon, alias Alcenas.

TUyſcon, whom the Prophet Moſes ſurnamed Alcenas, was the ſon of Gomer: from him are deſcended the Cymbrians, which left Italy, and dwelt on the North ſide of Germany towards that country which is now called Denmarke, nere Norway and Gotland. The Germanes which dwelt nere Polland were put amongſt the Germans, and deſcended of Tuyſcon, who taught them the knowledge of letters: he eſtabliſhed Lawes and Ordinances, and by him began the kingdome of Germany in the yeere of the world, 1509. and before Chriſt 2053. and when he had raigned 150 yeeres, he was numbred among the gods: Read Berоſus.

Samotes, otherwiſe called Dis, was the firſt King of the Gaules, about the time aforeſaid, ſo writes Berоſus in his 5 booke of antiquities, and Cæſar mentioneth the ſame in his 6 booke of his Commentaries. All the Gaules barnt themſelues to be deſcended from Dis: he was a very excellent, wiſe, and learned Prince, and verypprudent, and was therefore called Samotes. Alſo the Græckes haue beene called Samotes, becauſe by him they were reduced into a kingdome, as teſtifieth Diogenes Laertius, in his booke of the lines of Philoſophers.

Pelops was a very mighty Prince. PElops the ſon of Tantalus, the mighty King of Phrygia, being greatly enamoured with Hippodamia, required her in marriage, but was reiected by her father Enomaus King of Piſa, which was a city in Elis neere Arcadia, the inhabitants whereof, at their returne from the wars of Troy, builded a city of the ſame name in Italy, whereupon thoſe Kings warred one againſt another, and the virgin kept ſo cloſe, as Pelops could not obtaine his deſire by any meanes, though their loue either to other was equall, vntill the yere of the world 2617. By treaſon of Myrtilus, chariot-driuer vnto Enomaus, he got her into his owne poſſeſſion, by whom he had 2. ſonnes, that is to ſay, Atreus and Thieſtes: he raigned triumphantly 52. yeres, he ſubiugated vnto himſelfe and his heyres the Prouince of Peloponeſus, of whom ſome write, it take that name, and at this preſent ſome call it Morea, which is in manner an Iland, and is called of the Greeks Cherſoneſus. It was foretold vnto Enomaus, father vnto Hippodamia, that he ſhould be ſlaine when his daughter was married, whereupon he made a chariot and furniſhed it with horſes of wonderous ſwiftnes, and proclaimed that if any could runne ſwifter than his chariot, he ſhould haue his daughter Hippodamia in marriage, but if any attempted to outrunne the chariot and failed, then they ſhould be put to death: vpon hope of winning which princely prize, there were 30. grand perſonages ouerthrowne: but Mirtilus being corrupted by Pelops, in ſtead of oyle, put ware into the axell tree of the chariot, and as hee driuen the chariot as hee was accuſtomed, the chariot fell and brake, in which fall, Enomaus was ſlaine, and Mirtilus was caſt into the Sea by Pelops, and ſo Pelops obtained his hearts deſire.

Amphion. AMphion the Son of Iupiter and Antyope, raigned in Thebes a city of Boetia, in the land of Greece in the yere of the world 2636. and before the Natiuity of our Saniour 1326. he was ſo excellent in Muſicke, that ſome ſayd, he had the lute of Mercury, vpon whom the Poets faine, that wirh his melody he drew ſtones to build Thebes, but Euſebius in his Chronicle expounds that, ſaying his auditory or hearers were very rude, and as dull as ſtones, which agreeth with the words of Horace in his Art of Poeſie, ſaying that Amphion was vertuous, wiſe, and eloquent, and that by his prudencie and ſweete oratory, hee brought ſauage people vnto ciuility, and taught the ignorant knowledge, making them dwell together in Cities conſonable vnto humane Lawes. Palephatus writes, that Amphion by meanes of his ſweete inſtrument and melodious harmony, gained ſo much money as payd for the building of the wals of Thebes. Niobe, the daughter of Tantalus, ſiſter to Pelops, and wife to Amphion, who bare him 7 ſons, and as many daughters of ſingular beauty, wherof ſhe was extremely proud, and preferred her ſelfe as equall with the goddeſſe Latona; for which preſumption, the Pacts ſaine, ſhe was turned into a ſtone. Palephatus ſaith, that this fable tooke originall from the ſlaughter of her 14 children by Apollo, vpon whoſe Sepulchre ſhe cauſed her picture of ſtone to be placed, being ſo excellently carued, that they ſeemed to lament and weepe for her childrens vntimely death, and ſaith alſo, that he himſelfe path ſeene her Image of ſtone.

Europa. EVropa, was daughter to Agenor king of Phenicia: the Poets faine that ſhe was rauiſhed, and tranſported into Crete by Iupiter, who tranſformed himſelfe into the likeneſſe of a Bull, of foretold of whom he begat Minos Rhadamantus, and Sarpedon: read Diodorus Sicilian his 5 booke, and Ouid his 2 booke of Metamorphoſis. Palephatus doth interpret this fable to be a certaine man of Crete or Candy, whoſe name was Taurus, which ſome ſay the is to ſay, a Bull, who led away the ſaid Europa, and rauiſhed her: ſome write that of this mayde Europa, the third part of the world took the name of Europe, although Herodotus in his 4 booke is of contrary opinion, ſaying there is no reaſon can ſay certainely from whence that third part of the world took that name. Her ſon Minos was the firſt Lord of the Iles of Cicklads, which are 54 in number. Iupiter Aſterius was his father. he ſent his letters into the Cariens from the Iſlands, and planted there his owne ſubiects, and then ordained Princes and gouernors in the yeere of the world 2710. and before the birth of our Saniour 1252. as Read Thucidides in the preface of his Hiſtory.

Euander flew his father; and flying from Arcadia into Italy, from thence he expulſed the Aborigenes, and dwelt in their habitations, and in the yeere of the world 1716. he builded a Caſtle vpon a mount in the midſt of Rome, and called it Palantium, after the name of his great Grandfather. Read Denis of Halicarnis and others.

for thee hated Hercules as being begotten of an other woman: he came from Spaine into Italy, 55 yeeres before Æneas: he slew Cacus, he gaue lawes vnto the Italians, then tooke Troy, and slew Laomedon the King, because hee brake promise with him, and placed Priam his Son in his stead. In the end his wife Deianira daughter to Oenius King of Calydon, sent himan enenomed shirt, bathed in the blood of Nessus, thinking that this blood would withdraw him from the loue of other women, as Nessus had falsely perswaded her, but when she vnderstood what euill it had brought vnto her husband, she hanged her selfe: whilest he yet liued, Hercules endured great agony with that shirt which claue fast vnto his skinne, and seeing no apparent remedy in a fury cast himselfe into a great fire.

Laomedon was father vnto Priam, who reedified Troy in such sort, that it surpassed all other Cities of that time, yet in his time it was wearily vexed by the Grekes.

Priam and the facke of Troy.

PRiam, the sonne of Laomedon, when his Father was slaine, and the City taken by Hercules in assault, was then constituted King by the said Hercules: who also restored vnto him all his kingdome as to a man of worth and vertue: Read Diodorus his fifth booke. There are others which say that Priam was led captiue into Greece, and from thence redeemed from Hercules, of which ransome or redemption, hee toke the name of Priam, and was thereupon so called. Hee had fiftie sonnes, whereof by his wife hee had 17. whereof the most renowned were Hector, Paris, Diophebus, Helenus, Polites and Polidorus. When the Citty of Troy was destroyed by the Grecians, then was aged Priam kild by young Pyrrhus sonne to Achilles neere to the Altar of Iupiter, where his sonne, Polites was but newly slaine: Read Dictis of Candy. Priam began his raigne in Troy, in the yeere of the world, 2725. and before the incarnation of our Lord and Saviour Christ, 1237. Priam married Hecuba, daughter to Cisseus King of Thrace. Amazones.

MArtheisia, alias Marpesia and Lampedon, alias, Lampeto, queenes of the Amazones, began their raigne in the yeere of the world 2734. and before the Nativity of our Saviour 1228. they diuided their armie into two parts, the one to second the other, being rich and fortunate. And to the end no honor nor glory should faple them in their designes, nor crosse their enterprizes, they haunted and diuulged themselues to be the children of god Mars, and hauing subdued a great part of Europe, took diuers Cities and holds in Asia, where they builded Ephesus and many other Cities. Whilest the one part of their army went a foraging and bathaling, the other part stayed with Martheisia to safegard the Countrey of Asia, but Martheisia with her squadrons was ouerthrowne and surprized by a barbarous people. Her daughter Orithya succeeded her: and as concerning the originall of Amazones I will onely giue a touch in a word: they are descended of the Scythians, and diuelt in Cappadocia neere the River Themadone, where their husbands were accustomed to make excursions vpon their bordering neighbours, and at last were all prsented and slaine by secret Ambuscadoes of their enemies. Their wiues being become widdows, calling to mind their incestuall griefe for their husbands, whilest they were married, also they hourely feared their continuall slaughter by the chances of war, and the desperate extremity wherein they were all left being either widdows, or vphants, remaining as a pray to their bowed enemies, with one consent toke heart of grace, entred into armes, ordered their common-wealth of themselues, accounted marriage to be seruitude, and hauing made peace with their neighbours, setled themselues to dwell, by them, and for continuance of their race, they appointed times and seasons of amozous meetings with their manly neighbours: and when they brought forth children, they either openly slew all the males, or very secretly sent them vnto their Fathers, and their daughters were trained vp to warres, and were taught to shoote in Bowes, to which purpose, their right Dugge was either burnt, or cut off. and thers of were called Amazones. Thalestris was the last Queene of Amazones, who liued in the time of Alexander the great, and hearing of his great valour and conquest, was wonderfull desirous to haue issue by him, vpon hope whereof she came vnto him, being accompanied with 300 or 400 women, whom she commanded to stay aloofe, and not to stirre, and so soone as she espyed the King, and that her was alighted off his horse, she boldly went vnto him, and hauing saluted him, deliuered the cause of her voyage. Alexander kept company with her 13 daies: then she returned into her own kingdom, and dyed very shortly after. With her death that kingdome endeo: Read Quintus Curtius 6 booke.

PAris, otherwise called Alexander, was sonne to Priamus and Hecuba. His father commanded that he should be throwne away so sone as he was borne, because his mother, after she was conceiued, dreamed that she was deliuered of a terrible flame of fire, pet neuerthelelle, his mother, in her motherly affection, caused him to be kept, and brought vp very secretly amongst Shepheards vpon mount Ida. In his youth, he loued the Nymph Æenna, by whom he had two sonnes, and after that he became knowne and receiued of his parents, then he was sent Ambassador into Greece, where he rauished Helena the daughter of Iupiter and Leda, in the yeere of the world, 2768. and before the Nativity of our Sauiour 1194. whereupon began the sharpe and bloody wars betwixt the Grekes and the Troians, which continued 10 yeeres, in which time liued Hector, Achilles, Aiax, Vlisses, and many other famous warriors on either side, of whom many haue written at large, as you may read.

Vlisses was greatly possessed with cowardize and tealousie of his fatre young wife Penelope: she was the daughter of Icarius and Peribea. Lycophron strongly affirmeth that Penelopes chastity was neither so, nor so as some haue written, being by Ouanton, weake, and simple.

Nauplius.

NAuplius, King of the Ile of Euboea, which is now called Negrepont, was Father to Palamedes, who to be reuenged vpon the treacherous practises of his Sonnes death, (for he perished though the false accusation of Vlisses) this Nauplius procured the Ladies of Greece to practise adultery, whilst their husbands were at the Troian warres, imagining thereby that at their returne, and in their fury they would haue slaine them all, one with another: he also went to mount Capharens at the very instant, when he perceiued the Grecians were coming home, and there placed many burning Torches, which the most part of the Grecians well seeing in the night time, bent their courses directly to those fires and lights, supposing they had beene there placed for their special good, and that they would haue guided them the best and neerest way, which caused them to perish amongst the rocks, cliffs, and sands of the Sea, and then hee cast himselfe into the Sea for very madnesse, when hee vnderstood for truth, that Vlisses and Diomedes were escaped, whose destruction a boue all others he most desired: Read Homer, Virgil, Ouid, and many others.

Reuenge is a waiting Serpent.

After this, Vlisses was murthered by his son Telegonus, which he had by Circes. God did many times vse the seuerity of the Grecians which they vsed towards the Troians, for within few yeeres after, their chiefe Princes not only perished by vntimely death, but the whole nation also became vassals and tributaries vnto the Persians whom they most hated. Palamedes. Inuention of many things.

PAlamedes, sonne to the forenamed Nauplius, as some write inuented 4 Greek letters, and the well ordering of a Campe, and the giuing of watch-words, the keeping of Centinels, and watches, which hee tooke by example of Cranes: he also inuented the casting of account with Counters, and son say he deuised the playing at Tables, Chesse, and Dice, weights and measures, he also proportioned the yeere by the course of the Sunne, and the moneths by the course of the Moone, and in the prime of his wit and strength, hee was most wrongfully accused by Vlisses, and was stoned to death in the Camp: some write that Homer for mere envy tore and burned all his Posies. Read the Authors last named, and Celius Rodiginus 20 book 27 chap. and 7 book 31 chap. and his 20 booke 30 Chapter, Volcatius 18 booke, Pliny 7 booke, and 56 Chapter. The cause why Vlisses practised his death, was for that Palamedes being both wise, learned, politique and valiant, discouered the subtill shifts, and faint cowardize of Vlisses, and manifested the same vnto the whole Campe, saying, Vlisses could deuise many stratagems, but durst not attempt in his own person to put any one in execution: he also discouered and made knowne the cowardize of Achilles, and of his disguising himselfe in womans apparell, and so kept company with the daughters of King Licomedes: all which he did by the aduise of his mother, who caused him also to hide himselfe, because hee should not goe to the Troiane warres, for that it was foretold her, that her son Achilles should perish in the wars of Troy: and when shee saw that all her drifts were discouered and knowne, shee sent him away, being accompanyed with Vlisses, who departed from Ithaca with 40 small ships vnto the warres of Troy, in the yeere of the world 2773. and before the birth of our Sauiour 1189.

Ænæas accoping to diuerse Authors.

AEneas was sonne to Anchises and Venus, of the race of Pryam: Virgil saith he was vertuous, humane and warlike, hee relieued his father, and carryed him vpon his backe to escape the fire of Troy, and being sore amazed, and in a violent throng, he lost Creusa his wife: then he sayled into Italy, where hee ouercame Turnus in battell, and then tooke to wife Lauynia, daughter to King Latynus: shee was first promised to Turnus, then hee builded a City, and called it Lauinium after his wiues name, in the yeere of the world 2788. and before the birth of our Sauiour Jesus Christ, 1104. And concerning this Æneas and the renowned Queene Dido, her entertaining and lustfull pleasures with him, many Historyes hold it very fabulous; and touching his death, I read not any thing, for certainely the Historyes say, that after hee had raigned 3 yeeres ouer the Latines, hee had a very great battell against the Rutilians and Hetrucians, which was 3 yeeres after the death of his father in Law Latinus, and great slaughter fell on both sides, and that Æneas could not be found amongst the dead: this was about seuen yeeres after the destruction of Troy: Read Denis Helicarn, and Titus Liuius, in both their first bookes. Turnus King of the Rutilians, cousin germaine to the King of Latines, was much grieued that Æneas a stranger was so preferred, and thereupon in great rage, made fierce wars vpon them both, but in the end he was banquished by Æneas in single combate, man to man. Read Virgil his 12 booke of his Æneyds.

Iepthe.

IEpthe was Iudge of Israel in the yeere of the world 2787. and the same yeere dyed Latinus, who at first was conquered by Æneas, and afterwards by kind and honorable peace, became his most faithfull friend, and gaue him Lauinia his daughter in marriage, for very griefe whereof, her mother Amata hanged her selfe. Lauinia was the second wife to Æneas, he built a City after her owne name, called Lauinium, a rich and flourishing City. Æneas dyed, and left her with childe of Silvius Posthumus the third King of of Latines, and was ſo called, becauſe hee was borne after his fathers death.

Brute.

BRutus, the Sonne of Silnius, drawe out the great tyrannous wild men out of their habitation, and called the ſame Iland Brytania, after his owne name, which before was called Albion. This Brutus had three ſonnes, who conſtituted their Kingdoms, the firſt was Locrus, who called his Countrey and Kingdome Locria, wherein London ſtandeth, the ſecond was Camber, who named his Countrie Cambria, and ſince that, called Wallia and Liſa, whom ſome call Galles, the third was Albanactus, who named his Country Albania, which is ſince called Scotland. The eldeſt continued his other brethren, and became ſole Lord of all England. This Brutus raigned about 50 yeres after the deſtruction of Troy, viz. in the yere of the world 2822. and before the birth of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt 1130. Read Raphael Volateran, his 3 booke of Geography of the people and Kings of England. Ignona, the daughter of Pandraſus, King of Leo-grece, was wife to this Brutus, by whom he had thoſe three ſonnes: Read the Chronicle of Chronicles, and the Supplement of Chronicles the fourth booke.

Homer.

HOmer, the moſt renowned Greek Poet, flouriſhed about the yeere of the world, 2838. and before the birth of Jeſus Chriſt, 1124. as ſaith Caſſiodore. Cornelius Nepos ſaith, hee lived in the yere of the world, 3501. and before the building of Rome, 160 yeeres. Plutarch with others write, that hee lived in the time of the Troiane warres, wherof he wrote 24 bookes. And ſome ſay, he lived 100 or 150 yeres after. He was borne neere the flood Meleſes, and therof was called Meleſigenes: he lived many yeres, and when he waxed blind, he was called Homer. His kinſman Heſiodus, a famous Poet, was his ancient, and yet lived in his time. This Heſiodus was borne in Aſera, a village of Boetia: he was the firſt that wrote of husbandry in verſe, whom Virgil imitateth in his Georgicks as well as her doth Homers bookes.

Heſiodus.

Virgil.

VIrgil was borne in a Towne nar Mantua, in the yere of the world, 3895. and before the birth of our Saviour Jeſus, fifty and ſeven yeres: ſome ſay that he erred not when he was borne, but rather ſtrilde, and looked pleaſant: he was alſo called Parthenias, which is to ſay, a virgin, becauſe of his ſtrict and amiable lookes: he was highly fauoured of Auguſtus, who denied him nothing, and albeit he was no way covetous, yet his eſtate was better then an hundred thouſand marks: hee dyed at 52 yeeres of age, his field of Poeſie was his beſt helpe. In his time lived Mecenas of the race of the Kings of Tuſcania: in his youth he wrote many Poeſies, and was all his life time the rewarder and refuge of Poets, and Orators, for whichmerit, his name is famous to this day. Virgil wrote his owne Epitaph before hee dyed, to this effect. I was borne at Mantua, dyed in Calabria, and buried at Naples. Salomon.

SYcheus, alias Sicharbas, was huſband unto Dido, hee was high Preeſt unto Hercules, hee had much treaſure, but durſt not truſt it either in cheſts or chambers, but for his moſt ſuppoſed ſafety, he bid it in the earth, and although his people knew not directly where it was layd, yet the generall fame thereof ſo enflamed Pigmalion, with a couetous deſire thereof, that he traytorouſly ſlew Sycheus, alias Sicharbas, as he was offering ſacrifice. This Pigmalion, was brother unto Dido, and King of Tyre, and raigned 40 yeres, and in the 7 yeere of his raigne, as ſaith Joſephus, Dido builded Carthage. Read Virgil in his booke of Aeneids, and Juſtinius, his 18 booke. Dido was daughter unto Belus, King of Phenicia, otherwiſe called Tyre, her huſband was ſlaine by Pigmalion, as he was ſecretly ſaying with his treaſure into Affrica, and with that money, Dido bought as much ground, as ſhee could compaſſe with the lachets, or thinne cuttings of a Bull hide, which contained two and twenty furlongs, and is about 3 Engliſh miles, or 2 and a halfe, and therein ſhe builded the City of Carthage. This Carthage was founded in the yere of the world, 3076. and before the incarnation of our Saviour Chriſt, 886. and after the building of the Temple of Salomon, as ſaith Joſephus, 143. yeeres in his 1 booke againſt Apyan. Her chaſtity was very great, notwithſtanding Virgil and Ouid, and is commended by Boccace, and Antonius, for the choſe rather to haue dyed, then to haue maryed with King Hiarbas. And between the time of the Troian Aeneas, and this Dido, according to diuers hiſtories, there is aboue 200 yeeres difference, her proper name was Eliſa, and was ſurnamed Dido, which is to ſay, manly, or manlinde, becauſe of her noble manly Acts. Shee was honored and adored as a goddeſſe. Temples and Altars were erected unto her name and honour: Read Juſtin, in his 18 booke, and Boccace, 2 booke of Ladies of renowme.

Romulus cauſed his brother to be ſlain, becauſe he had miſtaken his proclamation, and walked vpon the new made walls of Rome. Romulus being ſole King, ordained 100 Senators, who for their honors, were called fathers, and their poſteritie, patricians, and 300 men at armes for his perſonall guard, and as hee was making an Oration vnto his army, there fell an extreme ſodaine terrible tempeſt, with horrible thunderclaps, and a blacke cloud compaſſed him round about, and from that time he was neuer ſeene: he raigned 36 yeeres: Read Titus Linius.

Eſay the Prophet.

HOſea the Son of Ela raigned in Samaria, in the yere of the world, 3195. And before the birth of our Saviour Chriſt, 767. In his time lived Eſay the Prophet, a man of high birth in Jeruſalem he prophecied of the deſtruction of Juda & all Iſrael, which ſuddenly came to paſſe, for in the yere of the world, 3212. and before Chriſt, 749. Salmanaſar the King of Aſſyria, inuaded Juda & Iſrael with a huge hoſt, and after three yeres extreme ſiege, hee won Samaria, take Hoſea priſoner, ſpoiled all the land of Iſrael, and led 10 tribes captiue with him into Aſſyria, according as Eſay had foretold. This noble Prophet alſo prophecied the Iſraelites deliuerance from the captiuity of Babylon, of the comming of our Saviour Chriſt, and the calling of the Gentiles. Read the 4 booke of Kings, Joſephus the 9 booke and 15 Chapter, and Saint Jerome vpon Eſay.

The Prophet Ieremy.

IEremy the Prophet being yong, began to prophecie in the yere of the world 3307. and before Chriſt, 655. Read S. Jerome vpon the prophecie of Ieremy, and Joſephus in his booke of Antiquities, 10 booke, 8 chap. The Prophet Baruch was Scribe, or Secretary vnto Ieremy and wrote vnder him the booke of theſe things that were to come vpon Jeruſalē: alſo when Ieremy was in priſon, he ſerued him, and accompanyed him in his exile, and neuer left him: he read his prophecies before Iechonias the King, in the captiuity of Babylon, he foretold many great myſteries of the incarnation of our Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, and of the end of the world.

CYrus was the firſt King of Perſia, in the yeere of the world 3403. and before the incarnation of our Sauiour 559. he was the ſonne of Cambyſes and Mandane, daughter to Aſtiages King of the Medes. Aſtiages whileſt his daughter was with childe, dreamed, that from her lownes, there ſprang a time which ſhould cauer all Aſia, and thereupon commanded Harpagus, being the Generall of his army, to take the new borne Cyrus and kill him: but Harpagus being better minded, take the childe and gaue him vnto Mithridates, who deliuered the babe vnto his wife Cyno, by whom hee was kindly nurſed, and brought by amongſt Sheepheards, vntill hee was 12 yeres old, at which time, the Shepheards in a May-Game, chooſe him for their King. When Aſtiages vnderſtood that Harpagus had not murthered Cyrus, as hee was commanded, then hee ſlew the ſonne of Harpagus, and by deuice, made the father to eate his Sonnes fleſh, which ſo ſoone as Harpagus knew thereof, he ſought to be reuenged for his Sonnes death, and made fierce warre vpon Aſtiages: in which battell, the Medes put the Perſians to flight, then was Cyrus, who was alſo called Darius King of Medes and Perſia. Hee tooke Babylon, as you may read in Daniel and Eldras. Tomiris Queene of the Maſſegetes, made warre vpon Cyrus, becauſe he had ſurpized her Sonne, and moſt cruelly ſlaine him, and all that were with him: in this fight the ouercame Cyrus, and ſlew all his people with great ſeuerity, to the end, none ſhould returne with newes, and by diligent ſearch ſhe found among the dead, the body of Cyrus, then carſed his head to be cut off, and put into a beſſell full of mans blood, ſaying, O Cyrus! thou ſleweſt my ſonne treacherouſly, and haſt drunke humane blood for thirty yeres ſpace, and not ſatisfied, now ſolace, and take thy fill of mans blood. The laſt King of Rome.

Senate

Senate, by common people, he put to death many principall persons, and Tarquin his sisters sonne, brother to Brutus, because he had shewed favour to Tullius his predecessor. Hee was the first in Rome, that devised grievous torments, viz. Bulls pitsels to whip, Waltmaders to strike, chaines and shackles to bind, hot pans to burn, and banishment: and although he had diuers victories, and builded a Temple to Iupiter, yet by reason of his pride, cruelty, and tyranny, and for the Rape which his sonne committed upon the chaste Lucrecia, he was hated of the Romans and at the siege of Ardea, hee and all his race were driuen out by the Romans, and in his most need, his souldiers forsoke him. His wife Tullia was as proud and bloody as himselfe, as appeareth by her actions in her fathers death: read Titus Liuius 1 booke, Denys Halycarnis 4 booke.

Denis of Halycarnis.

Cambyses. CAmbyses, the son of Cyrus, was the second King of Persia, in the yeere of the world, 3433. Eldras in his 1 booke and 4 chapter called him Artaxerxes, and saith that he sauced the stay from repairing the Temple of God, in Jerusalem, which his father had permitted. The Hebrewes say, that in this Kings raigne, was performed that which was read in the booke of Hester, and others say, it was in the raigne of Darius, the sonne of Histaspes: hee banquished Plamment, the last King of Egypt, and conioyned it unto his owne Kingdome, and being vexed with the Egyptians superstitions, commanded the Temple of Apis, and all their Idols, to be beaten down, he also sent an army to destroy the Temple of their god Ammon, which army utterly perished in the desart, of wouing sands of Lybia, he slew his brother Smerdis, and tooke his sister in marriage, and slew her within a while after, and in the end at the siege of Ecbatana in Egypt, he slew himselfe with his owne sword; having raigned 8 yeeres. After him raigned Smerdis Magus, 7 moneths, and after him Darius, the sonne of Histaspes: they had another Cambyses. Holofernes, the Generall of the army of Cambyses, was sent against all nations that would not submit themselues unto him, he was commanded not to remit any, and at the siege of Bethulia, whose inhabitants were almost famished, he was ouercome by the valiant and prudent Iudeth. Read Herodotus 3 booke, Xenophons 8 booke. Iustin 1 booke, and Iosephus 11 booke, and 2 chapter. About this time lived and flourished the excellent Philosopher Pithagoras, born in the Ile of Samos, he was the first that said, amity to be an equality, and that among friends, all things are common: read Lactius 8 booke.

Pithagoras.

Darius. DArius, the sonne of Histaspes, was chosen King of Persia, in the yeere of the world, 3441, and before Christ, 521. Smerdes and Patizithes were slaine, that had usurped the Kingdome by force. Atossa the daughter of Cyrus, was wife to Darius: some say that Hester was wife to Darius, and that Eldras calleth this Darius, Assuerus. He permitted the Iewes to returne into Iudea, and to new build their Temple, and restored against their treasure, and holy vessells and ornaments. Hee ordained 20 Prouinces and gouernors ouer them, and constrained the people to pay tribute, which they never did before, but onely gaue what themselues thought good. Hee subdued the Getes, and the Thracians yeelded themselues unto him, but the Scithians put him to flight. Babylon revolted from him, and hauing besieged it 2 yeeres, saw no hope of recouering of it by force: then hee secretly agreed between Zopirus his owne Generall and himselfe, that it should be divulged throughout the campe, that the King had entertained great displeasure against Zopirus, and because it should passe for plaine truth, Zopirus slit his owne Nose, mangled his lipps, and cut off his owne eares, and whilest his foes were in a manner bleeding, he fled into Babylon, where hee told them, that thus cruelly his Master had dealt with him, for speaking but favourably in their behalfe, and prayed them to ayde him that he might be auenged of the tyrant. The Babylonians gaue full credit to his speeches, and thereupon made him their General, and then he yeelded the City into the Kings hands, who said that he had rather haue one onely Zopirus, then many such Cities as Babylon. He raigned 36 yeers. Read Herodotus 3 booke, Iustin 1 booke, Orosius 2 booke.

PResently after the violent rape of chaste Lucrecia by Tarquin, and punishment done upon the proud insolent offender, and his abetters, then began the Roman estate to be gouerned by Consuls, which was in the yeere of the world 3456. It is a story worth reading, read Titus Liuius his 1 booke.

SAapho, a mayden Poet, lived in the time of Tarquinius Priscus, which was in the yeer of the world, 3349, he doubled the number of Senators and Knights also, he inuironed part of Rome with strong walls. Plato admired this Sapho for her excellent wisedome, she was skilfull in verse, of whom the Saphique verse beareth the name unto this day: she lived before the birth of our Saniour Christ, 613.

ZErxes the 5 King of Persia, son of Darius Histaspes, began his raign in the yeer of the world, 3477, and before the birth of our Saniour, 485. There hapned some division between him and his elder brother Artabarzanes, but it was easily suppresst, and was concluded that this Zerxes, sonne to Atossa the second wife to the forenamed Darius, should be King. He first subdued the Egyptians which had revolted, then he led a very mighty army into Greece, the like whereof in those parts, had not beene knowne: for some Authors say, that he with his hoste and fort haue drunke some Rivers drie: he grieuously oppressed the Greekes, and burned Athens, with diuers other her neighbour Cities, but in the end hee was sharply repulsed by the most valiant captaines Leonydas, and Themistocles, and by them put to the worst twice in one day, and then fled in a little fisher-boat into his owne country to saue himselfe. There was also a valiant Athenian captain called Cymon, that ouerthrew the army of Zerxes twice in one day, the first by Sea, where he tooke 200 vessels, the next by Land, and then cleared all Greece. Afterward he reinforced himselfe, and then crossed the Sea, and went into Asia minor, where he got rich bootes from his enemies, and distributed a great part thereof unto the poore, he kept an open table for all commers, especially for strangers, trauellers, and poore people.

Artaxerxes. ARtaxerxes, the sonne of Zerxes last mentioned, begunne his raigne ouer the Persians in the yeere of the world, 3497. and before the birth of Christ, 465 yeeres, the Greekes called him Artaxerxes Longhand, because his right hand was longer then his left. Methastenes calls him Darius, and Eldras that lived in his time, and knew him well, and obtained all favour at his hands, calleth him indifferently Darius and Artaxerxes, for the Persians vsed both those names, like as our Cuipero saare called Cæsar and Augustus. Hee was throughly auenged upon the murther of his father, and brother, for he slew Artabanus by a politike deuice, and then slew all his children: Read Eldras the 1 booke, Iustin. 3 booke, Herodotus 7 booke, and Plutarch upon the life of of Artaxerxes: he raigned full 40 yeeres.

LVcullus Quintus Cincinnatus, was by the Romane Senate called from the plow, and with all honour and magnificence, ordained to be Dictator in the yeere of the world, 3506. and before the birth of Jesus 456.

Socrates. IN the yeere of the world 3531. flourished Socrates, the most excellent Philosopher, his fathers name was Sophronisces, he was a carver of Images, his mothers name was Phanareta, she was a Midwife: hee was very famous amongst the Athenians, his wisedome and vertue procured the ignorant and enuious to practise his death, they accused him of blasphemy against their Gods. Amongst many his golden Sentences, he said, that a mans friend was his knowledge, and his foule his enemy: Read Cicero, I booke of Quæstiones Pliny 7 booke, and Saint Augustin de Ciuitate Dei, with diuers others: the name of his shrewd wife was Xantippe.

Aspasia. ABout this time lived Aspasia, the daughter of Axiochus, famous for wisedome, and Oratory, for whose sake, the wife Pericles forsoke his wife and married her. Sophocles, the renowned learned Poet, was his speciall friend, and they twaine were sent in armes, ioyntly together, to make warres upon the Lacedemonians.

Brenno, or Brennus. BRenno, or Brennus, an excellent warriour, was as chiefe, or King ouer the Gaules, hee entred with a very warlike army into Italy, but hee was not the first that went thither, for the Gaules had invaded Italy, 200 yeers before, and obtained great victories upon the Romans, nere to the River Alia: he suddenly bent his forces right upon Rome, and found the gates open, for the Romanes being much astonished, were fled to the Capitoll, pilling, spoyling and burning, and after he had plant ed his siege about the city, those of the Capitoll, offered a certaine summe of money to raise his siege and depart: but when they came and made tender of the money, according to the agreement, Brennus refused it, and sware he would haue the waight of his Rapier more, which they denyed to giue, byding his voluntary competition, and while Brennus stood in contention, the noble Romane Camillus, with a resolute army came upon him, repulsed Brennus, and saued Romes honor. This was done in the yeere of the world 3670. and before the nativity of Jesus, 386. Read Titus Liuius 1 booke, Dec. 5. The Gaules endeuor greatly to attribute unto this Brennus, the founding of the City Verona in Italy, which since is called Verona, and will not admit any authority to the contrary, were it not very manifest by diuers Chronicles, and the account of time, that there is more then 100 yeeres difference, betweene this Brennus of the Gaules, and the English Brennus, that was the true builder of Verona, alias Verona, and of him it tooke the name: Read Titus Liuius 8 booke, Dec. 4. and Iustin his 25 booke, who say that the Gaules beare the Tuscans out of their countrey, and builded in Italy, Milan, Coma, Brescia, Bergama, Trenta, and Vicentia.

MAusolus, King of Caria in Asia minor, died in the yeere of the world 3556. for extreme griefe of whole death, his wife Artemisia, for the entyre love which she bare him when his body was burnt to ashes (as was the custome of great Princes) shee would not suffer his ashes to be put into an vrne, or other vsuall vessell, but onely in her owne stomacke, and by degrees, she dranke them with wine, or water, mired with sweete Odours, and after that for an euerlasting memorial of her husband, she erected a stately Sepulchre, it was so great, strange and sumptuous, that it was numbred among the 7 wonders of the world, and because she would be sure to haue it exceede all former Monuments, as well in curious workemanship, as otherwise, she sent chosen men to survay all knowne parts of the world, namely, Scopas to the Cast. Briaxis to the North, Timotheus to the South, and Leochares to the West. But before sice could fully finish this memorable worke, she died, yet neuertheless, the building went forward to the fulnesse of perfection, because they esteemed it to be their glory, and of Art the master-peece of the whole world for euer. Furthermore, this Artemisia was by all solemnity, celebrated her husbands obsequies and funerals, and because sometime she would beguile her griefe, and take truce with her teares, she ordained silver-games, & other rich prize of great value, which were proposed to be won by those that could preach best in her husbands praise. Unto this combate of eloquent tongues, came many men of high desert, frō all parts, namely,

PHilip, the Sonne of Aminias, was King of Macedon in the yere of the world 3603. and before the birth of Christ 359. hee first made warre vpon the Athenians, and ouercame them, but offered no violence vnto their bodies, nor goods: then he warred vpon the Sclauonians, and tooke many Cities from them: after that, he went against the Thessalians, because they had refused to ayde him with their Ioyseurn. At the siege of Methona, hee was wounded in the eye, with the shaft of an arrow, which hee tooke so patiently, that when the Methonians vnderstood thereof, they required him to receiue them into his fauour, which he did. He was wonderously renowned, for patience, mildenesse, and mercy, and by these vertues, hee ouercame his greatest enemies. Towards the end, hee was chosen Head, or Emperor of all Greece, he prepared a mighty army to subdue the Persians, but was there slaine treacherously, by Pausanias, because he had not done him Iustice, of certaine iniury, where of he had complained. Olimpias, the daughter of the King of Molossus, was wife to this Philip, and mother to Alexander the great, endued her aduiterie, there was put away from her husband; then her tooke Cleopatra to wife, and at his death there was great doubt made, whether Alexander were his naturall Son, or no, or should succeed him, or whether his issue by the second wife should raigne after him. But his sonne Alexander was of rare gifts in nature, and of singular perfection in the knowledge of Philosophy, being instructed and tutored in all good letters by Aristotle, who wrote vnto Philip, saying, I esteeme my selfe happy, in that hee was borne in my time. After the death of Philip, Olimpias slew Cleopatra, and her sonne, for rage, that they in her disgrace, were so highly aduanced to haue [illegible] the whole history, for it is pleasant, Iustin 7 and 8 booke, Diodorus, Scet, Orosius 3 booke 13 Chap.

Valerius, alias Corninus.

MArcus Valerius, a tribune of [illegible], at 23 yeres of age, appointed himselfe in combate, against Agrippa, that [illegible] Romans a-ny Romane to fight on horseback, and when they were approached, there came a Raven and pearke of his right eare, a helmet of Valerius, her remoued not thence vntill the end of the combate, and as they enterchanged blowes, shee ceased not to clap her wings, put into her bill, and offer to strike the assailant with her talons, which strange apparitions effect much amazed him. He was ouercome, and slaine by Valerius, who was euer after called Corninus, because of the Raven that haunted his enemy. The Consull after this, made very much of the Rauen; this was done in the yere of the world, 3617. Read Titus Liuius 1 booke, Orosius 5 booke, and many other approued Authors.

IN the yere of the world 3673. Curius Dentatus, a Romane Consull, ruinated the Saumnites, and then that warre ceased, hauing continued 49 yeres. These Saumites had formerly sent Ambassadors, with diuers rich presents, as well vessels wherein to put meate, as otherwaies, vnto Curius, whom they found at dinner, sitting vpon the side of a banke, hauing his meat in wooden dishes, thauing presented their gifts vnto him, he thus said, I marry, quoth he, these vessels make a goodly show without foode, and fit to feede the eyes, and therewithall hee laughed, saying, Returne ye Ambassadors with your superfluities, vnto the Saumnites, and tell them, I had rather raigne ouer riches, then to be rich, beare backe your presents, and know, that I cannot be ouercome by warre, nor corrupted with money. And hauing chased king Pyrrhus out of Italy, reserued to take any part of his spoyle, vnto himselfe, but gaue the booty vnto his Souldiours, and the rest vnto the City. He was called Dentatus, because he was borne with teeth: Read Pliny 8 booke, of the first Elephants that were seene in Rome.

Curius Dentatus.

IN the yeere of the world, 3615. flourished Demosthenes. Demosthenes, the excellent Orator of the Athenians, he was the sonne of a rich Cutler, or Knifemaker, in his youth he stuttered, and could hardly speake plaine, but through great paines, and industry, he obtained vnto singular perfection of plain and pleasant speaking. He courted Lays, the Corinthian Harlot, who demanded of Lays. him 3000 pieces of siluer, for one nights lodging: but he answered her, hee would not buy repentance to deare: read Plutarch and Macrobius. About 3 yeres after this, viz. in the yeere of the world 3618. and after Christ, 344. the Noble and vertuous Tymoleon, of Corinth was Timoleon. sent with a small army of Gallies into Cicilia, to deliuer the City of Syracusa, from the tyranny of Denis the tyrant, which hee performed Denis. within 50 daies after his arriuall. He cleared the country from the tyrant, and all other their oppressors, pulled downe all fortifications, that might any way aduantage their enemies: hee repeopled their decayed Cities, and ordained many wholsome Lawes for their future gouernment. The forenamed Denis, through fauour of the Soldiers, succeeded his father, being of the same name, and thought to raigne peaceably, and because he would reobtaine the peoples fauour, hee set 3000 captiues at liberty, and forgaue 3 moneths tribute: all which, notwithstanding, the extremity of his former cruelty was so fresh in memory, that he was chased by Dyon, and after that, by Timoleon, that he gladly became a poore Schoolemaster: Read Plutarch, Iustin 22. Cicero, and others.

ALexander the great, succeeded his Father Alexander Philip, at 20 yeeres of age in the Kingthe great. dome of Macedon in the yer of the world, 3628. and and before the birth of our Saviour Iesus, 334. he was of wonderous courage in his Infancy: for when hee beheld any bonefires made for ioy of his fathers victories, he would weepe saying, My father will conquer all, and leaue nothing for me to conquer: He first led his Army neere to the great River Danubia, and ouerthrew Syrmus King of the Tribals, then hee went against the Thebans and ouerthrew them, and because they had reuolted, he sacked and raced their City to be a terrour vnto other Cities of Greece, to feare rebellion. The Greekes called him Emperor, and then began a consultation for a voyage against the Persians, which he performed with great prudence and prowesse, but before he entred in the Persian expedition, hee parted the kingdome of Macedon and Europe among his friends, saying with an exceeding feruent spirit, that hee would conquer the East, and that thorlo suffice him, and that the Persians had held the Empire long enough, and that he must change hands with them in their authority, and teach them better gouernment: his best treasure was his assured hope in the accomplishing of his determination. His Souldiers and men of warre followed him with like spirit and resolution, who forsooke wiues, children, friends and all, to follow his fortune, making no doubt, but to haue their full prey of the Kingdomes of the East: his ordinary strength was, 32000. footemen, 4500 horsemen, and 182 Ships: hee made speciall choyse of old Souldiours and expert warriors: hee ouercame Darius, King of Persia, ouerthrew 20000 of his footemen, and 15000 of his horse, he tooke the Queen and her two daughters prisoners, whom hee entreated most honourably, he inuaded India, as farre as the River Ganges, tooke Babylon, and sacked Persopolis. Read Plutarch and Iustin.

Philosophers. Plato. Zenocrates. Diogenes.

AT this time flourished many excellent Grecian Philosophers in Athens, namely, Aristotle, Diuine Plato, Zenocrates, Diogenes, and many others, whose liues, learning and sayings by diuers of our kind countrymen haue bin learned, and liuely translated into our natiue tongue, as you may finde in most Stationers shops. And as these forenamed Philosophers and many others with great care, & conscience, taught piety, vertue, and true morality, there sprang vp a hel hound, like to the Serpent in Paradise, called Epicurus, he went into Athens, and as it is written, there he taught publikely, that the soueraigne god of all things was free pleasure in all voluptuousnes, and in his Epistle to Minicetus, hee expounded himselfe, saying, When I say, that voluptuousnesse and pleasure is the end of all good, I do not mean only by eating and drinking, as some ignorant take it, but to haue their bodies free from harme, and diseases, and their minds not troubled, for the vertues are ioyned with the life in pleasures, and cannot be separated. From this Epicurus, the Epicures of our time take their names. Read Diogenes, Laertius, S. Augustine, and many others.

Ptolomeus.

PTolomeus the Son of Lagus, whom Alexander the Great aduanced from a common souldiour, to be a chiefe man in the Court and Campe, was after his death chosen King of Egypt in the yeere of the world, 3640. and before the birth of Christ, 322. he turned vnto his kingdome of Egypt, the City of Cirena, and part of Africa and Arabia, he was well beloued of his subiects, and his neighbour Princes: he ouercame Demetrius, the sonne of Antigonus, and freed all his friends from captiuity, and also whatsoeuer himselfe had taken, he sent it backe againe, saying, hee made warre for honour, not for profit: and after this victory he was ouercome at Sea, by Demetrius, who shewed like mercy and honour vnto him and his friends: for he freely sent backe his brother, his Sonne, and his friends which hee had taken, and then began a further Emulation in honour and courtesie betweene them, to manifest their warre was onely for honour, and not for gaine nor enuy. This Ptolomeus sent Ambassadors to Rome, to make alliance betweene them, he prepared the famous Li- The great brary which hath beene renowned through the Library of world, he assembled the seuenty and two Inter- Ptolomeus. preters, he tooke Cipres and Phenicia, and from him all the rest of the kings of Egypt were called Ptolomeus: he raigned 40 yeres, and appointed Philadelphus his youngest Sonne to raigne after him: his wiues name was Berenice, who in honour of her Sonne Philadelphus, builded a Philadelphus City neere to the gulfe of Arabia, and called it Berenice Philadelphus: she had a daughter called Arsinoa, she married Euergenes. LYsimachus, for haughty courage, strength of body, and knowledge in Philosophy, surpassed all the Captaines of Macedon, by whose loyes Alexander had forbidden the East, and yet he was not ashamed to be instructed by Calisthenes whom Alexander caused to haue his lips, nose, and eares cut. Alexander commanded him to encounter with a fierce Lyon, which he did, and by sudden violence snatched out his tongue: then Alexander began to loue him exceedingly, and whereas in his former displeasure he had wounded

Pyrrhus.

PYrrhus, ſonne to the King of Epirus, his father being chaſed out of his Countrey, was ſecretly brought into Sclauonia, at 2 yeeres of age vnto the wife of the King, who being of his kindred, receiued him kindly, and obtaind of the King to preſerue him from the King of Macedon. The Epirates changing their minds repealed Pirrhus at 12 yeeres of age, and being come to mans eſtate, proued valiant, he defended the Tarentines againſt the Romanes, and albeit he was much feighted with the bold appearance of great Elephants, not hauing ſeene any before, yet he ouercame them, he ſent backe to Rome all their men of war, and others which were taken priſoners, without pay or ranſome, and in the yeere of the world, 3676. he tooke the kingdome of Macedon, he came into Sicilia, and was called King of Sicilia, as well as King of Epirus, he aſſigned vnto one of his ſons Sicilia, and vnto the other Italy, he ſeuerally ouercame the Carthaginians, and when he left Italy, he ſaid, Oh, what pleaſures and exerciſes of warres doe I leaue vnto the Romanes and Carthaginians! but at length per fas & nefas he ouercame the Spartanes, and hauing loſt his ſon, he retired. After that hee went into Argos when Antigonus had retyred himſelfe, and beſieged him, at which ſiege he was ſlain by the blow of a ſtone, which a woman threw at him from the wall, but before he dyed, he came into the thickeſt thong of his enemies, and dyed valiantly. HAnnibal the ſonne of Amilcar, firſt fled vnto Annibal, to Bruſias, king of Bithynia, and for a time ſerued him againſt Eumenes, and after that at 26 yeeres of age, he was generall of the Carthaginians: at the firſt he ſhewed himſelfe to be prudent and honorable, but afterward hee became couetous and cruell. Within 3 moneths ſpace, he had almoſt conquered all Spain, and at the ſiege of Sagontia, he draue the inhabitants vnto ſuch extremity of famine, that the Sagontines did eate one another, & then burned themſelues rather then they would ſubmit themſelues into his hands. In his army were an hundred and fifty thouſand footmen, and twenty thouſand horſe, he left his brother in Law Aſdrubal in Spaine, then he croſſed the Pirreneanhils, and paſſed by Lions, where hee appointed two petty Kings, brethren, then with great difficulty, he paſſed the Alps with the loſſe of 30000 men, being conſtrained to make a new way ouer the rockes, with fire & vineger. And after he ouerthrew Scipio Scipio Corneliu. nius and Flaminius with ſlaughter of 15000 of Flaminius their men, but Fabius repreſſed him well enough. Fabius. After that, hee had a great victory at Cannes, from whence he ſent 3 Chariots full, taken with gold and ſilver Rings, and Iewels, which hee had wonne, vnto Carthage: then all that time, hee might haue taken Rome, but he then ouerkept his good fortune: he returned into Campaigne, in the end he was ouercome by Mar. Scipio, that was afterward ſurnamed Scipio Affricanus. Then he fled towards Pontus, but ſuſpecting him of ſome ancient grudge, hee died by poiſon, in the yeer of the world 3774. and before the birth of our Sauior Chriſt, 188. he brought 32 Elephants into Italy, and loſt one of his eyes at mount Apennyn. Read Plutarch, Titus Liuius, Dece, and S. Auguſtin, de Ciuitate Dei. Read the whole Hiſtory: for it is delightfull.

SCipio Affricanus, the great, being the firſt Scipio Affriſon of thoſe man among the Romanes, hee canus. was ſo called, becauſe hee ſubdued all Affrica, hee aduentured very dangerouſly, to ſaue his Father from being taken in the battell againſt Hannibal, neere vnto the River Trebra, and after the Iourney at Cannes, he ſet Rome free from the danger of Hannibal. At ſome and twenty yeeres of age, hee made the Romanes ſweare vpon his ſword, to be reſolute in defending their ſtate and country, he was ſent into Spaine, where Aſdrubal had ſlaine the other two Scipioes, hee tooke new Carthage, where he had mighty treaſure, ſtore of munition, and tooke great Lords priſoners, whom he ſent captiues to Rome, among whom was Magon, brother to Hannibal. Yee made all all Spaine tributary to Rome, hee was the firſt of the Romanes that conquered ſo farre that way, as vnto the ſtraights of Gibraltar, he was more deſirous to maintaine, then to conquer, he releaſed his priſoners, and by his bounteous and honourable demeanor, he was exceedingly beloued. MAttathias was high Prieſt, in the yeere of the world, 3795. and gouernour of the Iewes: hee ſlew a Iew openly, that offered ſacrifice to the Idols, as Antiochus commanded, he raigned one yeer, his ſonne Iudas Machabeus ſucceeded him in that dignity, in the yeere of the world, 3805. and before the birth of our Sauiour Jeſus Chriſt 157. hee dyed in warre, and raigned 12 yeeres. Read the booke of Macchabees, and Ioſephus.

Hannibal. Scipio.

HAnnibal, the Sonne of Amilcar, was 26 yeeres Captaine General of the Carthaginians, and dyed in the yeere of the world, 3774. and before the Nativity of our Sauior Jeſus Chriſt, 188. and 3 yeres after his death, Scipio Affricanus was baniſhed from Rome.

Mithridates.

MIthridates, King of Pontus, ſaying the Romanes buſied and troubled with ciuil warre, he ruinated Cappadocia, and draue out Artobarzanes, the King therof, becauſe he was a friend to the Romanes: then hee made truce with the countries of Bithynia, and Paphlagonia, from whence he had chaſed out the King. The truce was in the yeere of the world, 3876. and before the birth of our Sauiour Chriſt, 86 yeeres, then he marched vnto Epheſus, and ſent Letters throughout Aſia, commanding them to kill all the Romanes that they could finde, and thereupon were ſlaine in one day, 8000 Romanes. The cauſe of this his fell warre, and deadly malice to the Romanes, was, becauſe that Nicomedes, eſpeciall friend of the Romans, had diſturped vpon his Territoryes. Yee ſent Archelus into Achaya with fiue ſcore thouſand men, and tooke Greece, and all the Iles, except Rhodes: hee warred ſo long, and ſo fiercely, that it was called Mithridatique warre: the warre of Pyrrhus againſt the Romanes, laſted but 4 yeeres, the warre of Hannibal but 17 yeers, but the warres of Mithridates laſted 40 yeeres, euen vntill he was beaten and weakned in three great battels by Silla, Lucullus, and Pompey, and in the end he was beſieged by his owne Sonne, in a Caſtell, who cauſed him to be ſlaine, which hee well deſerued, as well for his cruelty afore ſaid, as alſo for that hee cauſed to be ſlaine, three of his owne Sonnes, and three of his owne daughters, his wife, his ſiſter, his mother, no his brother. Iulius Cæſar.

IVlius Cæſar was the firſt Emperor of Rome, in the yeere of the world, 3918. and before the birth of our Sauiour Jeſus Chriſt, 44 yeeres: he being Conſull, had 10 Legions, with commiſſion to conquer the Gaules, and Illyria, he cauſe Aſia was ſubdued by Pompey, hee was appointed to ſubiugate Europia. The Gaules and Germanes were then ſuppoſed to be the moſt ſtrong Nations: he ſubdued the Switchers, he croſſed the ſea, and came into England, in which attempt he was more vnfortunate then in all the reſt, for three ſeuerall times his men were almoſt all drowned by tempeſts, at Clermont in Auergne, hee loſt one Legion, and vpon the borders of Germany, his Captaines were ſlain by Ambuſcadoes, and as hee returned backe towards Rome, he required to be Conſull ſtill, but Marcel, Bibulus, Pompey, and Cato, reſiſted him, and was commanded to diſſolue his Campe, and returne to Rome. From this roote ſprang all the terrible ciuill warre, which preſently enſued: then he entred into armes againſt his owne Country, and thereupon, all the Senate fled into Greece with Pompey, whom Pompey ouercame at the firſt onſet. And then Pompey was ouercome in Theſſaly, by Cæſar. In his returne, he ouerthrew Pharnar, and after that, hee did many notable things: he raigned Emperour about three or foure yeeres, and was ſlaine at 56 yeeres of age.

HErod the great, the ſonne of Antipater, gouernour of Iudea: this Herod was an Idumean, and the firſt of ſtrange Nations that was King of Iudea, in the yeere of the world, 3927. and before the Nativity of our Sauiour Jeſus, 35 yeeres, and 3 yeeres before that, hee was by the Senate of Rome declared and called King of the Iewes: he was very well beloued of the Emperor Auguſtus, who to augment his Kingdome, gaue him Samaria, with the Cities and Caſtles. Herod builded a Temple & a Citty, which hee called Ceſarea, in honor of Cæſar Auguſtus: he ſent his 2 ſons, viz. Alexander and Ariſtobulus vnto Rome, to be inſtructed. Hee ouercame the Arabians, he was very cruell, as well vnto his owne wife and children, as vnto his friends and kindred, he put to death diuers Doctors of the Law, hee practiſed much craft againſt the true Meſſeme, that he ought the firſt newes of the birth of our Sauior Jeſus Chriſt, whom aboue all other he meant to put to death, and therupon cauſed the ſudden and cruell martyrdome of all the Infants of Bethelem: in this time was an earthquake in Iudea, by meanes where of there periſhed 30000 people: Read Ioſephus touching the warres of the Iewes.

AND thus much by the way, concerning theſe fortraigne and generall briefe Hiſtories: and now I will returne to the reſt of the Britiſh Hiſtory where I left, which I will continue vnto the time of the publication of this Booke: and hereafter are alſo contained many fortraigne and generall Hiſtories in their proper ſeuerall times, when as they were performed, which I haue done onely for thy vertuous delight, &c.

GVideriꝰ, the firſt ſonne of Cunobelinus, was ordained King. This man was valiant, hardy, wealthy, and truſted much in his ſtrength. And for that he thought the Romans had their tribute wrongfully, he of great courage denyed to pay the ſame. 21.

Wherefore Tiberius the Emperor purpoſed to come hither in perſon but death preuented him. Gniderius raigned 23 yeeres. Aruiragus, or rather (as the Baptaines terme him) Morigus, the youngeſt Sonne of Cunobelinus, and brother of Guiderius, was ordained King of Britaine, hee ſlew Hamon neere to a Pauen of the Sea, and threw him gobbet-meale therein: it is now called South-hampton. Hee ſtrengthened the Caſtle of Douer, and alſo the Caſtle of Richbourgh, neere vnto Sandwich in Kent. Hee raigned 28 yeeres, and was buried at Glocester.

Albeit

45. Suetonius. Tac. lib. 99.

ALbeit, the Brytaine Hiſtory doth heere place Aruiragus, yet it is probable that Cunobelinus as reſtlued, for about 40 yeeres after Chriſt, Admimus, the ſon of Cunobeline baniſhed out of Brytaine by his father, was receiued into protection by Caius Caligula the fourth Emperour, who was then ſet forward with great preparation againſt Brytaine, but when he came into the parts of Holland againſt Boſforke, hee ſtaied, writing taunting letters to the Senate, that all Brytain was yeelded vnto him, becauſe Admimus had ſo done. Afterward as though he would immediately fight a field, he caſt his men into battels and ſquadrons vpon the Seacoaſt, diſpoſing all his Engines in moſt warrelike manner (no man knowing what he meant.) This done, he himſelfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, he cauſed the Trumpets to ſound to battaile, and ſuddenly commanded them to gather Cockles and Muſcle-ſhells, and therewithall, to fill their helmets, ſaying, they were ſpoiles due to the Capitoll, and in theſe ſpoyles, hee greatly tryumphed, as though hee had ſubdued the Ocean. Hee rewarded his ſouldiours, and returned to Rome, after hee had built a high watch-Tower in token of his victory againſt the Sea, the ruines whereof are great, remayning in Hollano, but ouerflowed by the water, and to this day called the Brytons houſe, in remembrance of this ridiculous expedition againſt Brytaine, by the perſwaſion of Bericus baniſhed out of Brytaine.

CLaudius the Emperour diſpatched Aulus Plancius with an army into Brytaine, where, after diuers conflicts, when hee had received part of the Boduni into his tuition, and had ſlaine Cataracus and Togodumus, Sonnes of Cunobeline, and thereby had made the Brytaines more eager to reuenge, hee ſent for Claudius himſelfe, who with great preparation, and Elephants, came into Brytaine to his army then encamped neere the Thames, with which hee paſſed ouer into Oſſer, fought with the Brytaines, obtained the victory, tooke the chiefe city of Cunobeline, and all weapons from the Brytaines, and ſo returned to Rome: the firſt moneth after, hee ſet forth from thence, where hee tryumphed, furnaming his ſonne Britanicus: to which tryumph, he permitted not only the preſidents of Prouinces, but alſo certaine baniſhed priſoners to repaire to Rome: and amiddeſt the ſpoyles taken from the Brytaines, hee fixed on the toppe of his Palace a Crowne of Gold beſet with ſtems, and foreparts of ſhips, in token hee had vanquiſhed the Brytish Ocean. Hee behaued himſelfe very courteouſly towards diuers of his friends, in ſo much that when Plancius (a notable man) who had made voyage which he made into Brytaine, atchieued diuers notable Acts, and ſhould tryumph for the ſame, the Emperour himſelfe accompanyed him, and (the like being ſuch, that with his tryumph hee ſhould goe vp into the Capitoll) Claudius gaue him the pre-eminence, and went on the left hand.

At this time Veſpaſian, who was after Emperour, was ſent by Claudius into Brytaine, where hee fought thirty times with the Brytaines, ſubdued to the Romane Empire two worthy Nations, aboue twenty Townes, and the Ile of Wight.

OStorius was appointed Lieutenant in Brytaine for the Romanes, who at his firſt entry, in the beginning of Winter aſſayled the Brytaines, and purpoſed to penne them vp, and include them with Riuers and fortifications, wherefore the Iceny made an inſurrection, which when he had pacified with ſome ſlaughter, he marched againſt the Cangi, forraging all the Countries as hee paſſed, but was forced by new tumults to turne from them againſt the Brigants, whom with ſome ſlaughter, and promiſe of pardon, he pacified.

Then he made proviſion againſt the Silures which inhabited South-Wales, bearing themſelues bold vpon the puiſſance of Caracaus a baliant Brytaine, who being ſkilfull of the Country, remoued the warre into Shropſhire, where he fortified amongſt craggy mountaines a place ſtrong by ſituation, where neuertheleſſe the Romanes preuailed. The wife, daughter, and brethren of Caracaus were taken, and hee flying to Cartiſmandua a Queene, ruling in Yorkeſhire, was by her deliuered captiue to his enemies, nine yeeres after the warres begaune, who ſending him to Rome, was there in open aſſembly brought before Claudius, with his wife, daughter, brethren, and friends, and ſuch ſpoyles as had beene taken from him, where hee (nothing diſmayed in Spirit or Countenance) ſpake after this ſort to Claudius:

Caratacus' his Oration to Claudius.

If my immoderation of proſperous ſucceſſes had beene correſpondent to my Eſtate and Nobility, I might haue come to this Citty, rather a friend then a captiue: neither you haue diſdained to admit me into League, being deſcended of noble parentage, and Soueraigne ouer many Nations. This preſent ſtate of mine, as it is villainous toward mee, ſo it is honourable to you. I had horſe, men, money, munition, and what wonder is there, if I had loſt them vnwillingly? For, if you will rule and raigne ouer all, of neceſſitie all muſt come into ſeruery: If I had yeelded at the firſt, neyther my Fortune, nor my glory had beene renowned, and the oblivion of mee had enſued immediately after my execution: but if you ſaue my life, it ſhall be an euerlaſting example of your clemency. At theſe words Claudius remitted his offence, granted him life, and the Senate adiudged Oſtorius worthy to triumph: but in the meane time, the inhabitants of South-Wales, to reuenge Caratacus captiuity, intercepted and diſcomfited certaine bands of the Romans, amiddeſt which new warres Oſtorius tired with trauell, departed this life.

In Oſtorius time certaine Cities were giuen to Cogidumus a Brytish King, and a Colony of Romanes was planted there.

52. Tacitus, 3. Hiſto.

CLaudius ſent Didius to ſupply the place of Oſtorius now departed, but in the meane time the Silures fought fortunatly against the legions which were under the conduct of Manlius Valens. In this time warre brake out betweene Cartismanda Queene of the Brygants, and Venutius her husband, whom she refused, and matched her selfe with Velocatus his Squire: Hereupon Venutius favoured of the people, attayled her territory, and she succoured by the Romanes, after she had intercepted by treachery Venutius brother and allies, fought with him. Where, after a sharpe fight, she by the ayde of the Romans, prevayled, as also Caesius Nasica did with his legion against the Brytaines, in another place: for Didius bred others in these matters, because hee was aged, and onely kept that which others had heretofore conquered.

61. CLaudius being now poysoned by Agrippina his wife, Nero her sonne obtained the Romane Empire, and about the seventh yeare of his raigne, Veranius was appointed Lieutenant here, who dyed within the first yeere of his government, saying, that hee would have subdued Britannies, had he survived but two yeeres: but about this time great slaughter was here of the Romanes.

62. SVetonius Paulinus was then sent hither, who at his arrivall purposing to subdue Angleley, whither many Brytaines had withdrawne themselves, hee in boates with flat bottoms ferried over his footemen, bringing over his horsemen by some Fords, whereas on the shores stode closely together great numbers of Brytaines, and among them women gadding up and downe frantickely in mourning weedes, their hayre hanging about their eares, and shaking firebrands: the Druydes also casting up their hands towards heaven, thundred out cruell execrations, with which unusually affrighted, the Romanes at first stood dismayed, but after encouraged by the Generals perswasion, they burst in among them, made great slaughter, got the possession of the Ile, and felled downe the woods consecrated to superstitious rites. In the meane space the Brytaines tooke two cities belonging to the Romanes, and slew 80000. of their people, and the whole Ilwo revolted: and to the Romanes reproach, the slaughter was committed by a woman, being foretolde them by many strange signes and tokens. For in the court was heard a noyse with much slaughter. In the Theatre a great tumult and much wondring, when there was no man there, that either spake by mone or deede. Besides, in the River of Thames certaine houses or buildings were seene. The Image of the goddesse Victoria in the Temple of Camulodunum (which is Maldon in Essex as W. Camden writeth) turned her backe as though shee had yeelded to her enemies: the women raune as madde here and there, saying, and singing, Destruction is at hand.

Finally, betwixt the Ilands and France, the Ocean Sea appeared as it flowed with blood.

The occasion of this warre was a confiscation of the Brytaines goods, which being remitted by Claudius the Emperour, Decianus Catus then Procurator of the Ile, sayd that it ought to have bene rented. To this cause was added, that whereas (against their willes Seneca had lent them 40. Sesterces upon great Usury) he now with great force and all kinde of violence compelled them to pay all the whole summe at one payment, and also perswaded them to make warre on the Romanes.

Bunducia of Brytaine, a woman of noble byth, not onely with much honour ruled amongst them, but also was the soveraigne in their warres, and had indeed a Romache more manly then womanlike: who having gotten together an army of 120000. men, got her upon her seat made of Parish turues, after the manner of the Romanes, and being a tall woman, of comely shape, and severe countenance, sharpe voyce, with yellow hayre hanging downe to her skirtes (Ponticus Virunius saith to her thighes) shee ware a great chaine of gold, and had on her backe a coate of sundry colours, and a plaited Kirtle. When shee was thus apparelled, and had in her hands a great speare, shee spake unto them to this effect:

First shee commended liberty, shewing them how poverty with liberty, was farre better than great riches in misery and bondage: on the other side, with great eloquence shee declared the mischiefes and calamities they suffered at the hands of Romanes, who exacting Tributes of payments, so oppressed them, that much better it were once to die, then long to live in such extreame slavery.

Secondly shee reproved them, for not expelling their enemies, as their forefathers had done Iulius Caesar, Claudius, and Caligula: and against shee prayed them for their present readinesse to helpe her, and recover their ancient state.

Thirdly, shee disabled the Romanes, for that they were few, combred with armour, and so faint of courage, that they had rather fight a farre off, then encounter with them by handstrokes: shee commended the Brytanes, to be more in number, of greater valour, and farre more able to abide hunger, cold, thirst, rayne, winde, heat, &c. shee added the vantage of the place, as being at home, where the woods and ryvers, lakes, and all other things were well knowne to every one of them.

Lastly, shee exhorted them to shew themselves as Dogges and Wolues among fearefull Hares and Foxes: wherewithall shee let out of her lappe a quicke Hare, thereby to learne the event of her enterprize. The Hare having a prosperous passage, all the multitude gave a great showte, and Bunducia clapping her hands gave thankes to her gods, that thee ruled not the Romanes, as did Nero (who though he were a man, yet was in deed but a woman, for that hee sang and played on the Harpe) but the Brytaines, who esteemed it better to be Warriours then Plow-men, who, as they had to all all things in common, so had they both wives and children, and that having a kingdome amongst such a kinde of people, she prayed their divine aydes against a spitefull and wicked kinde of men, if they were to be called men, who lived hot baths, dainty fare, Wine, ointments, lay in soft beds, and were ballails to such a wanton Minstrell as their Emperour Nero was.

Bunducia having spoken these and such like amongst her people, with all her hoste shee set forward against the Romanes, who at that time were without Head or Governour, for that Paulinus was gone with his army into Iland neere Brytaine, by meanes whereof Bunducia tooke two of their Cities, and committed the notable slaughter before remembred.

Shee exercised all kinde of cruelty on such men as shee tooke. As for the noble women that shee gate, shee hanged them up, and cut off their Pappes, and sewed them to their mouthes: besides this, she stretching their bodies out at length, thrust sharpe stakes cleane thorow them: all which things were done in despight, when they sacrificed and feasted in their Temples, but specially in the wood called Andates.

Paulinus, who had now subdued Angleley, hearing of the foresayd slaughter, returned to Brytaine, yet would hee not adventure the fortune of battell with them, fearing their number, but when hee wanted victuall, and that his enemies approched, hee was compelled to abide the battaile. Bunducia, who had in her army 230000 men, was her selfe placed in a Chariot, and ordered her men at length: but Paulinus could not stretch his company so long, for that they were not of any such number: but at length hee divided his army into three parts, so that at one time they might fight in sundry places, exhorting them not to bee abashed at the multitude of their enemies, for both they and their forefathers had with lesse number atchieved greater matters, and gotten greater Victories. Adding, that now was the time to play the men, to enjoy that in quiet, which before their Ancestors had won, and recover that which they had lost, or else to live for ever in misery and shame. Againe, hee shewed what cruelty their eyes had seene, by those barbarous people, to such as they had overcome, exhorting them in revenge thereof to fight manfully, and there was no doubt but the gods (who were alwayes favourable to such as had suffered cruelty) would helpe them: and better it were to dye fighting valiantly, then with reproach to be taken, and dye in their enemies hands like dogges. Finally (saith hee) whether we live or dye, Brytaine shall bee ours: for though the other Romanes lose it, yet shall our bones continually keepe it. When hee had thus spoken, the signe of the battaile was given, and each part prepared himselfe: the Brytaines with great and strange noyse, the Romanes in silence came so neere, that they might throw their Darts to them: and perceiving their enemies to approach, with great violence they shed in amongst them, and brake their array: but after being compassed with the multitudes of their enemies, the battaile waxed doubtfull. The light harnessed men became to smite each other, and those of heavy armour together with the Horsemen encountred, and the Romane Archers fought against the Brytish Chariots. They which fought without brest-plates, were slaine with Darts. This encounter was made in three severall places, and was fought with great courage on both sides.

At the last, the Romanes departed Conquerours, many were slaine in the battaile, and many were taken. Great numbers which escaped, prepared to fight againe, but in the meane space Bunducia died of a disease which shee had, and they mourned, and buried her very honourably. After, those that remained were easily overcome and dispersed.

Tacitus saith, that Prasutagus King of the Iceni, a Prince of great wealth, appointed, that Caesar and his owne two daughters should inherite his lands, hereby thinking all his life to be more quiet, and being deceased, his wife and daughters should bee the more safe by meanes of such protection: but it fell out farre otherwise, for the Centurions got his Realme, their servants spoyled his house, beat his wife, and deflowred his daughters: others, the chiefe men of his Land were displaced of their inheritances, and handled cruelly. In revenge whereof Bunducia raised the warre, and committed the slaughter before remembred, and at last, her army once overthrowne by Paulinus, being afraid to fall into her enemies hands, shee poysoned her selfe.

THis yeere 67. being the eleventh yeere of Nero the Tyrant, he caused the Citty of Rome to be set on fire, and the same fire continued six dayes, and seven nights, onely because he would see the likenes of the fire that consumed the great Citty of Troy: and in the time of Titus Vespasianus, the Citty of Rome was on fire three dayes together.

POlicletus then a servant of Nero, was sent hither to survey the state of Brytaine, who discharged Paulinus Suetonius of the government.

PEtronius Turpilianus was sent into Brytaine as a man fitte to be entreated, and being not altogether agrainted with offences of the enemies, was the readier to come to grace: who setting matters in their former stay, and attempting no further, moderated the Province unto rebellious Quietnes. Trebellius being both faint-hearted and too sluggish, and also utterly unacquainted with experiments of armes, ruled the Province with a certaine mildnes of government. Now for his barbarous barbarous people also learned to winke at intiſing tires, and the ciuill warres of the Romans then happening, was a cloake to his cowardize: but there preſently aroſe diſcord betwéne Roſcius and Carbus, legates of the 20. legion, when the ſouldiours (accuſtomed to be employed in expeditions) gaue themſelues to laſciuiouſnes: whereupon Trebellius take his flight, and hid his head, to auoyde the fury of the army, and in moſt baſe and beaſtly manner, gouerned (as it were) by entreaty, ſo as they might ſéeme to haue compaſſioned, that the ſouldiours ſhould liue in all libertie, and the Generall at his faſety. This time for a yeere and a halfe there was deadly ciuill warre among the Romanes for the Empire, betwéene Galba, Otho, and Vitellius.

Cap. Veſpaſius Volanus.

VEſpaſius Volanus then was ſent hither by Vitellius, he did not vſe any diſcipline or correction in Byptaine, ſo as there continued the like ſloth and cowardize in his ſouldiors, toward their enemies, and the Campe ſtill as full of watonneſſe, ſauing that Volanus was a good and milde man, and thereby made himſelfe beloued where he ſhould haue béene feared. In this time, Vitellius aduanced many ſouldiers in the Byptaine legions, and Herodonius Flaccus brought vnto him 8000. choſen men of warr out of Byptaine. The Byptains ſeing the Romans thus encombred with ciuill war, began to trouble them: wherefore Volanus would ſend no ſuccour to Vitellius at his commandement, when Veſpaſian warred againſt him for the Empire, and all the Byptaines fauoured Veſpaſian.

Cap. 70.

VVHen as (with the reſt of the world) Veſpaſian had recouered Byptaine, then were there placed great Captaines, and notable armies, the enemies hope abated, and Petilius Cerealis brought great feare vpon the Byptaines. The city of the Brigants (which was accounted one of the greateſt of the land) being by him aſſayled, he had many encounters, and ſome not without ſlaughter, whereby he opther conquered or aſſayled a great part of their countrey.

Petilius Cerealis.

Iulius Frontinus.

Iulius Frontinus, a man as worthy and valiant as was poſſible, take then the charge vpon him, and ſubdued the nation of the Silures, being both valiant and warlike, notwithſtanding the valour of the enemy and difficulties of the places.

Iulius Agricola.

THis was the ſtate of Byptaine, and courſe of the warres, which Agricola found arraying in the middeſt of Summer, the ſouldiours euen then beginning to retire to their ſtrengthes, and the enemy ſearching for his moſt aduantage.

The City of the Ordouices, few dayes before his arriuall, almoſt wholly defeated a company lying vpon their borders. This beginning ſtirred vp the Prouince, ſerving for an example to them, how to conceiue the warres, and yet deſired to ſée what was in their new gouernour. Agricola, although the Summer were now well ſpent, the bands diſperſed al about the prouince, the ſouldiours had determined to reſt for that yéere, the time being late and incommodious to commence the warre, thinking it would be better to man the places moſt ſuſpected: yet he determined nenertheleſſe to preuent danger, and gathering together the Standards of the Legions, with a few of his forayne aydes, for that the Ordouices durſt not take the field, marched forth againſt them himſelfe in the vaward of his army, that others might take like courage in the ſame danger, and put almoſt that whole nation to the ſword: then following his good ſucceſſe, he inuaded Angleſey (which Suetonius had before attempted) cauſing certaine Byptaines that ſerued him, and knew the hauens and manner of ſwimming, with horſe, and harneſſe to paſſe ouer into the Ile on a ſuddaine, wherewith the inhabitants were ſo amazed (who fearing nothing becauſe they ſaw no nauie) that they ſubmitted the Ile vnto him immediately. Now hauing ſome quietneſſe, and perceuing that war would little preuaple againſt the Byptaines, if they were iniuriouſly handled, he purpoſed to cut off all cauſes of quarell, and firſt reforming his own family, did nothing partially, onely reſpected the vertus of men, loolened tributes, and behaued himſelfe moſt honourably. And thus much the firſt yéere.

Tacitus.

The death of the holy Apoſtle Saint Peter.

THis yéere 70. being the 14. yéere of Nero, Baſſus and Tuſcus being then Romane Conſuls, the holy Apoſtle Saint Peter hauing accompliſhed his preaching in the weſt parts, returned to Rome, where he preached againe as he did before, and was therefore apprehended, and araigned as a villaine and odious Traytor to the Romane Emperor, by reaſon he daily and openly preached that Jeſus Chriſt was the Son of the liuing God, Kings of Kings, and Lord of heauen and earth: and therefore (as ſaith Saint Chryſoſtome) he was executed in an out-place vpon a Croſſe, as was vſed vpon haynous offenders, and theeues, and baſe perſons: but when he came to the place of execution, in ſigne of true humility, he refuſed to be crucified, ſtanding vpright, ſaying his Lord and maſter was crucified on that manner, and thereupon cauſed himſelfe to be nayled to the Croſſe, with his féete vpward and his head downward: but they durſt not execute Saint Paul on that manner, nay vpon a Croſſe, becauſe hee was a free Romane, and therefore they admitted to him an honourable death, and in a place of reſpect.

When the Summer began, he aſſembled his armies, trained his ſouldiers, forraged the enemies countries, with ſuddaine inuaſions to their great feare, & put to fauourably, as many countries willingly yeelded vnto him, and ſuffered Caſtles to be built among them. The Winter following he ſpent in ciuil adminiſtratiō, counſelling the people priuately, and helping them publickly to build houſes, Temples and Court-houſes. He procured noble mens children to ſtudie liberall Sciences, and then began the Byptaines to conforme themſelues to Roman faſhions and attyre.

The third yéere hee diſcouered people in the North hitherto vnknowne, euen as far as Tay, terrifying the people, and placing fortreſſes moſt wiſely to the annoyance of the enemy.

The fourth Summer hee employed, getting thoſe Countries which hitherto he had paſſed thozow, euen to Odenbozough, Frith, and Cluid, the narrow ſpace betweene the which waters he fortified.

The fift yéere, by Sea he diſcouered and vanquiſhed further nations in the North, and placed Garriſons in the coaſt toward Ireland, whereunto he alſo aſpired, and to that end retained an Irith Prince with him, that was oppoſed out of his Countrey by ciuill diſſention.

But in the Summer which begunne the firſt yeere of his gouernment, he ſearched the hauens by a nauy for that purpoſe ſent to the Sea, ſearing leſt all thoſe nations beyond had united themſelues and kept the paſſages by land: but afterward he marched forward, his Nauie coaſting with his army by land, ſo as ſometime in the ſame Campe, he had horſemen, footmen, and Sea-men, lodged together. It was reported by ſuch as were taken priſoners, that the ſight of the Nauy much aſſonied the Byptaines as men from whom all refuge was cut off, the ſecrets of their ſeas being diſcouered: wherefore determining to trie it with hand blowes, the inhabitants of Calidonia with great preparation, although the repoyt thereof were greater (as it often happeneth in vnknowne matters) of their olone accord aſſayled ſome Caſtles, and ſeing themſelues rather to be aſſayled then defendants, put the Romanes in ſome doubt: whereupon the cowards pretending policie, aduiſed to retire on this ſide Bobotria, rather then to be driuen thereto by force, when as in the meane while, Agricola knowing that the enemy would charge him in ſeuerall troupes and companies, and fearing to be ouer-matched and coupled in with number, or deceiued by the ignorance of the place, diuided his army into three battels, and ſo marched forward: which order marked by his enemies, made them alter their purpoſe, and in the night killing the watch, brake in vpon the 9. legion, halfe aſleepe and halfe affrighted, which (as they tooke it) was the weakeſt, and ſo the fight continued within the Campe til it was day light, at which time the Romanes hearing the ſound of the Byptaines horne to gather courage, and the Byptaines deceiued, ſo as, had it not béene for the woods and bogges, that victory had ended the whole ſtrife, after which battell the Romane ſouldiours grew to be of haute corrage, crying out to pierce the country of Caliconia, that they might finde out the vttermoſt ports and bounds of Byptaine. The Romanes on the other ſide, aſſeruing the peace of this victory, put to the proweſſe of the Romane ſouldier, but to Fortune and the willines of their Captain, vſed all meanes poſſible, to hearten vp and arme their youth, beſtowing their wiues and children in places of ſafegard, and by ſacrifices and holy aſſemblies vnite all their Cities togother: vpon theſe reſolutions they remoued.

In the beginning of the next ſommer, which was the 8. yeere of his charge, Agricola ſending his fleete before him, which often put alarus and ſpopled the Countries, thereby cauſing a great and vnextame feare: himſelfe with a picked army, wherevnto he added of the valiantſt Byptaines, came to the mountaine Grampius, whereon his enemies had encamped, (for the Byptains nothing quailed by the ſucceſſe of the former encounter, and expecting nothing but a reuenge, or bondage, learning at length, that common danger is onely to bee reſiſted with common conſent) by leagues and meſſages had ſtirred vp the minds of all the Cities about. Now were there to be in armies 30. thouſand and vpward, vnto which number, for youth, and old age, and ſuch as were of ſtrength and luſty yeeres, euery man bearing his token of prayſe about him, continually repayred from all ſides. Their hart continually repyned from all ſides. Their hart amongſt many other Captaines, Calgacus a man both in nobility and valor aboue the reſt, ſpake to the aſſembly in this manner: As often as I behold the cauſes of this warre and our neceſſity, my minde (my men of Byptaine) and your manifeſt conſent, tell me the beginning of liberty to all Byptaine: for, euery one of you hauing tryed ſeruitude, and hauing no othe land nor ſea, which can ſafe us (the Romance maſte being at our elbowes) the very warre and weapons by which are the honour of the worſt, muſt be our only ſafety of the inuincible hearted. With theſe and ſuch reaſons Calgacus drawne from the cuſtome of their gouernours, the pride and inſolency of their gouernours, the fickle felowſhip of the Romanes ſeruing in their enemies campe, ready to change vpon euery high occaſion, and the preſent remoue of all miſery, which as he ſaid in the beginning, was onely valiancy, he ſo ſtirred vp all mens minds, that they applauded his Oration after their manner, with ſongs and diuers kind of noyſes. This Oration being ended, as alſo Agricola his ſpeech to his ſouldiours, the Byptaines began to encounter. Agricola placed his battailes in this order: he made the maine battell of the ſtrangers (of whom 8. thouſand, on each ſide thereof, for wings he placed his Byptaines to the number of 3000. and his legion he caſed to guard the trenches of his Campe, that if there ſhould happen any vnlucke to be giuen without the bloodying of Romane blud, or if his maine battaile were broken, they might be gathered againe, and the fight renued by his legions. The battaile of the Byptaines (of terrible their enemies, as alſo to their owne becauſe thoſe, ſtood on higher ground, ſo as their battered helmes came ouer the plaine, the reſt were on the ſide of the hill their Charriots in the meane time gallopping vp and downe the field, making great ſhoutes and crie. Then the Byptaines ſeeing the number of his enemies to be greater then his owne, and fearing to be charged on both the face and flanke of his battaile at one time, and that many thought it neceſſary to make the wings aduance forward, remained not without reaſon vnmoued in his firſt reſolution, cauſing his battaile battaile to be somewhat drawne in length, himselfe alighted from his horse, and stood on foote before his standards. The first fight was with shotte of arrowes and darts, during which time the Brytaines, both skilfully, and couragiously with their huge Swords and small Bucklers, either bare or brake the Romanes shotte, and answered them with an infinite number of the like, untill Agricola was perswaded by bands of Hollanders, and Brabanders, that the matter might be brought to swords & hand-strokes, which kind of fight they were acquainted withall, by long hunting the warres, and the same was very incommodious for their enemies, bearing but small shields, and unmeasureable swords. For the pointlesse swordes of Brytaines, were unfit for a throng, and where they wanted roome. Wherefore the Hollanders strake thicke together, and thrust them over the Bucklers, wounding them in the faces, and having broken that battaile, passed forward toward them which kept the hill, which seene by the rest of the Romanes bands, they partly moued by enuie of the others glory, and partly by heat of their owne courages, cut in peeces those that they first encountred, leauing notwithstanding, some halfe dead and others not touched, for haste to obtaine a perfect victorie. In the meane while, the troups of the Brytain horsemen, did take their flight, but the Chariots put themselues piecemeale among the footebands, which kinde of fight, (at first) seemed somewhat terrible to their enemies, but it long serued not their turnes, being assayled with a thicke preasse of their enemies, and the ground not commodious for the Chariots, nor their riders all of the best. So as at the last, their Chariot-horses, coursing up and downe the fielde without guiders, ouerranne many of their own companie, as they fled for feare from one place to another. The Brytaines, which all this while kept the hill, and came not to the fight, making little reckoning of the small number of the Romanes, beganne by little and little to descend, intending to enuirone them in, in the middest of their conquest, which surely they had done if Agricola, suspecting the same, had not dispatched foure companies of horsemen (which hee kept for all soddaines) to encounter with them, who the more fiercely they assailed, so much the more sharpely repulsed them, and sent them to flight: whereupon the deuice of the Brytaines turned to their own harme. Moreouer, by Agricola his commandement, the wings of the horsmen were taken from the front of this battel and were made to charge vpon the battel of his enemies, standing ouer-against them. Then might you behold in the open field, a grieuous and lamentable spectacle. Some followed the chase, some tooke prisoners, and after killed them to take others. Now the enemies as euery one thought best, fled, some in heapes and armed fled from a smaller number: other, though vnarmed, tarried and were slaine: euery where lay weapons, carkasses, and lymbs cut off, the ground all bloody: sometimes the vanquished approching neere to Victors, would make head, and entrappe the heedelesse followers, so as if Agricola had not caused certaine lustie bands in the manner of a search, and also diuers horsemen, leauing their horses where the Woods were thick, and others on horseback where the wods would suffer, to range them all about, there might haue bene some detriment receiued by the much hardiness. But when the Brytaines saw themselues pursued in order of battell, they tooke againe their flight, not in companies as before, nor tarrying one for another, but here and there, euen as men glad to escape, sought long and by-wayes. Night and wearinesse of slaughter ended the chase. There were slaine of the Brytaines about 10000. of the Romane army, 340. among whom was Aulus Atticus, Captaine of a band, whom the heate of his youth, and courage of his horse brought into the hands of his enemies. That night the victors made merry with the spoils, but the Brytaines, wandring vp and downe, men and women lamenting together, relieued and fetcht away their hurt men, assembled together the whole, forsook their houses, and for anger set fire on them, chusing themselues lurking places, which straight they forsake againe: sometime conceiuing good hope, which straightway quayled againe: and some were knowen to kill their wiues and children, as though they had therein taken compassion vpon them. The next day made the victory more manifest, in which there was nothing but silence, the hils being then forsaken, and allo the houses smoaking a farre off.

Agricola sending abroad his espialls, could finde no enemy to make head, wherefore summer being too farre spent to proceed any further in the warre, he had his Souldiers into the coasts of the Horestij, and there taking hostages caused his nauie to coast about Brytain, which at last arriued at the Hauen called Trutulensis, afterward hauing beholden his Souldiers in their winkering places, departed Brytaine, and left the prouince in quiet to his successor.

Diuers authors affirme, that about this time, the Gospell of Christ our Sauiour was first Preached in this Iland. Nicephorus a Greeke author in his second booke, 40. Chapter, hath as followeth. Simon borne in Cana Galilei, who for his feruent affection to his Master, and great zeale he take by all meanes to the Gospell, was surnamed Zelotes, he hauing receiued the holy Ghost from aboue, trauailed through Egypt and Affrick, then through Mauritanie and all Lybia, preaching the Gospell. And the same Doctrine he brought to the occidentall sea, and the Iles called Brytaniæ, &c. And in the 3. Book and 1. Chap. he saith, The holy Apostles (like as wee haue declared already) being dispersed throughout the whole earth, did diuide the prouinces amongst them by lot, to preach the Gospell in. Peter vndoubtedly first at Jerusalem, then in Galatia, Bythinia, with the higher Asia, Cappadocia, and all Italy, taught the Gospell: John in Asia, who ended his life there. Indians, and the Ile of Taprobane did publish the Gospell: Another chose Egypt and Lybia: another the vttermost coasts of the Ocean, with the Iles of Brytaine, &c. Dorotheus writeth thus: Simon Zelotes, passing through Mauritania, and Affrica, preached Christ, at length was crucified, slaine and buried in Brytaine, or rather Bithania. Also he saith, Aristobulus, whom the Apostle to the Romanes remembreth, was made a Bishoppe in Brytaine or Bithania. George Maior writeth in a preface, that immediatly after Christs resurrection vnder Claudius the Emperour, the light of the Gospell was kindled in Brytaine by Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Christ. Tertullian writing against the Iewes of those times, saith: The Brytains inhabitants of places vnknown to the Romanes, yet did obey and were subiect to the Kingdome of Christ. William of Malmesbury, in his booke of the antiquities of Glastenbury, allegeth Freculphus to write in his second booke and 4th chapter, as followeth: Philip the Apostle, preaching the Word of God in Gaule, (now called France) chose out 12 amongst his Disciples whom he sent into Brytain to preach the Word of life, and vpon euery one of them, he most deuoutly stretched out his right hand: ouer these he appointed for chiefe, his deare friend Ioseph of Arimathea, that buried our Lord. These (saith Iohn Capgraue, who alledgeth Melkin and Merlin) came into this Land, the yeer of Christs Incarnation 36. in the time of Aruiragus, who gaue to them the Ile of Aualon, where they builded an Oratory of wythen wands, and after there were buried: which place being since encreased, and newly builded by diuers Princes, was named Glastenbury. For confirmation whereof King Henry the second (as himselfe in his Charter affirmeth) hauing diligently perused the Priuileges and Charters, which he caused to be presented and read, not onely of William the first, of William the second, & Henry the first his Grandfather: but also the Charters of the Princes, his predecessors, of more ancient times, to wit, Edgar, Edmond, Edward, Elfred, Bringwalthus, Kenthwin, Baldred, Ina, Arthur, and that noble man, Cudred, and many other Christian Kings beside, also of Kenewalla, sometime a Heathen and Pagan King, concerning the house of Glastenbury, found that in some of those Charters, it is called The Mother of Saints: of some other, The Graue of the Saints, and that the said place was first builded euen by the very Disciples of Christ themselues, and by them dedicated to our Lord, as the first place which hee chose to himselfe in this Realme: all which is to be, the foresaid King Henry established by his Charter: which Charter my selfe haue seene and read.

MArius, Sonne of Aruiragus, an excellent Wise man, was ordained King of Brytaine. At this season, Rodrike, King of the Picts, (which were people of Scythia,) accompanied with the Scots, inuaded Brytaine, and spoyled the country with sword and fire, against whom, Marius with his Knights, assembled in all haste, and gaue them sharpe battell, wherein Rodrike was slaine, with a great number of his souldiers vpon Stanmore, in token of which victory, there was a stone not farre from Carlile erected with this inscription, In token of Marius victory. To them which remained, Marius gaue inhabitance in the further part of Scotland. And forsomuch as the Brytaines disdained to giue to them their daughters in marriage, they acquainted them with the Irishmen, and married their daughters, and grew in processe of time to a great people. He repaired, walled and fortified the city of Caerlegion, now called Chester. He raigned 53 yeeres.

THis yeere 74 being the second yeere of the raigne of Vespatian the Emperour, the glorious Temple and City of Jerusalem was vtterly destroyed by fire, being 1101 yeer after the foundation of the Temple by Salomon, and the reuerent Beda saith, it was 1492 yeeres after the building thereof by Salomon, and 590 yeeres after, it was redified in the second yeere of Darius.

The destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple.

HElius, surnamed Adrianus, the 15 Emperour of the Romanes, beganne his raigne in the yeere of our Redemption, 119. hee raigned 21 yeeres, and in his time, the Vniuersity or Study of Philosophy in Athens, was transferred to Rome, and in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne, he erected a godly Library in the City of Athens.

The Vniuersity of Athens transferred to Rome.

This Adrianus caused his owne Statua to be set vp in the very same place of the Temple in Jerusalem, where the Ark of God vsed to stand: but the yoke remainder of the distressed Iewes, inhabiting part of the ruines, would not permit it, but with one consent put it out of that place, whereat the Emperor became sore inraged, and forthwith expelled all Iewes from Jerusalem, vtterly raced the City, not leauing one stone vpon another, either of the walls, or any other building whatsoeuer, and straightly commanded that the City should neither be repayred nor inhabited, and that the Iewes should be dispersed, and held bagabonds: this was done in the yeere of our Lord, 130.

Jerusalem made desolate as our Sauiour had foretold.

And about the same, time Pope Thelesphorus constituted the foure dayes fasting, and abstayning from flesh, comonly called Lent. This Pope was martyred in the 4 yeere of the raigne of Antonius the Emperor, surnamed The godly, and in the 14 yeere of the foresaid Adrianus, Galen the great Phylician flourished, and was very famous in Rome: hee liued 87 yeeres, and wrote many worthy bookes.

DOmitianus the Emperour sent Salustius Luculius into Brytaine, whom he shortly put to death, for that he suffered certain Lawes to be called Luculleu, after his name. Some write that Cneus Trebullius was now gouernour heere.

ANtonius Pius succeeded Hadrianus in the Empire, and gouerned this Prouince by Lollius Vrbicus, who ouercame the Bytaines, and raised another wall of turffes, to keepe out the incodes of the Northerne Bytaines.

ANtonius Philosophus now ruled the Romaine Empire, and Calpharnius Agricola was sent hither with authority against the Bytaines, then repining at the Romanes, but with what successe it is not specified.

LVcius the son of Coilus, was ordained King, who in all his Acts and Deedes followed the steps of his forefathers, in such wise as hee was of all men loued and dread. Hee sent his two Ambassadors, Eluanus and Medwinus, two learned men in the Scriptures, with his louing letters to Elutherius, Bishop of Rome, desiring him to send some deuout and learned men, by whose instruction, both he and his people might be taught the faith and Religion of Christ: whereof Eluctherius being very glad, baptized these two messengers, making Eluanus a Bishop, and Medwinus a teacher, and sent also with them into Bytaine, two famous Clarkes, Faganus and Deruuianus, by whose diligence, Lucius, and his people of Bytaine were baptized, and instructed in the faith of Christ: Temples were made Cathedrall Churches, and Bishoppes placed where Flamines before had bene: at London, Yorke, and Carlion vpon Vske, (now saint Dauids in Wales) were placed Archbishops: thus farre after the common opinion, and Writers of that time. True it is, that till this day, there remaineth in Somersetshire, in the Deanery of Dunsto, a parish church bearing the name of S. Deruian, as a Church erected & first founded, or to him dedicated. To the confirmation whereof, the reuerend Beda writeth thus: In the yeer 156 Marcus Aurelius Verus, the 14 Emperour after Augustus, gouerned the Empire, with his brother Aurelius Commodus. In whose time, Eluctherius, a godly man, being Pope of the Church of Rome, Lucius, King of Bytaine wrote vnto him, desiring that by his commandement hee might be made a Christian: which his request was granted him, whereby the Bytaines receiuing then the faith, kept it sound and vndefiled in rest and peace, vntill Diocletian the Emperours time. Thus farre Beda, of that matter, which may suffice to proue the Christian faith, then to bee receiued here, but Beda speaketh nothing of such an Epistle sent by Eluctherius to Lucius, as some haue ascribed vnto him, I onely finde the same entred in a booke intitled: Constitutions, pertaining to the Guild-hall of London, misdated in the Latine, as the English following thereth.

The yeere after Christs birth, 169. Pope Eluctherius did write to Lucius King of Britain, for the amendment of the Kings and the Nobility of Bytaine as followeth. You required that wee should send you the Romane and Imperiall Lawes, that you might vse them in your kingdome of Bytaine, but those Lawes wee may disprooue, and not the Lawes of God. You haue receiued lately through Gods goodnesse in your kingdome, the faith and Law of Christ, you haue there in your kingdome, both Testaments, out of them by Gods grace, and the aduice of your Realme take a Law, and thereby patiently gouerne the kingdome. You are the Vicar of God in your kingdome, according to the kingly Prophet. The earth is the Lords, and his fulnesse is the whole World, and all that dwell therein: and againe, Thou hast loued righteousnesse, and hated iniquity, wherefore God (euen thy God) hath anoynted thee with the oyle of gladnesse aboue thy fellowes. They are the Kings children, Christian nations, & people of your kingdome, that liue and consist vnder your protection, peace and kingdome according to the Scripture: as an Hen gathereth her chickens vnder her wings, the people and Nations of the kingdome of Bytaine is yours, such as are diuided, you should gather them together to the Law of Christ: his holy Church to peace and concord: and cherish, maintaine, protect, gouerne and defend them from the iniurious malice, and their enemies. Woe be to that kingdome, the King whereof is a childe, and the Princes eate early in the morning. I do not call a King a childe for his youth or minority, but for his folly, iniquity, and madnes, according to the Kingly Prophet. The bloodthirsty and deceitfull men shall not outliue halfe their daies. By eating, we shall vnderstand Gluttony: by Gluttony, Luxury: by Luxury, all filth, wickednesse and mischiefe, according to King Salomon: Wisedome will not enter into a spitefull soule, nor inhabit in a body subiect to sinne. A King hath his name of gouerning, and not of his kingdome: so long you shall bee a King, as you rule well, otherwise you shall not be so named, and lose that name, which God forbid. God grant that you may so rule your Realme of Bytaine, that you may raign with him euerlastingly, whose Vicar you are in the said Kingdome. To whome with the Father, &c.

There remaineth in the Church of Saint Peter vpon Cornhill at London, a Table, wherein is written that Lucius founded the same Church to be an Archbishops sea, and made it the Metropolitan and chiefe Church of his kingdome, which so endured the space of 400 yeeres, vnto the comming of Saint Augustine.

The Archbishops names, I finde onely to be set downe by Iocelyn of Furnes, in his booke of Bytish Bishops, and not elsewhere.

Iocelyn of Furnes.

1 Thean (saith hee) was the first Archbishop of London, in the time of Lucius, who builded the said Church of Saint Peter in a place called Cornhill in London, by the aide of Ciran, chiefe butler to king Lucius.

2 Eluanus was the second, and hee builded a Library to the same Church adioyning: and conuerted many of the Druides (learned men in the Pagans Law) to the Christian faith.

Thus much out of Iocelyn of the Archbishops: the credits whereof, I leaue to the iudgement of the learned: for I read of a Bishop of London (not before named) in the yeere of Christ, 326. to be present at the second Councell holden at Arlas, in the time of Constantine the Great, who subscribed thereunto in these words: Ex prouincia Brytannia ciuitate Londinensi Restitutus Episcopus: as plainely appeareth in the first Tome of the Councels. Hee writeth not himselfe Archbishop, and therefore maketh that matter of Archbishops doubtfull, or rather ouerthroweth that opinion.

Godfathers and Godmothers instituted.

10 COmmodus after his father Antonius Philosophus succeeded in the Empyre with most cruell tyranny. In his time the Northerne Bytaines burst in thorow the wall, foraged the countrey, and slew the Romane Generall with his souldiers: wherefore Vlpius Marcellus was appointed here a carefull vigilant Captaine: he sore annoyed the Bytaines, which were enemies to the Romane state, and purchasing enuy by his vertue, was shortly dismissed. 181.

Dion.

20 Then Ceronnis who ruled all vnder Commodus, appointed certaine men of base estate to gouerne the Romane enemies here, wherewith the souldiours being grieued, sent 15000. chosen men out of their number to Rome, who accusing him before Commodus to compasse the Empyre for his Sonne, was deliuered vnto them, who immediately mangled him, and slew his wife with his two Sonnes.

Lampridius, Dion.

30 Commodus then sent Helnius Pertinax into Bytaine, and surnamed himselfe Brytannicus, thereunto perswaded by flatterers, when the Bytaines were to euill affected toward him, that they would haue nominated some other Emperour against him, and namely Pertinax: but these tumults were appeased by the wisedome of Pertinax to his great danger, for hee was well neere slaine in a tumult, and left among the dead, which iniury he after seuerally reuenged, and sued for his discharge, being afterward preferred to the Empyre.

Lampridius.

Capitolinus.

40 Clodius Albinus was then sent hither by Commodus, who at the first so greatly esteemed of him, that he honoured him with the Title of Cæsar, which Clodius refused: but afterwards when a false rumor was dispersed, that Commodus was slaine, he made an Oration to the legions of Bytaine, impeaching the gouernment of Emperors, and preferring the Senate: whereupon Commodus being sharpned against him, sent Iunius Seuerus to rule heere, and shortly after, Commodus was slaine.

Capitolinus.

PErtinax then was chosen Emperour, and within three moneths was slaine through the perswasions of Didius Iulianus, who enioyed the Empyre two moneths, and the practice of Clodius Albinus, which then returned into Bytaine, and (as it seemeth) recouered his former gouernment. 194.

50 SEuerus, after the death of Pertinax was saluted Emperor: he immediately slew Didius Iulianus, and because he feared Clodius Albinus with his Bytaine legions, he created him Cæsar, and partaker of the Empyre, and sent Heraclitus to gouerne this Ile: but after hee had subdued Niger, who also usurped the Empyre, hee moued warre against Albinus, who passing hence into France with the 194.

Anno mundi. 5114 Anno Christi, 162. Eluctherius by his prudent to cure Lucius.

Marcus Aurelius Anthonius, surnamed the Iust, he was the 17 Emperour of the Romanes, in the yeere of Christ, 162. hee raigned 19 yeeres, and began his raigne with his brother Lucius Anneus Anthonius. The forenamed Marcus Aurelius was very peacefull, bountifull, and magnificent, very learned in the Greeke and Latine, and a good Philosopher by nature, he married Faustina, daughter to Anthonius the godly, and it chanced one day, that two excellent skilfull men in feates of armes, performed diuers valiant combates before the Emperour and the Empresse: Faustina the Empresse beholding them earnestly, became very deeply enamoured with one of them, and from that time she beganne to langnish, in such apparant sort, as thee was constrained to manifest the same vnto her husband the Emperor, who presently by the aduice of Physicians, of Chaldea, caused the party to be slaine with whom thee was in loue, and anoynted her with his blod, and so Faustina was cured of her disease and temptation. Read Martin in his Chronicle.

The Capitol and Library in Rome burnt.

This yeere 182 Lucius Aurelius Anthonius surnamed Cómodus, the 18 Emperor of Rome, begamne his raigne, and in the 9 yeere of his raigne, the Capitol and Library of Rome were burned and quite spoyled, and the Temple of the Vestall Virgins, with a great part of the City wholy beaten downe, and not one stone thereof left one vpon another.

Lucius raigned 12 yeers, and was buried at Britiſh army, encountred with Seuerus neere Lyons, and was there ſlaine. Henceforth Seuerus quietly enioyed the Romane Empyre, and made ſharpe warres into the Eaſterne parts of the world, with great glory.

209. But returning to Rome, hee vnderſtood of a warre raiſed in Britaine. Wherefore hee haſted hither with his two ſonnes, Baſſianus and Geta: at his arriuall, peace was offered, which he refuſed, and leauing his younger ſonne Geta to gouerne the Prouince (being the higher part of the Ile) hee with Baſſianus his eldeſt Sonne entred into the North, and paſſed the further part of this Iland without any reſiſtance: but by ambuſhes, difficulty of the way, and other inconueniences, he loſt 50000 men, and then returned, enforced the enemies to conclude a league and yeeld ſome part of their Countrey.

At concluſion of which league, when hee and his ſonne rid to treate with the Caledonians, or Northerne Britaines, Baſſianus his Sonne drawing his ſword in the ſight of the enemy, was ready to haue ſlaine him, and had done it, had not ſome of the company made an outcry: yet this fault was remitted.

After this league, the Britaines of the North reſorted to the Emperours Court, where Iulia, Seuerus wife, obiected to a woman of Britaine, the wife of Argentocrix the Caledonian, that the Britiſh women accompanied with men diſhoneſtly. Yea, quoth the Britiſh woman, we ſatisfie the naturall luſt in better ſort then you Romanes: for wee accompany our ſelues openly with the beſt men, and you commit adultery cloſely with the moſt vile perſons. But after this League, there was a generall reuolt of the Britaines againſt the Romans, which yet was pacified with great ſlaughter, and then he built Seuerus Wall. a wall of turfe, to inhabite the Northerne Britaines, from whence when he returned, at the next lodging, a Blackemoore that ſerued him, a notable ſcoffer, met him with a Crowne of Cypres: he mocked with the colour of the man, and the Cypres (which was then vſed at all buryals) as with ſignes of euill lucke, commanded the man to be ſent away, wherewith hee cryed: Thou haſt béne all in all, and haſt vanquiſhed all, and now of a Conqueroure be thou a god. Then comming to the City of Yorke (as is ſuppoſed) he was by miſtaking, brought to the Spartianus. Temple of Bellona: blacke beaſts alſo being ordained for ſacrifice, followed him home to his Palace: which things theſe did then account to be ominous.

Shortly after, he departed out of this life at Yorke, partly through ſickeneſſe, and partly through griefe conceiued of his ſonnes euill demeanor. At his laſt eſpe he vttred theſe words: I found the ſtate troubleſome euery where, and leaue it quiet euen vnto the Britaines.

Herodian. Herodian writeth that in theſe warres of Seuerus againſt the North Britaines, hee found their countrey full of watery Marſhes: by thoſe Marſhes did the Britaines ſwimme and skirmiſh with their enemies, being couered with water vp vnto the Nauell, not caring that men ſaw the priuy parts of their naked bodies. Moreouer there did they know the vſe of apparell, but accuſtomed to compaſſe their bellies and necks onely with yron, which they eſteemed an ornament and token of riches, as other barbarous people ſuppoſed of Gold. They painted their bodies with diuers pictures, and formes of beaſts, and therefore ware no garment, leſt the painting ſhould be hidden, being a Nation very valiant and warrelike, greedy of ſlaughter, and content onely with a ſmall Target, a Speare, and a Skaine hanging by their naked ſides, ignorant of the vſe of Shirts of maile and helmets, for they reckoned the ſame combersous vnto them, when they ſhould ſwimme ouer the lakes, &c.

A grieuous diſeaſe came vpon Seuerus, being ſore appalled with age, ſo that he was conſtrained to keep his chamber, and ſend Antonius vnto the warres: but Antony not regarding the buſineſſe of Britaine, endeuoured by all meanes hee could, to winne the hearts of the ſouldiers vnto him, depraying his brother, to the intent they ſhould onely ayde him to the attaining of the Soueraignty. The long malady of his father, cauſed him to perſwade Phyſicians to rid the old man out of the world, vntill that Seuerus being conſumed, ended his life, who was the moſt famous of all Emperours in warlike affaires: For none other had obtained ſo many victories and conqueſts, eyther ciuill againſt his aduerſaries, or forraine againſt the barbarous Nations. Thus deceaſed he, after he had gouerned the Empyre the ſpace of 18 yeeres, leauing his Sonnes for ſucceſſors in the ſame: vnto whom hee left alſo great abundance of riches, as none of his predeceſſours had before him done. When Antony had gotten the ſupreme authority, he put to death the Philiſtians, becauſe they obeyed not his commandement in haſtening his fathers death: and ſlew all his owne and his brothers bringers vp, and inſtructers, for that they went about to reconcile them, leaning none aliue, that was either of dignity, or had reuerenced his father. The Captaines of the army hee enticed to perſwade the ſouldiers to proclaime him only Emperor: imagining daily manifold miſchiefes againſt his brother: but hee could not winne the ſouldiers good wills. Wherefore Antonie hauing taken truce with the Britaines, remoued towards his mother and brother. Their mother laboured to bring them to agréement, wherein alſo many prudent Councellors earneſtly trauelled: Antony thereby was induced, rather of force, then good will, to counterfeite loue. After which done, the two brethren gouerning the Empyre with equall honour, launched out of Britaine, and ſailed with the reliques of their Father toward Rome. For when they had burned the body (as was the cuſtome of the Romanes) they carryed the Aſhes, intermeddled with pleaſant Odours, (in a Vaſe of Alabaſter) to Rome, that it might be there interred amongſt the monuments of other Princes. Themſelues led thus their army, as conquerours of Britaine, and paſſed ouer the Ocean vnto the next coaſt of France, and ſo haſted ted towards Rome. When they were entred into Rome, all the people crowned with Laurell, received, and the Senate welcommed them. Foremoſt rode the Emperours themſelues, clothed in Emperiall purple. And next vnto them followed the Conſuls, bearing the beſtell with Seuerus reliques. Which beſtell, the people after they had ſaluted the new Emperour, did reuerently worſhip. The Emperours and Conſuls being thus accompanyed with Princely pompe, carried the ſame into the Temple, where the Monuments of Marcus, and other Emperours are ſeene. After they had finiſhed the ſolemne ſacrifice, and according to the ancient vſage, celebrated the Funerall ceremonies, both the brethren departed into the Emperiall Palace, which they diuided betweene them, cloſed vp all backe doores, and priuy poſternes, and met together onely at the outer gates. They choſe beſides either of them vnto himſelfe a ſundry guard, and neuer came together, vnleſſe it were ſometime for a little while to be ſéene of the people. Neuertheleſſe, firſt of all, they accomplished the due Funerals of their father. For the Romanes accuſtome to conſecrate with immortality, ſuch Emperors, as at their death, leaue either children or ſucceſſours in the Empyre behind them. And thoſe which are endued with the honour, they canonize amongſt the gods. There is thoſe the City, a certaine dolefull lamentation, mixed with fearefull ioy. And they vſe to interre the dead Corps very ſumptuouſly: but then they haue an Image, made as like the dead Emperor as may be. The ſame, within the porch of the Emperiall Palace, they lay in a great and high bed of Iuory, couered ouer with cloth of gold. The ſame Image liketh very pale, like a diſeaſed patient. About the bed on eyther ſide, a great part of the day doe certaine perſons ſit: that is to wit, on the left ſide, the Senate clothed in blacke garments: and on the right ſide, many Matrones. None of theſe are ſeene to weare any Ouches, or Chames of gold, but being clad with thinne white Veſtures, they ſhew the countenance of mourners, and thus doe they continue the ſpace of ſeuen daies: during the which, euery day the Emperors Phyſicians doe repaire vnto the bed, and as though they had felt the patients pulſes, declare that he waxeth more ſicke then before. Finally, when it ſeemeth that he is deceaſed, certains of the moſt Noble and worthy young men, of the orders of Knights and Senators, doe take vp the bed on their ſhoulders, and carry it thoſe the ſtreete, called Sacra via, vnto the old market place, where the Romane Magiſtrates are accuſtomed to render vp their offices. There on both ſides, are certaine ſtages made with ſteps, vpon the which, on the one ſide, is a quire of boyes being Noble mens ſonnes: and on the other ſide are many beautifull women, ſinging hymnes and ballads, in praiſe of the dead Emperour, meaſured with diuers lamentable verſes. When theſe are finiſhed, the young men doe take vp the bed againe, and beare it out of the City, into the field called Campus Martius, in the broadeſt part whereof, there is erected a Tower foure ſquare, with ſtoes of equall height, builded of great timber, like vnto a Tabernacle. The ſame within forth, is filled with dry chips and rodes, and on the outer ſide, it is hanged with Arras clothes of gold, and decked with Images of Iuory, and ſundry painted pictures. Within it alſo is another leſſe Tower, but like in forme, with doores and poſtals opened. And ouer that, the third and fourth, with many other roomes aſcending continually, vntill they reach vnto the higheſt, which is leſſe then all the other. A man may compare this building vnto Towers, which are ſet in Hauens with fire on the tops, to direct Ships which ſayle by night on the Seas, into their perfect poſts: The ſame are commonly called Phari. Now when they haue put the bed in the ſecond Tabernacle, they gather all kindes of ſpices and perfumes, with diuers odoriferous fruites, hearbes and iuices, the which they throw on heaps in the Tabernacle. Neither is there any Nation, City, or perſon, which excelleth in honour or dignity, but at that time will to the vttermoſt of his power, moſt honourably celebrate the laſt Funerals of the Emperour.

When they haue couched a great heape of ſpices together, and built the building therewith, all the Romane Knights doe ride about the Tower, with a iuſt courſe and order to and fro: Chariots are alſo drawne about, wherein many doe ſit clothed in purple, repreſenting the perſons of all Noble men, being Magiſtrates and Captaines of Rome.

The Ceremonies being thoroughly ended, the Succeſſour in the Empire, taketh a brand of fire in his hand, and fireth therewith the Tabernacle. After whom, all other that are preſent, doe throw likewiſe fire into the ſame. And immediatly all the building being filled with thoſe dry ſticks and ſpices, beginneth to burne behemently. Then out of the higheſt and leaſt Tower, as out of a high Steeple, is let forth an Eagle, the which, they beleeue, doth beare the Emperours ſoule into heauen. And from thenceforth is that Emperor worſhipped as the other gods.

From this time, to the raigne of Diocleſian, for the ſpace of 72 yeeres, there is nothing recorded in our Hiſtories hitherto publiſhed concerning Britaine: but whereas it is manifeſt that the Soueraignty of Britaine reſted in the Romane Emperours all that ſpace, I will ſet them heere downe ſucceſſiuely.

AFter Seuerus Baſſianus, ſurnamed Antonius Caracalla, murthering his brother Geta, ſucceeded in the Empire. Hée was cruell to his people: hee founded the Bath in Rome, which is called Antonians: hee was out of meaſure giuen to ſenſuality and carnall concupiſcence, inſomuch that he eſpouſed his mother in Law Iulia. Yee was murthered by Martialis, when hee had gouerned 6 yeeres. 212. Herodian.

Macrinus one yeere. 218.

223. Antonius Heliogabalus three yeeres.
Lampridius Vector. Alexander Severus, who was slaine by his souldiers here in Bryttaine, in a village called Sicila, but others say in France, thirteene yeeres.
236. Iulius Maximus three yeeres.
238. M. Antonius Gordianus one yeere.
239. Antonius Gordianus the sonne five yeeres.
245. Iulius Philippus the first Christian Emperour, five yeeres.
250. Decius two yeeres.
252. Trebonianus Gallus, and Vibius Hostilianus two yeeres.
252. Iulius Æmelianus foure moneths.
254. Licinius Valerianus five.
Lacinius Galicinus fifteene.

At this time there arose in divers countries thirty Usurpers, which are called the thirty tyrants, of the which Lollianus Posthumus, Victorianus Territus, as it is supposed, kept Bryttaine from Gallicinus.

Flauius Claudius two.
269. Aurelianus five.
Tacitus five moneths.
Florianus three moneths.

This yeere 276. being the yeere since the creation of the world, 4238. and of the Olimpiad 263. Aurelian the Dane was chosen Emperor of the Romanes, hee was a goodly man of stature, very Noble, Valiant and terrible, hee would pardon no Capitoll offence, neither in Prince nor Peasant, yet himselfe caused his sisters sonne to be murthered: he was the first The first Emperour of the Romanes that ordained the Emperiall Crolwne or Diadem of gold, adorned with pearles and precious stones, hee made it lawfull to eate Swines flesh, which before they held most abominable, and might not eate, hee had three most glorious victories vpon the Gothes, hee hated the Christians, and in the fourth yeere of his raigne, hee stirred vp the The ninth persecution of Christians. ninth persecution vpon the Church of God: he raigned five yeeres, and five dayes, and after Tacitus succeeded him in the Empyre, being a very fit and worthy Governour, and after Tacitus, Probus Equirius sonne to Delmacius a Clowne, and a Gardener by Profession: this A Gardners sonne Emperour of Rome. Probus Equirius was a most valiant man at armes, and as good a Justiciar as any that had the publique government, he began his raigne in the yeere of Christ, 282. and raigned 6 yeeres and 4 moneths.

Aurelius Probus five yeeres. In which time, Bonosus, a Bryttaine borne, but brought vp in Spaine, fearing lest hee should be executed, because the Germanes had burnt certaine vessels in the Rhene, whereof hee had charge, vsurped the Empyre with Proculus at Colen, and would haue exempted from the Romanes, Bryttaine, Spaine, and part of France, but being vanquished by Probus in a long and sore battell, hee strangled himselfe. Some sedition was then raised in Bryttaine, and appeased by Victorinus, a Moore, by whole motion, Probus had made him Regent of Bryttaine, which was Vopiscus. Tolerances permitted to the Bryttaines. causer of this trouble. This Probus permitted the Bryttaines and others, that they might haue vines and make Wine. After hee had raigned five yeeres, hee was slaine of the souldiers. 282.

CArus was created Augustus, he made Carinus and Numerianus his sonnes Cæsars, to which Carinus, hee assigned Bryttaine, Gaule, Illyricum, Italy and Spaine: but Carus was slaine by lightning, and the other two within three yeeres space lost their liues. Vopiscus.

Diocletian was then chosen Emperour, who adioyned Maximianus vnto him in like gouernment. 285.

Carausius was appointed to be Admirall of the Bryttaine Seas, which were sore troubled by the Pirates of the Franks and Saxons: but when hee had oftentimes apprehended the Pirates, and neither referred the Prizes, or was accomptable for it, neither to the Emperors, nor their deputies, it was suspected, that of set purpose he permitted those rouers to haue recourse thyther with those seas, to the end he might rifle them, and enrich himselfe. Maximianus therefore sent part of his army to suppresse him, in which were many of the Thebane legion, who in this iourney were slaine by his commandement, and made Martyrs, because they professed Christ. Carausius vnderstanding of the preparation made against him, passed out of Gaule into Bryttaine, where bringing the countrey to his obeysance, hee vsurped the robe of an Emperour: whereupon they which were sent to surprise him, returned to Maximianus, who then was incumbred with new warre in Gaule. In the meane time Carausius built ships in Bryttaine, intercepted certaine companies of souldiours, assembled a great number of barbarous people with spoyle, with hope of whom he purposed to trouble the Sea-coasts of Gallia and Spaine. Holland also (then holden by certaine Franks) reuolted to Carausius.

Then purposed Maximianus the second time to make warre against Carausius, but by stormy weather, and want of Pilots, he was enforced to deferre his purpose. Shortly after, the two Emperours elected two Cæsars, Valerius Maximus, and Constantius Chlorus, to which Constantius they committed the recouery of Bryttaine. Hee immediately passing thyther Gaule hitherward, suddenly surprized Gessoriacum (now called Bullein) which Carausius had manned, and so stopped the Hauen, that it could stand Carausius in no stead. Then building ships to ouer passe hither, he first assayled luckily the Hollanders, which had reuolted to Carausius, and then staying for conuenient winde, hee houered a while on the Sea-coast, and in the meane time, Carausius was trayterously slaine by Alectus his familiar friend. Panegyricus Constantio dicus. 292.

Alectus then vsurped the Empyre heere in Bryttaine, against whom Constantine with his former preparation, made ready for warre, and lanched out in haste, though the winde was contrary: which when his souldiours vnderstood, they set out also with stoe windes out of the same and other ports, in such foggy and misty weather, that they passed by Alectus Nauy, then houering about the Ile of Wight, the one not seeing the other. The Romanes, as soone as they lanoed, burnt their Ships, determining eyther to winne, or lose their liues. Which when Alectus vnderstood, hee left the shore, and prepared himselfe for battell, with his mercenary barbarous Souldiours, in which hee was slaine by Asclepiodatus, Lord great Master of Alectus slain. the Emperours house. In this fight none of the Romanes perished, but heere all the field was ouerspred with dead bodies of the enemies, among whom lay Alectus himselfe without any Emperiall ornaments, and scantly knowne. Other Romane Souldiours also which had lost their company in the mist, arriued at London, slew in the Citty a great number of barbarous people which escaped from the battell, and purposed to haue sacked London. Then, when Constantius came a-land, the Bryttaines with their wiues and children flocked vnto him, and submitted themselues ioyfully, being now deliuered out of a long thraldome.

This expedition of Constantius into Bryttaine, is ascribed by some to Maximianus, into which errour, a false inscription of the Panegyriks hath led them.

290. Asclepiodatus, hauing recouered Bryttaine, as is before touched, belayd the Citty of London with a strong siege (saith Geffrey Monmouth) and ere it was long, by knightly force and violence, entred the Citty, and slew the Romanes Captaine, named Liuius Gallus, neere vnto a bzooke there at that time running, into which bzooke hee threw him, by reason whereof it is called in Brytish, Nant Gallon, since in Saxon tongue, Gallus or Wallus bzooke, and to this day, the street where sometimes the bzooke ranne, is called Walbzooke. The Romane Historiographes speake nothing of this Gallus, but of Galerius, which was ioyned in the Empire with Constantius, after the decease of Asclepiodatus, and also of the Brytish King Coil, as shall be shewed in place conuenient. True it is, I grant, that a certaine bzooke dzained, I wot not from what heads, but much encreased by the moysh grounds, without the Citty of London on the Northside, passed thzough the same Citty Southward, to the Riuer of Thames. And therefore of comming thzough and from the wall, and so thzough the Citty, was since called Walbzoke: which bzooke in old time had in diuers places Bzidges ouer it, as appeareth by inquisition made in Anno. 1300. Elias Russel being Maior of London, William Iordane, and I. de Beuer, then Maiors of those Bzidges found, who were bound to repaire them so oft as needed, and then was the same bzoke vaulted ouer with bzicke as it now remaineth. Wallbzooke wherevpon it tooke that name.

301. Coil, after Asclepiodatus, (as saith Geffrey) tooke on him the Kingdome of Bryttains: Peter de Icham saith, this Coil was

Duke of Caire Glow, or Glocester. But to returne to the Romanes, who had now recouered Bryttaine within ten yeeres after Carausius first tooke it. Diocletian (saith Eusebius) Eusebius. Churches in Bryttaine persecuted. persecuted the Church of God. In the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, hee began to ouerthzow the Churches downe to the ground, yea, Churches ouerthrowne; and the very foundations were digged vp, and the Holy and Sacred Scriptures burned to ashes in the open Market-place, the Pastors of the Church were persecuted. When hee had raigned together with Maximianus, who persecuted with him twenty yeeres, hee deposed himselfe voluntarily, and liued a priuate life. From that time to his end hee pined away with diseases: but Maximian hanged himselfe. and the Scriptures burned.

Of this persecution, Bede hath thus: Diocletian in the East, and Maximianus in the West, raised the tenth persecution, after Nero, against the Christians: hee commanded the Churches to be spoyled, the Christians to be tormented and killed. Which persecution was both longer, and also crueller then all the other: for whole ten yeeres together it continued in burning the Churches, in banishing the Innocents, in murthering the Martyrs, and neuer ceased. Briefly, among other places, it made Bryttaine to be honoured with the gloay of many holy Martyrs, which constantly stood and dyed in the confession of their faith. Bede.

Among other suffered S. Albane, of whom Fortunatus Prisca, in the booke hee wzote in the praise of Virginity, speaking of the Martyrs, which from all the coasts of the world came vnto God, saith: The martyrdome of Alban and other in Bryttaine.

Albanum egregium fœcunda Brytannia profert.
The fertile Land of balefull Brytannie
Bringeth forth Alban a martyr rightworthy.

S. Alban for professing Christ, being led from the Citty of Uerolamium, vnto Holmehurst, since called Dersiwold wood, where now the Towne of S. Albans is builded, suffered martyrdome in the yeere of Christ, 293. who is specified to be the first Martyr of Bryttaine: and shortly after, to the number of one thousand Christians were martyzed at Lichfield, where Amphabele Instructer of Alban was taken, bzought to Uerolamium, and there tormented by slitting vp his belly, whipping him about a stake, winding his bowels out of his body, and stoning him to death. The life and martyzdome of these two, to wit, of Alban and Amphabele was recoaded and wzitten in Latine at large, by one who wzote himselfe by none other name, then, Of all wzetches the simplest man: since by Mathew Paris, a Monke of Saint Albane, turned out of Latine pzose into French Uerse: both which Bookes I haue seene, and was since translated out of the Latine and French, into English meetre by Iohn Lydgate, Monke of Bury. Iohn Cyt graue. Matthæus Paris. John Lydgate.

305. CONstantius began his Empire with Galerius, the Empire was diuided betweene them: so that Constantius should possesse Affrica, Italy, France and Bzytaine: Galerius should haue Illyzica, Asia, and the East parts: which done, they substituted vnder them two Cæsars. Constantius holding himselfe content with the dignity of Augustus, refused to sustaine the trouble, which hee should haue endured through the administration of the affaires of Italy and Affrike: he sought by all meanes how he might enrich the people of the Empire. He abolished the superstition of the Gentiles in his dominions, so that afterward Bzytaine felt no persecutions. The yéere following he passed out of France hither against the Picts, at which time his sonne Constantine, who then serued Galerius, perceiuing his destruction to be compassed, posted to his father in all haste, houghing and killing al the post horses, which way soeuer he passed, that might not be pursued, and came to his father the very houre that he went aboad to come into Bzytaine: but Constantius, as sone as he came to Yozke, suddenly sickned, and perceiuing his day to dzaw nére, when he was asked to whom he would leaue the Empire, answered, To Constantine, and shortly after departed.

This Constantius begot Constantine, on Helena his wife, daughter of Dripona in Bithynia, as he was passing thozow the countrey, being one of the Romane legates sent into the East parts: Constantine was created Emperoz in France.

311. Eutebius. CONstantine, surnamed the great, sonne of Constantius, borne in Bithynia by Helena, the Innképer (saith William of Malmesburie) first consecrated, as is aforesaid: his Father being now dead, did with so great sozow, and shedding of teares solemnize his burial, that the Soudiours hoping he would resemble his father, saluted him Emperour at Yozke against his will: but at Rome Maxentius the Socrates, l. 1. Euse. sonne of Maximianus Herculius, is chosen of the Pzetozian souldiours, not to gouerne the Empire, but rather to practise Tyzanny.

Maximianus being chiefe Emperour, after he had crowned Emperour Licinius (by originall Dane, his old fellow souldier and familiar friend) departed himselfe rather a Tyzant then an Emperour, abusing the spoules of noble personages, slaying many with the sword, and putting in vze other such like practices.

Constantine the Emperour, being certified hereof, deuised with himselfe which waies possible he might ridde the Romanes from vnder this grieuous yoke of seruitude, and dispatch the Tyzant out of this life: deliberating thus with himselfe, he fozecasted also what God he were best to call vpon foz ayde to waze battell with the aduersary. He remembzed how that Diocletian, which wholy dedicated himselfe vnto the seruice of the Heathenish gods, preuailed nothing thereby: also he perswaded himselfe foz certaine, that his Father Constantius, who renounced the Idolatry of the Gentiles, led a moze foztunate life. Passing thus doubtfully with himselfe, and taking his iourney with his souldiers, I wot not whether a certaine vision appeared vnto him, as it was strange to behold, so moeede incredible to be spoken of. About noone, the day somewhat declining, he saw in the Skie a lightsome Pillar in fozme of a Crosse, wherein these wozds were ingrauen: In this ouercome. The which Vision so amazed the Emperour, that he mistrusting his owne sight, demanded of them that were present, whether they perceiued the Vision: Which when all with one consent had affirmed, the wauering minde of the Emperour was settled with this diuine and wonderfull sight. The night following, in his sleepe he seeth Christ, which saith thus vnto him: Frame vnto thy selfe the fozme of a Crosse, after the example of the signe which appeared vnto thée, and beare the same against the enemies, as a fit banner oz token of victozy. Hée being fully perswaded with this Oracle, commandeth the victozious signe of the Crosse (which as yet is reserued in the Palace of the Emperour) to be made, and therewith proceedeth fozwards with great courage, and ioyning with the enemy, right ouer against Rome, about the bzidge commonly called Vulbia, hee got the victozy, foz Maxentius being dzowned in the Riuer, dyed: it was the seuenty yére of his raigne when hee ouercame Maxentius. After these things, when as Lucinius his fellow Emperour, and his bzother in Law, hauing married his sister Constantia, led his life in the East: Constantine enioying againe benefits receiued at the hands of God, shewed himselfe gratefull in offering of thanks and praises vnto the Author of all godnesse: his practices were these: To deliuer the Christians from persecution: to call against the exiled vnto their native soyle: to set at liberty such as were in pzison: to restoze against the gods of the confiscated: to build againe the Churches that were ouerthzowne: all which things hee accomplished with great pzomptnesse of minde. But Licinius persecuting the Christians, Constantine waged battell against him, and meeting oft by Sea and Land, in the end, at Chrisopolis, a City of Bithynia, to wit, at the Hauen of Chalcedon, Lucinius was ouercome, and yéelded himselfe to Constantine.

The gaddy study and practices of Constantine.

After he had repzessed the ciuill warres, banquished the Gothes in many places, and wonne great memozy among the Barbarians, he placed the Bzytaines that had done him so good seruice, in a part of France toward the west thoze of the Deem: hee applyed himselfe wholy to the study of the Liberall Arts. He summoned the Nicene Councel, which was held at Nicea, a City of Bithinia, foz the debating of the controuersie about the feast of Easter, and the rooting out of the heresie of Arius. Which Councell being ended, he lined in great tranquillity, and turned himselfe wholy to the building of Churches, as well in other Cities, as in that City which he called after his owne name, Constantinople. In this Citty he erected from the foundation 2 Churches, calling the one of Peace, Helena mother to Constantine.

Helena, the Emperours mother (which of the village Drepane made a City, the which afterwards the Emperour called Helenopolis) tooke her iourney to Ierusalem, which when she found lying waste in a heape of stones, she searched diligently foz the Sepulture of Christ: and at length thee found it, but with great difficulty: foz as they which imbzaced the faith of Christ, highly esteemed of that Sepulchze and Monument after his passion: so such as abhoyred Christian Religion, heaped in that place much earth, and raised great hillocks, and builded there the Temple of Venus, and set vp her Idoll. But when the Empereours mother was made pzimy thereunto, she thzew downe the Idol, and caused the great heape of earth to bee hurled downe, where-vnder thee found thzee Crosses in the graue, one vpon the which Christ suffered: ouer two, whereon the two theeues ended their liues, together with the Table of Pilate, wherein hee had written that Christ was crucified King of the Iewes: the Empezors mother builded ouer the Sepulchze a gozgious Church, and called it New Ierusalem, right ouer against that old, and waste Ierusalem. She builded a second Church, nothing inferiour to the first, at Bethelem in the hollow zocke, where Christ was bozne. Also the third vpon the mount, where Christ ascended vnto the Father. Many things she gaue to Churches, and to poze people, she liued godly and religiously, and departed this life, being fouresczoze yeeres old: her body was buried at Constantinople. Simon of Durham writeth, that shee builded walls about the City of London, and the City of Colchester.

New Ierusalem builded.

About this time, Octauius, whom Constantine had left gouernour in Bzytaine, rebelled, against whom Constantine sent Traherne with a Legion of Romanes, who (after diuers conflicts) was slaine: Gratianus surnamed Funarius, was at that time gouernour of the Romane Legion in Bzytaine.

S. Catharyn martyred for the Christian faith.

THis yéere 316. at Alexandzia in Egypt, by command of Maxencius the Emperoz, the Noble Lady Catharyn, daughter to King Costus, was martyzed vpon a wheele: at this time Constantine the great was also Emperour, and had raigned fiue yéeres: at this time there were diuers competitoys to the Empyze, and in the first yeere of Constantine the Great, the cruell persecution of the Christians ceased, hauing continued extreme violent, tenne yeeres together, especially in the East-parts, whose numbers were infinite, that suffered foz the faith of Christ, and pzesently followed an exceeding great plague and famine vpon the persecutors of our faith, concerning which the venerable Beda, in his little booke hath written very sufficiently.

Gods Iudgements vpon Tyrants and persecutors.

Arius the Arch-Heretique.

THis yeere 324 Arius and all his damnable Heresies, were condemned by the censure of the generall Councell: this was done in the 4 yeere of the raigne of Constantine, and in the time of Pope Siluester: Constantinus, sonne to the forenamed Constantine, enclined to the Arian heresie, concerning which, some writers haue wzongfully tared his father with that heresie.

Constantine, at the age of 65. yéeres was baptized and dyed, and was buried at Constantinople: he left behind him three sonnes, to wit, Constantinus, Constans, and Constantius to succéede him in the Empyze.

Bzytaium called Constantinople from this time.

THis yéere 330. being the 19 yéere of the raigne of Constantine the great, the sayd Constantine reedified the ancient City Bzytium, bozdering vpon the Sea, and called it Constantinople after his owne name, and constituted it the head Citty of his Empyze, yet notwithstanding the venerable Beda, in his little booke, saith that this was done in the 24. yeere of the raigne of Constantine: and in the 20. yéere of the raigne of this Constantine was held the Councell of Nice, with great solemnitie, wherein were condemned and suppzest the damnable heresies of Arius Bygot, that vaine glozious dissembling Minister, whereof the Arian heresie take the name, and foz a long space after much troubled Christendome: and at this time the Nicene Creed was commanded to be sung, oz said, in all Christian Churches, and the forenamed Arius pzetending to make a retract of all his heresies, take his leaue of the Emperoz, as if he had great necessitie to take Physicke to purge his body, which purgation neuer ceast working, vntill it had purged him of all his bloud and bowels, and so dyed most miserably, and shamefully. Read the 12. Chap. of the 15. booke of Vincentius, and the Tripartite History, wherein is set downe his hypocrisie and dissimulation which he vsed first and last, as well to the generall Councell as to the Emperoz, &c. He dyed about the yére 341. being the first yeere of Constantinus, the sonne of Constantine, and in the eighth yeere of Constantius the famous Priest.

The Nicene generall Councell.

The Nicene Creed.

The miserable end of Arius the heretique.

337. CONstantinus began his Empire and raigne ouer Bzytaine: with him his Father Constantine had appointed by his last will, that his two bzethzen Constans and Constantius should participate and haue their portion of the Empyze, but not long after, when Constantinus attempted warre against his bzother at Aquileie, it demeaned himself vnaduisedly therein, he was slaine, and then was the Empyze reduced vnder the gouernment of the two bzethzen onely.

340. COnstans then ruled Bzytaine, which he administred with great Iustice: but after, when he failed of his health, he associated vnto him in stead of friends, euil disposed persons to assist him, through which euil counsell he declined into horrible vices, by meane whereof, waxing scant tolerable of the inhabitants of the Prouinces, he was slaine by Magnentius, who vsurped the Empyze in France, Spaine, and Bzytaine.

353. COnstantius then had the regiment of Bzytaine, who sent hither a Spaniard called Paul, a Notary by profession, to bzing out certaine taine men of warre which had conspired with Magnentius: but he vpon false surmises grieuously molested the guiltlesse, fettering and manacling whom he pleased. Whereupon Martinus then Lieutenant in Bryttaine, being moued with compassion, desired him to forbeare the harmelesse: but he was so rigorous, that he also charged Martinus himselfe of conspiracy with Magnentius, and was earnest to bring him before the Emperour: whereupon Martinus drawing his sword smote at him, and because he could not slay him, he suddenly slew himselfe; and this Paul embued with blood, haled a great company (linked in chaines) to the Emperours presence, which were either banished, executed, or attainted.

Martinus.

Constantius after this, appointed Iulianus to gouerne Gaule, at which time great spoyle was made in Bryttaine by the Scots and Picts, wherefore Iulianus busied with warre against the Almaines, sent Lupcinus hither with an army, in whose absence Iulianus blurped the Empyre: whereof when Constantius heard, he returned from the warre (against the Parthians) against Iulianus, and died in the way.

Dulcitius.

S. Athanasius Creede.

Saint Athanasius Archbishop of Alexandria, being very odious amongst all Arians, hauing endured great danger and persecution, was very kindly received and entreated by Maximillian Bishop of Treuer, where he composed the Symboll or Creed, Quicunque vult saluus esse, &c. which was shortly after confirmed and published by a generall Councell, held at Alexandria, for the suppression of many heresies which then abounded, and in the 24. of this Constantius, Iulian the Apostata rose vp and with great force and pride blurped the name of Emperour, alonge the River of Reyne in Germany: when Constantius heard thereof, he hakned to come vpon him to giue him battell, but was preuented by sudden death, of an Appoplery, as he was departing from the warres in Parthya betweene Cicilia and Cappadocia, the third of November at 45. yeres of age: presently vpon his death, Iulian went to Constantinople, and was there made Emperour by the name of Iulian, alias Claudius Iulianus: it pleased God his raygne was short, viz. a yere and eight moneths: he was of small stature, long bearded, very eloquent and learned in the Liberall Sciences, quick of memory, more aduenturous then was fit for an Emperour, he was a great worshipper of Idols.

In this Councell the Christians were forbidden to reade the discipline of Poets and Philosophers.

Iulian the Apostata obtaineth the Empyre.

362. Iulianus (called the Apostata) begunne his raigne ouer Bryttaine and the Empyre, a man sore passing well in Liberall Sciences, but an earnest aduersary of Christian religion: he banished Palladius a great and honourable person into Bryttaine vpon a suspition: he sent Alypius who had beene a Lieutenant of Bryttaine, to repayre Jerusalem, but terrible flashes of fire issuing out of the earth, when they layd the foundations, enforced them to leaue their purpose. This Iulian with great preparations made war vpon the Parthians, he spoyled Allyria, and returning from thence a conqueror, he was slaine by his enemies, as he preased vnadvisedly into the battels. After him succeeded in the Empyre Iouinian, and held it nine moneths.

Ammianus. Marcellinus.

365. VAlentinian was then chosen Emperour by the souldiours. The Picts, Scots, Attacotes, and Sarons, grieuously molested the Bryttaines. Nectaridius, who had the charge of the Sea-coast here, was slaine by them, & Bulchobandes a great Captaine was enclosed by them: wherefore after diuers Captaines, Theodosius was sent hither, who discomfiting the enemy, and recouering the spoyle, entred triumphantly into London, and the nert yere went into the North, suppressed the enemies, recouered the prouince, and repaired cities and fortresses: he oppressed Valentinus an Hungarian, who being banished hither, practised new tumults, deliuering him to Dulcitus to be executed, without any enquiry of his confederates, because he would not renew the tumult: which done, he returned to Rome. Shortly after, Valentinian sent hither Fraomarius (which he before had ordained King of the Buccenobants in Germany) to be Marshall of the Almaines which serued in Bryttaine. And not long after Valentinian dyed.

375. GRatian with his brother Valentinian was then created Emperour. He, to the intent he might better repayre the decayed state of the Empyre, made Theodosius a copartner with him in it.

S. Ierome.

This yere 369. being the 2. yere of Valentinian the Emperour, was Saint Ierome made Cardinall, and the nert yere after, was Saint Ambrose made Archbishop of Millaine, and in the yeere aforesaid, the venerable Beda in his little booke recordeth, that there was a great vniuersall Earth-quake throughout the whole world: and the nert yeere, as other Hystories write, it rayned Wool, and there withall it hayled, which Hayle-stones were of wonderous greatnes, and slew great numbers of men and beasts at Constantinople: and the nert yere after, that is to witte, 370. the City of Nice was vtterly throwne down and ruinated by an earth-quake: and this yeere dyed S. Hillary Bishop of Poitiers.

383. MAximus a baliant and worthy man, was shortly after forced here in Bryttaine to take the Empyre vpon him, who passed into France, and immediately all the Germane legions and Romane souldiers revolted vnto him from Gratian, so that he being destitute of men of warre, fled to Lions, where he was slaine by treason: for Maximus gaue out that Gratians wife was comming to her husband, which Gratian entirely louing his wife, lightly credited, and therefore accompanied with a few, went forth to mete her: but in the coach where he supposed to haue found his wife, was Andragatius a desperate man, who leaping out of the coach killed Gratian.

Then Maximus created his son Victor a Cæsar, and vsed some crueltie against Gratians Captaines. Valentinian being herewith terrified, sent Saint Ambrose vnto him to treate of a peace, which he accepted, and Theodosius permitted him to vse the title of Augustus.

Sigebertus.

Then

Then he settled himselfe at Trier in Germany, impouerished the Countries round about him, executed certaine heretikes called Priscillianists, and then entred into Italy breaking the peace, and thought to haue intercepted Valentinian, but he with his mother fled to Theodosius, and perswaded him to take reuenge of Maximus. In the meane time Maximus came to Aquileia, all Italy and Affrica submitted themselues vnto him, when suddenly Theodosius comming from Constantinople, moued warre against him, corrupted his Souldiours with Bribes, and after one or two skirmishes inforced Maximus to flie into Aquileia, where his owne souldiours deliuered him to Theodosius, by whose commandement he was shortly after beheaded. Andragatius also who kept the Seas, vnderstanding this, drowned himselfe, and Victor the sonne of Maximus was slaine in France by Arbogastes. The Bryttaines which serued him, returned into France, and settled them in the Country there, which is now called Bryttaine: so was Bryttaine recouered againe to the Romane Empyre.

The Emperor Theodosius doth open penance.

The Antiquall of the French nation, and of the City of Paris.

THis yeere 386. being the 5. yere of Theodosius the Emperour (as saith Sigibert) the Emperour at the request of Pope Damasus commanded a generall Councell to be held at Constantinople, wherein was condemned Macedonius the heretique, who taught that the holy Ghost was not God, nor of one substance with God the Father, and God the Sonne, and in this Councell it was ordayned that the Apostles Creed should be sung in all Churches vpon all solemne Dayes, as well in the East Church, as in the West Church, viz. both in the Greek, and Latine Churches, and in this Councell it was also ordayned and constituted, that the Patriarchs of Constantinople, should henceforth be reputed as Bishops of new Rome, with speciall priuiledges next vnto the Pope of Rome. And from this time al the Bishops of Constantinople were called Patriarches: and about this time, a Bishop called Priscillianus, greatly troubled the Church of God, and began to preach other heresies, he denied the Trinity in Vnity, and Vnity in Trinity, he maintained many other vilde errors, which were condemned by Councels, he was by Pope Damasus and S. Ambrose committed to Rome, and from thence to the Councell of Burdeaux, where he was censured by Saint Martyn and other holy Bishops and Fathers, and in the end he was slaine in the City of Treuer.

To generall Councell. The Apostles Creede commanded to be sung in the Greeke and Latine Churches.

S. Ierome translateth the old and new Testament.

This yeere 389. being the second yeere of Theodosius the elder, the most Christian Emperor, S. Ierome the Priest of Bethelem vtterly before was made Cardinall, began to translate the old and new Testament out of Hebrew into Latine: some write he began this holy worke in the 4. yere of Gratianus, and in the third yere of this Theodosius, the Church was purged from the heresie of the Panithes, and by the learned and deuout preachings and prayers of S. Ambrose, was S. Augustine conuerted vnto the Christian Faith at 30. yeres of age, his mother fasted, prayed, and wept dayly, for his conuersion, and loued and honoured S. Ambrose as the Angell of God, for the manifold gifts and graces of God, wherewith he was indued. S. Ambrose baptized S. Augustine, and at his Baptisme was sung Te Deum laudamus.

S. Augustine conuerted.

This yeere 426. being the first yeere of Gratianus the Emperour, he made a Law that all Priests which had charge of Soules, should sojourne no more with others, but forthwith repayre to their proper habitations, and kepe hospitality, and to see their Churches and Reuenues repayred, which were now restored vnto them, and commanded that the Catholiques should respect the Arians but as brute Beasts, and to driue them out of his Empire: and about three yeres after, in the Church of Millaine, they began to sing Anthemns, Hymnes, and Psalms to the praise, and thanks giuing to God, for all his benefits. At this time flourished S. John Chrysostome Patriarch of Antiochia, and at this time Theodosius did open penance in Millaine, and fasted and prayed eight moneths together, according as S. Ambrose had enioyned him, viz. because in the 5. yeere of his Empyre, he had commanded fiue thousand Citizens of Thessalonica to be slaine, and for executing the Innocent with the wicked, in scorne of ciuill Iustice, therefore the Archbishop would not permit him to enter into the Church, nor to receiue the Sacrament, vntill he had performed his penance.

The 11000. virgins.

In the fift yere of Theodosius, dyed Duke Pream, otherwise called Ibros, the great Captaine of the French, who they say was lineally descended of King Pryam of Troy, and after him in the yeere 386. they chose a valiant man called Marcomyr, he continued 14. yeeres, he taught them the vse and art of warre, he walled many Cities and Castles, and in the tenth yeere of his raigne, viz. 396. he changed the name of the great City of France, and called it Paris, which before that time was called Lutecia, because of the muddy or durtinesse of the place wherein it standeth: the City of Paris was found 950. yeres before the Incarnation of our Saviour Iesus, and was called Paris, in honor and remembrance of Prince Paris, son to the King of Troy, from whom he was descended: some write, he also changed their generall ancient name of Gaules, and called them French, and haue beene so called euer since.

S. Vrsula with 11000. virgins, which were sent into Bryttaine to be married to Conon and his knights, were slaine and martyred of the barbarous people being on the sea, but as some write, by Attila King of the Hunnes.

Pelagius heresie.

395. HOnorius the son of Theodosius succeeded in the Empire, in whose time Pelagius a Bryttain borne, displayed the venom of his faithles doctrine very farre abroad, holding, that a man might line well without the helpe of the Grace of God: vsing herein the aid of Iulianus of Campania, who was intemperately stirred with the losse of his bishoprike, to whom S. Austen and other fathers also answered in most ample manner, manner, but yet they would not bee amended thereby, but being conuicted of their falsehood, they rather would encrease it by defending and maintaining it, then amend it by returning to the truth.

This time Marcus was chosen Emperour by the souldiers in Brytaine, fearing the inuasion of the Gendales, but immediately they slew him, and elected Gratianus, whom also they murthered within foure moneths.

Then Constantine, a souldier of base estate, onely vpon confidence of his name, was elected here Emperor, who passing hence into France, with all the youth of Brytaine, got all the men of warre there to take part with him. Honorius sent therefore Sarus to withstand him, who in a foughten field slew Iustinian Constantines Captaine, and so pursued Constantine, that he made him take Valentia, wherein hee sharpely besieged him, vntill Gerontius with his Brytaines, and Edobrichus with the Frankes raised the siege.

Then Constantine fortified the Alpes and Rhene with Garrisons, sent Constans his sonne (whom of a Monke he had made a Cæsar) with a great army into Spaine, where he woke, and afterward slew certaine noble personages allied to Honorius, and returning to his father, left Gerontius to gouerne Spaine. Constantine himselfe then craued pardon of Honorius for vsurping the Empire, saying, that he did it by compulsion: which when Honorius heard, hee well liked of him, that he sent an Imperiall Robe vnto him.

In these troubles Brytaine was greatly endangered by Picts and Scots, and fled to Honorius for succour, but he sending them onely Letters, willed them to look to their own state. Shortly after Constantine that was a Monke, was slaine by Gerontius his owne Captaine, at Vienna in France: and Constantine himselfe being besieged at Arles by Honorius Soldiers, entred into holy orders, and fled into the church, thinking thereby to saue himselfe, but was drawne out from thence, and slaine. Gerontius who had traiterously killed his master, was beset round about with Spaniards in his lodging, wherefore he first slew Alanus his tried friend, then Nemichia his wife, and lastly himselfe, and now Honorius recouered Brytaine.

In this time (saith Beda) Rome was destroyed of the Goths, 1164. yeeres after it was builded: after which time the Romanes left off to rule in Brytaine, almost 470. yeeres after that Iulius Cæsar first entred the said Ile. The Romanes dwelt within the trench, which as we haue said, Seuerus drew ouerthwart the Iland at the south part, which thing may appeare by the cities, temples, bridges, and paued streets to this day remaining, notwithstanding they had in possession, and vnder their dominion the further parts of Brytaine, and also the Ilands which are about Brytaine (by meanes (as is aforesaid) the Romanes had vsed to transport their men ouer into France the flowre of all the youth of Brytaine, to serue in their forraine warres, their men of warre were consumed, and were not now able to defend themselues against the inuasions of their enemies: whereupon many yeeres together they liued vnder the oppression of two most cruell Nations, the Scots and Picts: which were of the circuite of Brytaine, but diuided from the Land of Brytaine by two armes of the sea, running best twirt them, of the which, one from the East sea, the other from the West, runneth in farre and wide into the Land, though they may one reake to the other. In the middle of the East creeke there is a City builded called Guidi. Aboue the West creeke toward the right hand, standeth a City called Alcluith, which in their language is as much as to say, as the rocke Cluith, for it standeth by a flood of the same name. The Brytaines then being thus afflicted by the said nations, sent their Ambassadors with letters vnto Rome, with lamentable supplications, requiring of them ayde and succour, promising their continuall fealty, so that they would rescue them against the oppression of their enemies: whereupon there was sent vnto them a Legion of armed souldiours from Rome, which comming into the Iland, and encountring with the enemies, ouerthrew a great number of them, and draue the rest out of the frontics of the country, and so setting them at liberty, and free from the misery with which they were before so grieuously ouercharged, counselled them to make a wall betwixt the two Seas, which might be of force to keepe out their euill neighbours: and that done, they returned home with great triumph. Now the Brytaines building the wall which they were bid to make, not of stones, as they were willed, but of turfe, as hauing none among them that had skill therein, made it so slender, that it serued them to little purpose. This wall was made betweene the two armes or creekes of the sea, many miles long, that where the fence of the water lacked, there by the helpe of the trench they might keepe their country from the breaking in of their enemies, of which piece of worke there remaineth euen vnto this day, most assured tokens yet to be seene. This trench beginneth about two miles from the monastery of Abercorning, in a place which in the Picts language is called Penuahill, and in English is called Panwelt, and running out Westward, is ended by the Citty Alcluith. But the former enemies, when they had once perceiued that the Romane Legion was returned home againe, foithwith being set on Land by boats, inuaded the borders, ouercame the Country, and, as it were, beat downe all before them: whereupon Ambassadours be sent againe to Rome, beseeching them they would not suffer their miserable Country to be vtterly destroyed. Against there is sent another Legion, which comming vpon a sudden, made a great slaughter of the enemies, and chased them ouer into their owne country. Then the Romanes told the Brytaines, that it was not their ease to take any more such trauelous Journies for their defence, and therefore bade them to practise their armour themselues, and to learne to withstand their enemies.

They builded by a wall of hard stone from sea

Picts wall

Sea to Sea, right between the two Cities, which there were made to keepe out the enemy, in the selfe same place where Seuerus before had cast his trench, with publike and priuate charges: the Brytaines also putting to their helping hands, they then builded it eight foot broad, and twelue foot high, right as it were by a lyne, from East to West, as it doth to this day appeare, which being perfected, they giue the people straight warning to looke well to themselues: they teach them to handle their weapons, and instruct them in warlike feats. Also by the Sea side Southward, where their ships lay at harbour, lest their enemies should land there aboutes, they made vp bulwarkes along, one somewhat distant from another: and this done, bid them farewel, as minded no more to return. At this time, almost all the treasure of Brytaine was hid vnder ground, or transported ouer into France.

As soone as they were gone, the Scots and Picts hauing intelligence, that they had made promise they would come no more, they taking heart of grace, returne againe to their businesse: and first, all that was without the wall, they tooke for their owne. After that, they giue assault vnto the wall, where the Brytaines were with grapples pulled downe, and otherwise so assaulted, that they leauing both the Cities and the wall also, were dispersed, and put to flight: the enemies following, killed and flayed more cruelly then euer they did before: whereupon, being driuen out of their owne houses and possessions, they fall a robbing, and spoyling one the other of them, so farre forth, that all the whole Countrey was brought to that exigent, that they had none other sustenance, but that they got by hunting and killing of wild beasts.

408. THeodosius the younger sonne of Arcadius, succeeded his vncle Honorius, and appointed Valentinianus his cousin, Emperour in the West parts.

At this time, Timotheus, heere in Brytaine, vnder a pretence of Religion and great continency, drew many into dangerous heresie.

Chrysanthus the sonne of Bishop Martian, a Consull of Italy, was made Viceroy and Lord Deputy of Brytaine, he was afterward made Bishop of Constantinople.

Now the poore remnant of the Brytaines directed letters to Ætius, whereof this was the beginning: To Ætius thrice Consull, the mourning of the Brytaines. In the processe of which Epistle, they thus set forth their pittifull estate. The barbarous enemie driueth vs vpon the Sea: the Sea againe vpon the enemie: betweene these twaine riseth two manner of deaths, either we are killed or drowned. And yet for all their suite, they could obtaine no ayde of him, as hee which had then both his hands full of businesse and battell at home with Bleda and Attila, Kings of the Hunnes.

The Pelagian Heresie being brought in by Agricola, the Sonne of Seuerianus a Pelagian Bishop, about this time did sore corrupt the faith of the Brytaines, but the Brytaines being neither willing to receiue their lewd doctrine, as blasphemous against the grace of God, neither able to refute their wily and wicked persuasions, they deuised this wholesome counsell, to seeke for ayde of the Bishops of France, against these their spirituall enemies. And they calling a common Councell, consulted among themselues, whom of them all it were best to send to helpe their neighbours faith. By the assent of them all, there were chosen two worthy Prelates Germanus Altisiodorensis, and Lupus, Bishop of the City Trecassa, which should passe ouer into Brytain to confirme them in the faith, which with ready obedience, accepting the commandement of the Synode, tooke shipping thitherward, and had prosperous winds, which set them ashore in a place where they themselues desired. Thither a great multitude of people being assembled, receiued the Priests of God, and the Word of God was preached by them, not onely in their Churches, but also in the open streets, and in the Countrey, in such sort, that in all places, both the sound and faithfull word were confirmed, and they that before swarued out of the right faith, were amended. The Authours and head professours of this heretical errour, lay lurking all this while, and much spited to see the people daily to fall from them. After long aduisement had, they take vpon them to try the matter by open disputation, which being agreed vpon, they come forth richly appointed, gorgeously apparelled, accompanied with a number of flattering fauourers. The people were present both to see and iudge the matter. The parties were farre vnlike in condition: on the one side was the faith, on the other, mans presumption: on the one side meeknesse, on the other side, pride: on the one side Pelagius, on the other, Christ. First of all, Germanus and Lupus gaue their aduersaries leaue to speake, which bainely occupied both the time & eares of the people with naked words. But after, the reuerend Bishops powred out their words confirmed with Scriptures out of the Gospels and Apostles. Thus the vanity of heretikes was confuted, and falsehood confuted, so that at every obiection, they were forced to confesse their errour, not being able to answer them: but after their departure, the heresie begunne againe to reuiue. Wherefore Germanus returned into Brytaine with Seuerus, banished the heretikes, and restored the Faith.

Pelagian heresie.

Pelagians heresie come againe.

The end of the ROMANES gouernement in BRYTAINE.

About this time began the foundation of Venice, and becauſe it is memorable, I haue thought good to ſet downe the Originall and ſtate thereof in briefe manner.

The Originall and ſtate of Venice.

Leda and Attila brethren, kings of the Huns, with their huge warlike Armies, did great oppreſſion and inuaſions vnto diuers Nations: and when in pride and practice of their matchleſſe ſtrength, after they had made great excurſions and ſpoyles vpon Illyria and Thrace, without ceaſing, vntill they came vnto Thermopyle, wherewith Attila grew proud, and extreme deſirous to be ſole Soueraigne, that he cauſed his elder Bleda to be traytorouſly murthered, and then hee ſubdued moſt Nations Eaſtward, and after that with fiue hundred thouſand men, he boldly inuaded the Romane Empire, viz. the Romanes and Viſigots, who encountred him with diuers Armies, but he repulſed them and paſſed violently thorow Italy, and forced the people to fly from City to City, and other places, of which ſort, ſome went and poſſeſſed certaine very ſmall Ilands in the ſea, which then were neither familiarly knowne by any man, nor called by any name, but were afterward called Venice, as you may read: hee alſo inuaded France, and beſieged Orleance in the yeere of the world, 4414. and after the incarnation of our Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt, 452. and gaue battell vnto Ætius the Vice-Emperor, and vnto Theodoric, King of Viſigots: the fight continued one whole day, wherein was performed all Martiall proweſſe, and 200000. ſlaine on both ſides, yea, ſuch was the effuſion of blood, that very many dead bodies floated by and downe, as if it had ben a bowle of blood: in this great battell, Attila had the worſt, yet neuer the leſſe, he reinforced himſelfe, and furiouſly aſſayled Italy, and had vtterly ſpoiled it, if the Pope, viz. Leo the firſt, had not humbled himſelfe before him, then he returned into his owne Countrey of Hungary. The Emperour Valentinian the third, being in a manner conſtrained, gaue him his ſiſter in marriage, after that he married another, at which Nuptiall he became ſo drunke, that hee dyed thereof: his blood guſhing out at his mouth and noſtrils in moſt lothſome manner. The Citty of Venice being at firſt but a ſmall thing, was gouerned by Conſuls, in the time of Pharamond, the firſt King of France, they zealouſly reſiſted Pelagius and Neſtorius, two great Heretikes. And in the yeere 582. Pope Pelagius the ſecond in a Councell of twenty Biſhops, by meanes of the Archbiſhop of Aquiſea, it was agreed that Grado ſhould be the Metropolis of Venice and Iſtria, by reaſon that Grado was then more Noble and populous then Venice, although at this day it is ſo ruinated, that there ſcarce remaines any memory of it: the foreſaid decree touching Grado, continued vntill the yeere, 654. after that Mallo, Mocco and Paleſtina, Hauen Townes: by meanes of a great concourſe of people from Padua and Mount Seluce, which came in company of the Biſhop of Padua, Venice was greatly encreaſed: this was done when Padua had bin deſtroyed by the Lombards, the third and fourth time, in the yeere 593. and in the foreſaid yeere 654. vnto the foreſayd ten Tribunes, were added two more to rule in Hyparlia, which Hyparlia tooke his name of Hyrachus the Chriſtian Emperour: the ſaid Hyparlia in the yeere, 603. was redified, and enlarged by Biſhop Magno, but Rotario, king of Lombards, ſtill exerciſing his cruelty, deſtroyed Oderzo and other places, as alſo there was ciuill warres a long time in Italy, ſo as many ancient Noble cities and other habitations being ruinated, the diſtreſſed perſons for their ſafety, reſorted and inhabited the foreſaid ſmall p'ats of ground, being indeed not worthy the name of Ilands, though they lye in the Sea, the chiefe whereof, was then called Riuo Alto, and is now called the Rialto, which they found to lie cõmodious for Traffike and Nauigation: then they encreaſed ſo faſt in people & building, that theſe petty Plats or Ilands became well inhabited, and therein with great Chriſtian pietie erected eight faire godly Churches, with many ſtately Palaces, ſo as the City grew very great, and the laſt 12. Magiſtrates of Tribunes continued but vntill the yeere 697. and was then by the foreſayd Hyracius, and Pope Sergius the firſt in the generall Councell of Aquilea: thoſe foreſaid Ilands, were called Venice, and by vertue of the ſaid Councell, it was ordained that they ſhould chooſe themſelues a Duke out of their City ſucceſſiuely for euer, and for concluſion of peace, after long diſſention betwixt Grado and Venice, the Pope was content that the Patriarchy of Grado, ſhould be tranſferred vnto Venice, ſince which time, he hath there held his Cathedra: and the Venetians haue beene gouerned by Dukes, aſſiſted by Senators. Paulo Lucio was the firſt Duke, and haue ſo continued Dukes by election, vntill this preſent yeere, with great honour and proſperity, ouer whom now at the publiſhing heereof this yeere, 1613. Leonardo Donato raigneth: there haue bene 91. Dukes ſince the ſaid ſignamed Councell.

BRYTAINES and SAXONS.

The Brytaines continued in doubtfull warre with the Scots and Picts, ſometime bearing away the victory, and ſometime leauing it to the enemy. But conſidering the ambitious minds of men, and fearing leſt ſome ſhould vſurpe the kingdome at home, while they were detained with warres abroad, thought good to appoint ouer them ſome King: and ſo with one conſent they elected Vortiger. 447.

VOrtiger raigned in Brytaine, in whoſe time hunger more preuailing againſt the Brytaines, Brytaines, drone many of them to yeeld themſelues vnto the hands of their enemies. Other there were which could neuer be brought therevnto, but from the hils and brakes where they lurked, many times inuaded their enemies, as truſting ſo much the more in the helpe of God, how much the leſſe hope they had of ayde of men, and by ſuch meanes, firſt of all both reſiſted and ouerthrew them, which many yeeres together had liued by the ſpoyle of the Country, whereby for the time they drew homeward with ſhame enough, intending not long after to returne.

The Picts then, and long time after, kept themſelues quiet at home, ſaue onely they would now and then make inuaſions into the Lme, and driue away bottes of cattell. After that they grew to a quietneſſe, there enſued ſuch plenty of graine, as neuer was ſeene the like before, as farre as any man could remember, whereof the people grew to looſe and wanton liuing, whereof all manner of lewdneſſe followed, ſpecially cruelty, hate of truth, and loue of lying, in ſo much, that if any were gentler and more giuen to truth then other, the other would worke him all the hurt and ſpite they could. This did not only the Seculars, but alſo the Cleargie, and the heads thereof, giuing themſelues ouer to drunkennelle, pride, contention, enuy, and ſuch other, ſaſting from them the yoke of Chriſt.

Gildas.

In the meane ſeaſon, a bitter plague befell among them for their corrupt liuing, conſuming in ſhort time ſuch a multitude of people, that the quicke were not ſufficient to bury the dead: and yet for all that, the remnant remained ſo hardned in ſinne, that neither their friends death, nor feare of their owne, could cure the maimaine of their ſoules, which daily periſhed through their ſinfull liuing: whereby a great ſtroke of Gods vengeance enſued vpon the whole ſinfull Nation: for being now infected againe with their old neighbours the Scots and Picts, they deuiſed with themſelues what was beſt to doe, and where they might ſeeke reſcue, to withſtand and repell the feare of the Northerne Nation: and they agreed all with their King Vortiger, to demand ayde of the Saxons beyond the Seas: which thing doubtleſſe (ſaith Bede) was done by Gods owne appointment, that the people might be thereby plagued, as by the end it manifeſtly appeared.

The people of the Engliſh or Saxons, being ſent for of the ſaid King into Brytaine, landed heere in three long ships, and by the Kings commandement, were appointed to abide in the Eaſt part of the Land. And the Ile of Thanet was giuen to them, they to defend their Countrey like friends, but indeed as it prooued afterward, minding to deſtroy the Countrey as enemies. Wherefore encountering with the Northerne enemy, the Saxons had the better, whereof they ſending word home into their Country, as alſo of the fruitfulneſſe of the Land, the Saxons ſent ouer a great Nauy and number of men better appointed for the warres, which being now ioyned with the former band, drew to a ſtronger army, then all the power of the Brytaines was able to ouercome. Thoſe by the Brytaines were allowed a place to dwell among them, with that condition, that they ſhould warre for them againſt their enemies, for wages of the Brytaines.

W. Malmeſ.

Theſe Saxons, Engliſh, and Iuites that came from beyond the Seas, were three of the ſtrongeſt Nations in Germany. Of the Iuites came the people of Kent, and the Ile of Wight, and alſo they in the Prouince of Weſt Saxons, are called Iuites, right ouer againſt the Ile of Wight. Of the Saxons (that is, of the Region now called old Saxons) deſcended the Eaſt Saxons, the South Saxons, and the Weſt Saxons. Of the Engliſh deſcended the Eaſt Engliſh, the Mercies, and the Northumbers. The chiefe Captaines of the Saxons are ſaid to be two brethren, Hengiſt and Horſus. This Hengiſt (ſaith Geffrey Monmouth) on a time required of King Vortiger, ſo much ground as mought bee compaſſed with a thong of a Bulls skin, thereupon to build a place to reſt in, which the King granted, where Hengiſt built a Caſtell, which he called Thong Caſtle, and therein feaſted King Vortiger with great royalty: and when night was come that the King ſhould goe to reſt, Rowen the daughter of Hengiſt, by commandement of her father, came with a Cup of gold in her hand, and kneeling before the King, ſaid to him, Waſſaile: and he againe, by counſell of an Interpreter, anſwered, Drinke haile: at which time King Vortiger ſeeing the beauty of this Rowen, hee was enamoured, and deſired to haue her to wife: which was granted by her father, on condition the King ſhould giue him all the Countrey of Kent, for him and his people to dwell in: which the King willingly, but vnaduiſedly granted, and eſpouſed the Damoſell.

Thong Caſtle in Kent, is now a ſmall village, little more then halfe a mile from Sidingborne. The ditches and the ſteepe hill of Thong Caſtle appeare in a little wood a two ſtight ſhot by South from Thong hurcch. Thong is a mile from the mouth of Melton creeke, and about halfe a mile from Melton Towne, if paſſage were thorow the Marſhes the nert way.

Thong Caſtle in Kent.

The originall of Waſſaile.

For the loue that Vortiger bare to Rowen the Saxon, hee was diuorced from his Lawfull wife, by whom hee had three Sonnes, for which deede, wel neere all the Brytaines forſooke him.

W. Malmeſ.

Vodine, Archbiſhop of London, a man of ſingular deuotion and good life, by the admire of Vortimer, went to Vortiger, and ſaid to him, that he had not done as a Chriſtian Prince, in departing from his Lawfull wife, and taking another women, whoſe father was an enemie to the Chriſtian Faith, and alſo went about to conquer the Crowne of Brytaine. Then ſaid Vortiger, I was not wiſe when I brought the Saxons to helpe me againſt mine enemies, but I was more vnwiſe, when I was taken with the inordinate luſt of the Daughter of Hengiſt: I know that mine Empire will be terrible, except I repent mee with ſpeede, and turne to GOD.

Archbiſhop of London reproueth the King.

Hengist hearing Vortiger make this lamentation, blamed him, for that he beleued the perswasions of a prophane man, of fained life (as hee termed him) and forthwith slew the good Archbishop Vodine, and many other Priests, and religious persons. All the Churches in Kent were polluted with blod: the Nuns with other religious persons, were by force put from their houses and goods, and constrained to pollution of their bodies.

The Brytaines considering the daily repaire of the Saxons into this Realme, shewed to their King the ieoperdy that might thereof ensue, and advertised him of the danger, but all was in vaine: for Vortiger, by reason of his wife, bare such favour to the Saxons, that hee would in no wise heare the counsell of his subiects: wherefore they with one minde deprived him of his royall dignity, when hee had raigned 6. yeeres, and ordained to be their King, Vortimer his eldest sonne.

454. VOrtimer pursued the Saxons, and by his martiall knighthood fought against them foure battels, besides diuers skirmishes, vntill at length he was poysoned by the meanes of Rowen his stepmother, after hee had raigned fiue yeeres. The first battell Hengist and Horsius, who were (saith Bede) the sonnes of Wiglike, whose father was Vecta, whose father was Woden, fought with Vortimer, and his brother Catigerne, in a place called Aglesthorpe, now Aelfsord in Kent: and notwithstanding that Horse was slaine in this battell, yet Hengist bare away the victory. Bede saith, that Horse was buried in East Kent, where his Tombe or Monument bearing his name, was in his time to be seene: and true it is, that in Kent to a place to this day called Horstede, about 2. miles from Aelsford, in the Parish of Chetham, where the people of that Countrey say, the said Horse was slaine. There was also slaine in the same battell at Aglesthorpe, Catigerne, brother to Vortimer, whose Monument remaineth til this day, on a great plaine heath in the parish of Aelsford, and is now corruptly called Otts cothons, for Catigernes. (I haue my selfe in company of diuers worshipfull and learned Gentlemen beheld it in Anno 1590.) And is of foure flat stones, one of them standing vpright in the middle of two other, inclosing the edge sides of the first, and the fourth laid flat aloft the other three: and is of such height, that men may stand on either side the middle stone in time of storme or tempest safe from winde and raine, being defended with the breadth of the stones, as hauing one at their backes, one on either side, and the fourth ouer their heads. And about one coits cast from this Monument, lieth another great stone, much part thereof in the ground, as faine down where the same had borne fired.

The second battell, Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines in a place called Creccanford, or Crekford in Kent: of the Brytaines, many perished by the sword, the rest of them abandoned Kent altogether, and with great feare fled to London.

The third battell, Hengist and Eske fought with the Brytaines, in a place called Weppedsfleet, that is to say, the fleet of Wepped, where they killed Dukes or Captaines of the Brytaines, with many other, whereas on the party of the Saxons, there was one onely man slaine, whose name was Wepped.

Wepped-fleet.

The 4th battell was fought by Hengist and Eske against the Brytaines, neere to a Poole called Colmoore, the which was sore fought by the Saxons, and long continued with great danger to the Brytains, because that the said Poole inclosed a part of their host so strongly, that the Brytaines could not approach to them, being beaten off with the enemies shot, albeit in the end, the Saxons were put to flight, and many of them drowned in the same Poole.

Vortiger obtained againe the kingdome, and shortly after, Hengist, which was chased into the Ile of Thanet, entred the Land with a number of Saxons: but when hee heard of the great assembly the Brytaines had made against him, he treated for peace, which in fine was concluded. Shortly after, Hengist (by a guile which before hee had deuised) bid his Son in Law, and 300. of his Nobles vnto a Feast or Banquet, where when hee had ouercloyd his guests with ouermuch Wine, he fell to quarrelling, and with taunting talke, pinched euery one of them, and straight fell to fighting, wherethrough the Brytains were slaine euery one. The King was taken prisoner, and forced to giue for his ransome, Kent, Sussex, Suffolke, and Northfolke. This murther of the Brytaines was on the plaine of Salisbury. Then Hengist began his dominion ouer Kent, and Vortiger fled into Wales, and builded there a Castle, of which building, & long let of the same, and of his Prophet Merlin, Geffrey Monmouth and others speake many things. Great companies of the Saxons daily flocked into this Iland, and grew so strong, that the people of the countrey which sent for them, stod in great feare for their puissance, for those Saxons had taken league with the Picts, and began to turne their force vpon the Brytaines: and to be short, the fire once kindled in the Lands of the Pagans there, tooke iust reuenge of the wickednes of the people, raging first vpon the cities and country next adioyning, after from the East sea to the West, ouerwhelming all the whole Land without resistance: both publike & priuate houses were ouerthrowne to the ground: the Priests were slaine standing at the Altar: the Bishops with their flocke were murdred, without respect of their dignity, nor there was any that would bury the slaine: some of the miserable leauings being taken in the hils, were there killed: other being starued with hunger, were faine to creepe out of their caues, and buy their victuall at their enemies hands, with saile of their liberty for euer, if yet they were not killed out of hand: other fled ouer the seas with an heauy heart: other tarrying still in their country in feare of death, and lack of food, liued full miserably in the mountains, woods, and cliffes. Aurelius Ambrose, and Vther (brethren of Constantine that was before slaine

465. Bede. W. Malmes.

AVrelius Ambrose was ordained King of Brytaine, in whose time the Brytaines by little and little began to take strength and courage vnto them, comming out of their caues in which they lurked before, and with one consent, calling for heauenly helpe, that they might not for euer be vtterly destroyed. They hauing for their captaine and leader, the foresaid Ambrosius Aurelius, assembled themselues together, and prouoking the victors to fight, through Gods assistance attchieued the victory, and from that day forward, were the men of the country. Now the enemy had the victory vntill the yeer that Bathe was besieged, where they gaue their enemies a great ouerthrow, which was about the foure and forty yere of their comming into the Land. But of this we shall speake more hereafter.

W. Malmes.

Of this Ambrosius, William Malmesbury writeth thus: Surely, euen then (saith he) the Brytaines had gone to wracke, if Ambrosius, who onely and alone of all the Romanes, remained in Brytaine, s was Monarch of the Realme after Vortiger, had not kept vnder the proud Barbarians, with the notable trauaile of the warriour Arthur. Now it followeth in Geffrey, that this Ambrosius caused Churches to be repaired, which had ben spoiled by the Saxons: he caused also the great stones to bee set on the Plaine of Salisbury, which is called Stonehenge, in remembrance of the Brytaines that were slaine and buried there, in the raigne of Vortiger, at the banquet and communication of Hengist with the Saxons. This ancient Monument is yet to be seen, and is a number of stones, rough, and of a gray colour, 25 fate in length, and about 10 fat in breadth, they are ioyned by two and two together, and euery couple fastneth a third stone lying ouerthwart, gatewise, which is fastened by the meanes of tenons that enter into mortaises of those stones not closed with any cement. It appeareth, that there hath bene 3 ranks going round as circles one within another: whereof the vttermost and largest containeth in compasse 300 fate, but the other ranks are decayed, nor therefore yard to reckon how many stones there be.

The Chronicles of the Brytaines doe testifie, that whereas the Saxons, about the yere of our Lord 450. had slaine 480. of the Brytaines Nobility by treason, and vnder colour of a treaty, Aurelius Ambrose now King of the Brytains desirous to continue their memory, with some worthy Monument, caused these stones to be set vp in a place of their murther and burial, the which stones had beene first brought from Affrik into Ireland, and placed on mount Killare, and from thence by the industrious meanes of Merlin, were conueyed to this place to the foresaid end. There are about this place, certaine little hils, or banks, vnder the which are found sometimes bones of big men, and pieces of armour: also not far from thence, remaine old ruines of the manner of a fortresse, which the Romanes (as it is not vnlike) did build there in times past.

Alla, and his three sonnes, Kimon, Plineing, and Cissa, came into Brytaine with three ships, and landed with them in a place called Kimenshore: and there slew many of the Brytaines, forcing the rest to make their flight into a wood called Andredsleage: this Alla fighting with the Brytains in a place nere vnto Pecreds Towne, or Pecreds Kleat, slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

The same yeere, two Dukes, to wit Cerdic and Kenric, his sonne, came into Brytaine with 5 ships, and arriued in a place called Cerdicshore, the same day they fought with the Brytaines, and put them to flight: Cerdic and his sonne Kenric, slew Natanleod King of the Brytaines, and 5000. men, of whose name that countrey as farre as Cerdicsford, was called by the name of Natanleod.

Aurelius Ambrose being poysoned, died, when hee had raigned 35 yeeres, and was buried at Stonehenge, then called Chorea Gigantum.

VTher Pendragon, so called, for that hee caused alwaies a Dragon to be borne before him in his battels, was crowned King of Brytaine: he vanquished Octa and Oza, at Windgate, by Coquet River. He was enamored vpon Igren the Dukes wife of Cornewall, and to obtaine his vnlawfull lust, made warre vpon her husband Goilen, and slew him in battell at Dunliot. On her he begat Arthur. He raigned 8. yeeres, and was buried at Stonehenge.

ARthur the sonne of Vther, borne in Cornewall, at the age of 15. yeeres was crowned King of Britain, as some say, at Caerleon, other at Winch. One old nameleste pamphlet saith, at Cilicester, by Dubritius, Archbish. of Legions.

516. Nennius.

This City of Cilicester in Britih is called Caersegent, and was situate nere Reading. It was so called, for that Constantius the sonne of Constantine the great dyed there: his Sepulchre might once haue bene seene there besides the city, as the letters engrauen on it in stone, did declare. Thus farre the said nameleste Author.

See Chron.

The Towne of Cilicester, is yet to be seene in Hampshire, euen in the very edge of it, as the bambe diuideth, it is 6. miles or more from Reading, and containeth within the wall of stone about 80. acres of ground, diuided into 3. fields, beside the ground about the Pannor place it self, and the Church. The wall is about two miles compasse, with foure places where gates haue bene, on the which wall grow some Oakes of 10. cart load the piece, the ground within the wall, is almost leuell with the top of the same wall, but without the wall, is 6. or 7. foote of height, above the ground within the wall at this present, is one farme house, and a parish church, the parishioners whereof dwell without the Towne. There is in digging and plowing much Romane money found: the ground there beareth wheate and corne, saue in some place, the corne being maruellous faire to the eye, and ready to shew perfecter, it decayeth. The Land of the Towne, after the Conquest came to one Blewith, and then one of the Blewiths leauing no heyre male, the Land not entailed to the heyres generall, came by marriage to one Peter de Cusance, Knight: and after, to one Edward Baynard, comming out of the house of the Baynards of Esser, whose name is now obscure there: thus much of Cilicester. And now againe to Arthur, who, as is reported, take to wife Guineuer, cousin to Cador, Duke of Cornwall, and daughter to the King of Liskar. Of this King Arthur there be many fabulous reports: but certaine he was (saith Will. of Malmesbury) a Prince more worthy to haue aduancement by true Histories, then false fables, being the onely pyop and vp-holder of this his country.

In the yere of our redemption 528. being the second yere of Iustinian the Emperour, the Gregorian, Theodosian and Hermogenian Codes were reduced into twelue bookes, which before that time were very pooly, and of infinit number.

The abridging and reducing the Ciuill Law into vniformity.

In the 4th yere of the raigne of Iustinian were published 50. bookes of Digests or Pandects.

Not long after that, came forth the institutions ordained for young students of the Law.

The 8th yeere of Iustinian, came forth a new Code, and shortly after were published new institutions, called in Latine Nouellæ institutiones.

Hee also ordained professors of the Law, viz. two at Baruth in Syria, 2. at Constantinople, and at Rome 4. Read Neander and Eunapius.

The abridging and reducing of the Ecclesiasticall Decrees into order and vniformity.

In the yere of our redemption, 1077. being the 22. yere of the Emperour Henry the fourth, and in the 5. yere of Pope Hildebrandus, otherwise called Gregory the 7. the order of Canons regular began to flourish in many places, according as they were instituted by Saint Augustin, namely at S. Quintines, which order of Monks was there placed by the famous Clerke, Ines, who was afterward Bishop of Chartres: hee compiled many goodly works, among which, one was the great and excellent booke of the Decretales, called Pamormia Iuonis, which was afterward called Iuons Decretal, because in the same booke he had abridged, and reduced into breuity the Apostolique Decrees, as you may read in the 26. booke, and 84. chap. of the Pystor of Pyskories. The foresaid Decretall was made at first very prolix and intricate, by Isidore in the time of Hyraclius the Emperor, as Vincent witnesseth in the 31. chapter of his 23. booke, and as you may well perceiue by what is already said, the Decretall was so very great, that besides the prolixity thereof, men could neither orderly read it, nor with any conuenience carry it from one place to another, for in the same was collected & contained all the Decrees of the Apostles, the Canons & Councels of all the Popes: after these came the renowned Gratianus a Monke, and from the foresaid Decretals, hee reduced them into order and breuity, and compiled the Decretall which is now in vse.

In the beginning of his raigne, Locho and Conradus his allies, enuying his prosperity, made warre against him, but he valiantly vanquished them with their Picts and Scots, and at his pleasure appointed them a gouernor, named Anguisel. He fought 12. battels against the Saxons, and alwaies bare away the victory. These battels (saith Nennius) were fought in places following:

Anno Hist.

Nennius.

The first battell was fought in the mouth of the water Glepue or Gledy.

The second, third, fourth, and fift, nigh vnto the River Douglase which is in the County of Lincur.

The sixt vpon the River Bassus.

The seuenth in the wood Calidon, or Carcoite Calidon.

The eight beside the Castle called Guinirn.

The ninth at Cotreiten in Wales.

The tenth by the Sea side, in a place called Trachevrith, or Rithopwode.

The eleuenth vpon an hill named Agned Cathergonien.

The twelfth, at the hill or Tolr ne of Bath, then named Bathen-hill, where many more were slaine by the force of Arthur: for he alone (saith Will. Malmes.) hauing the Image of our Lady soiled vpon his armes, fet vpon 900. of his enemies, and with an incredible slaughter put them to flight. But now concerning this Bath before mentioned, it is to be noted, that Bath in Sowersetshire standeth low compassed about with hils, whereby it is euident, that either it is remoued from that place where it stood in Nennius time, or else that the place which he called Badonicus Mons, was not this Towne it self, as Leyland and other coniecture, but some other high place neere, which is not vnlikely: for at this day within a mile of it, ouer a towne called Bannardowne, which is so called, either corruptly for Bathendowne, or else in memory of the Bannars displayed there, Bannerdowne. and secretly to me, both vpon the sight of the place, and report of such as haue gathered caps full of mens teeth in following the plow there, to be the same that Nennius (corruptly calleth Gildas) or Bede meaneth, though Polidor mistakes it for Blanchewode. Thus much for Badon hill: now to the History.

Bath, or Bathen hill.

W. Lambanners-downe.

Afterward Arthur raised the siege, which the Saxons had planted about Lincolne, and slew them in great numbers. On the other side (saith W. Mal.) though the English Saxons were forced with the variable valliance of fortune, yet they did alwaies supply their armies, when they were decayed, with their countrimen which came to him. & therefore with the better courage they ran vpon the weapons of their enemies, & when the inhabitants by little and little quailed & gaue ouer, they spred themselues thorow the whole Iland; Gods pleasure being so, in whose hand & power the alteration & change of all kingdomes is, is, and doth consist: but these things came to passe in processe of time and yeres.

Arthurs round table.

Arthur hauing abated the rage of the Saxons, as is afore shewed, and reduced his country to quietnesse, he constituted the order of the round table, into the which order he only retained such of his Nobility as were most renowned for vertue and Chiualry. This round table he kept in diuers places, especially at Carlion, Winchester, and Camalet in Somersetthire. This Camalet sometimes a famous Towne or Castle, standeth at the South end of the Church of South Gadbury, the same is situate on a very hy or hil, wonderfully strengthened by nature, to the which be two entrings vp, by very steepe way, one by North, another by South-West. The very rote of the hill, whereon this Fortresse stood, is more then a mile in compasse. In the vpper part of the top of the hill be 4. ditches or trenches, 3 a bally wall of earth betwixt euery one of them. In the very top of the hill aboue all the trenches, is Magna area, or campus, of 20. acres or more, where in diuers places men may see foundations and rudor of walls. There was much dusky blue stone, that people of the village there by haue carried away. This top within in the vpper wall being more then 20. acres, hath often beene plowed, and borne very good corne: much gold, siluer, & copper of the Romans come hath bin found there in plowing, and likewise in the fields about the rots of this hill, with many other antique things, especially by Cast.

Camalet Castle.

There was found in memory of men, a horsehoofe of siluer at Camalet. The people can tell nothing there, but that they haue heard say, that Arthur much resorted to Camalet. The old Lord Hungarford was owner of this Camalet, since Hatting, Earle of Huntington by his mother, &c.

There is yet to be seene in Denbighshire, in the Parish of Lansanan, in the side of a stony hill, a place compassed, wherein be the foure and twenty seats for men to sit in, some lesse, and some bigger, cut out of the maine Rock by mans hand, where children and young men, comming to seeke their Cattell, vse to sit and play: they commonly call it Arthurs round Table.

Flores Historiar.

While Arthur was thus vnlikely occupied in his warres beyond the seas, (where he wrought many wonders, as some haue written, but farre vnlike to be true) Mordred, to whom he had committed the gouernment of Britaine, considerating himselfe with Cerdicus, first king of the West Saxons, traytorously vsurped the kingdome, of which treason, when relation came to Arthur, he speedily returned into Britaine, and at Richbrow nere to Sandwich, gaue battell to him, and won the field. Anguisel of Scotland, Gawin and Cador were there slaine, then pursuing him into Cornwall, gaue him battell there against the River of Alaune, of some Historiens called Cablan, where Mordred was slaine. And Arthur being deadly wounded, was conueyed to Glastenbury, where hee dyed on the 21. day of May, in the yere of Christ, 542. and was there buried, after hee had victoriously gouerned this Realme 26. yeres: he gaue Wentwarth (saith Rowse) with other possessions, to the value of 500 marks, to the Abby of Glastenbury.

More then 600. yeres after his death, to wit, about the yere of Christ, 1189. which was the last yere of the raign of King Henry the second: his body was found buryed in the Churchyard betwixt 2. pillars, 16. foote deepe vnder ground, but those that digged the ground there to find his body, after they had entred about 7. foote deepe into the earth, they found a mighty broad stone, with a leaden Crosse fastened to that part, which lay downewards towards the corps, containing this inscription:

Hic iacet sepultus inclitus Rex Arturius in insula Aualonia.

This inscription was grauen on that side of the Crosse which was next to the stone, so that till the Crosse was taken from the stone, it was not seen. His body was found, not inclosed within a Tombe of stone, but within a great tree made hollow like a trough, the which being digged vpon and opened, therein were found the bones of Arthur, which were of a maruellous bignes, as Giral. Cambrensis, a learned man that then liued, reporteth to haue heard of the Abbot of Glastenbury, of whom he was enformed, that the thigh-bone of Arthur being set vp by the leg of a very tall man, came about it like the breadth of 3. fingers. The skull of his head of a wonderfull bignesse, in the which head, there appeared the paints of 10. woundes or more: all the which were growne into one scame, except onely that wherof he dyed, which being greater then the other, appeared very plaine. Also in opening the Tombe of his wife Guineuer, that was buryed with him, they found the tresses of her haire whole and perfect, finely platted, of colour like to gold, but being touched, fell to dust: the Abbot of that house (sometime Prior of Dermonsey) was named Henry Bloys, and was Nephew to King Henry the second, by whose commandement the burpall of Arthur was searched for and found. Whose bones, with the bones of Guineuer his wife being found, were removed into the new great Church (for the old was burned in Anno 1191.) and there buryed in a faire Tombe of Marble, laying the bones of the king at the head of the Tombe, and the bones of the Queene at his feete toward the West. The Crosse of lead with the inscription, as it was found, and taken off the stone, was kept in the treasury of reuester of Glastenbury church, till the suppression thereof, in the raigne of King Henry the eight.

685. CAdwalladar (saith Geffrey) was ordained King of the Brytaines, and ruled only three yeres: he banquished and slew Lothier, King of Kent, and Athelwold, king of South Saxons: and then forsaking his kingly authority, he went to Rome, there to be christened, who after became a Monke, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Rome. He was last king of Brytaine (saith Geffrey) but Bede sheweth, that Lothier, King of Kent, was slaine by Edrike, who succeeded him in that kingdome of Kent: and Ethelwold hee saith was slaine by a Saxon called Ceadwalla, King of the West Saxons, which Ceadwalla went to Rome, and was there buried, as you may read in the Hi?to?y of the West Saxon kings.

NOw are we come to the time wherin God (who fo? the sins of the people, translateth kingdomes) dispossessed the Brytaines of their ancient habitation, and rule of this Land, who by the victory of Saxons were enforced, either to miserable seruitude, o? driuen into the Westerne parts of the Ile, now called Wales and Cornwall, (where they now inhabit) o? else to their countreymen the Brytaines in France. They also called the Brytaines Walshmen, as who should say, strangers, that vse an vnknown tongue. This happened in the raigne of Ceadwalla, King of the West Saxons, whom Geffrey Monmouth calleth Cadwalladar, King of the Brytaines, about the yeere of Christ, 658. when the Brytaines being wasted with ciuill dissention, pestilence, and famine, lost all that small that they had long time painefully kept, and were couched in a corner. Thus much fo? the Brytaines: and now shall be shewed the raigne of the Saxons, who enioying the fertile soyle of this Realme, parted it in processe of time into seuen kingdomes: Kent, Southsex, East-angles, East-saxons, Mercia, Nozthumberland, and West-saxons, which the learned call the Heptarchy of the Saxons, of which kingdomes, I purpose (fo? auoyding of confusion) to treat seuerally, setting downe the limits of these countries, with the succession, Acts, and ciuill battels of their petty kings, vntill the time that this Heptarchy, o? gouernment of seuen, was reduced to a Monarchy, o? regiment of one.

KENTISH-SAXONS.

456. KEnt, the first kingdome possessed by the Saxons, contained that Country that stretcheth from the East Ore an to the River of Thames, hauing on the Southwest side Southery, on the West, London, and vpon the Nozthest, the said River of Thames. It hath the Archbishopzick of Canterbury, Metropolitane and Primate of all England, and the Bishopzicke of Rochester, and had Kings as followeth.

HEngist the Sonne of Widgils, the Son of Victa, the sonne of Weeta, the first sonne of Woden and Frea, was the first of the Saxons that made himselfe king of Kent, as before yee haue heard, 8. yeeres after his first entring into this Iland, in the yere from Christs birth, 456. He raigned 34. yeres, and died honozably, saith Marianus: others haue written, that by the counsell of Elded, Bishop of Glocester, Edell, Duke of Glocester, caused his head to be cut off, at Conesbozow. But this hath no likelihood of truth: fo? certaine it is, that Robert, base Son to Henry the first, was made first Earle of Glocester, and Henry the eighth made the first Bishop of Glocester. Marianus Florilegus. Bede. Austine came into Brittain. Ethelbert was the first Christian king of the Saxons. The first Earle of Glocester, and the first Bishop of Glocester.

490. ESke o? Vske, succeeding his father Hengist, raigned peacefully 24. yeeres.

514. Otta, sonne of Eske raigned 22. yeeres.

536. Emericus, the Sonne of Otta raigned 25. yeeres.

562. W. Malmes. EThelbert the Sonne of Emericus, had gouernment of this kingdome, by the space of 53. (o? after Bede, 56.) yeeres. This Ethelbert in the beginning of his raigne, being but a childe, was troubled with warres on euery side, that her could hardly defend his owne Coasts. In his first battell against Ceauline, King of the West Saxons, and Cuthe his Sonne, hee was forced to make his flight into Kent, hauing two of his Dukes, Oslaue and Cnebbano slaine in a place called Unibadumi: but when he came to more age, and was more cunning in warre, in short space, hee ouercame all the kingdomes of the Saxons round about, saue the Nozthumbers. And to the end he would haue acquaintance with fo?raigne Princes, hee made affinity and alyance with the King of France, by the marrying of his daughter Berta, a Christian woman, to whom hee permitted to vse the Lawes and Rites of her Countrey, and to haue a Bishop, whose name was Letardus, to remains with her, fo? her better instruction in the Lawes of God. By this meanes the barbarous and Heathen Saxons keeping company with the French, did agree to haue all one Law and like customes: besides this, the chaste & vertuous life of Letardus the Bishop and the other French, which came with the Queene, changed the kings mind vnto the knowledge of Christ, whereby it came to passe, that afterward he did so seeme giue place to the preaching of Augustine. Bede. At this time (saith Bede) the Brytaines being at quiet, little regarding the stormes past in their fathers dayes, and hauing respect onely to the present prosperous estate in the which they then lined, were so set to breake all good o?ders of truth and iustice, that scant any token o? remembrance thereof remained, but only in a few. Among many other of their deings, which their own Hi?to?iographer, Gildas, doth lamentably set fo?th in writing (he saith of them thus) that they neuer take care to preach the Gospell of Christ vnto the Angles and Saxons, which inhabited the Land among them. But yet the goodnesse of God prouided fo? the said Nation of the Angles, much more worthy preachers, by whom they might be brought to the Faith. Gildas.

In the yere 596. Pope Gregory moued of godly instinction in the hundred forty and seuen yeere after the arriuall of the Angles in Brytaine, sent Augustine, Melitus, Iustus and Iohn, with sundry other Monks that lined in the feare of God, to preach the Gospell to the Nation of the Angles in Brytaine, which landed in the Ile of Thanet, and were first receiued by Ethelbert king of Kent, whom they conuerted to the Christian Faith, with diuers of his people. In the 24. yeere of his raigne: and king Ethelbert delaying no time, gaue vnto Augustine the City of Canterbury, who furthered thus by the king, receiued at his hands an old Church, sometimes founded there by the faithfull Romanes, and dedicated the same to our Sauiour Iesus Christ, which since was called Austins. S. Augustins at Canterbury builded.

Augustine consecrated Melitus and Iustus Bishops, and appointed Melitus to preach vnto the East Saxons, who with their king Sebert the Nephew of king Ethelbert, at the preaching of Melitus, receiued the Word of life.

King Ethelbert founded the Church of Saint Paul in London. Iustus was made Bishop of Rochester, where Ethelbert builded fo? him and his successors the Church of S. Andrew. S. Paules in London founded. S. Andrewes in Rochester founded. Bede.

This yeere 603. died Pope Gregory the first, vpon the fifth of March, being the second yeere of Phocas the Emperor, after he had gouerned the Romane Sea 13. yeres, 6. moneths, and 10. daies, after whom succeeded Sabinian the first.

About this time (saith Bede) Austine (by the aide of king Ethelbert) called together the Bishops and Doctours of the greatest Vniuersitie and nerest to him, which were the Brytaines, to commune with them, in a place which to this day is called Augustines Oake, as yee would say, the power and strength of Austine, being in the borders of the Hiccians and West Saxons. There hee beganne with brotherly admonition (saith Bede) to perswade them to peace and Catholike vnity with him, and to communicate with him fo? Gods sake, the labour Austin erected the Brittaines to vnity with him.

of preaching the Gospell to the Heathen of England: for as yet they keepe not the Easter Sunday in due time, but from the fourteenth to the twentieth Moone, which count is concluded in compasse of eighte foure yeeres. They vsed moreouer, many other things contrary to the vnitie of the Church, which when they had beene with long discourse declared, and these men, neither for prayers, rebukes or threats of Augustin and his company, would giue their assent, but rather preferred their owne tradition before all other Churches, which throughout the World, agreed with Austine in Christ. Whereupon Austine fell to prayer, and also restored a blinde man to sight (saith Bede) which the Brytaines could not doe, and therefore confessed indeede that to be the true Way of Righteousnesse which Austine had preached and shewed them, but yet said, they could not alter their old customes, without the consent of their Clergie and people. They desired therefore to haue a second Synode of a greater multitude. Which when it was appointed to be so, there came by report, seuen Brytaine Bishops, and many other well-learned men, especially out of their greatest Monastery of Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbot.

Second Synode.

Monastery of Bangor.

These men being now ready, togoe to the foresaid Synode, came first to a certaine holy and Wise man (which liued thereabout an Anchoritelife) to aske his counsell, whether they ought at Austines preaching and exhortation, leaue their traditions or no? Who answered them: If (quoth he) hee be a man of God, follow him. But how shall wee proue (say they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchorite answered, Our Lord saith, Take on you my yoke, and learne you of me, for I am milde, and humble of heart: it is likely that himselfe beareth the yoke of Christ, and will offer you the same to beare: but if he be cursit and proud, it is certaine that hee is not of God, neyther must wee much esteeme his words.

The Brytaines counsel to an Anchorite.

Matth. 11.

Then they enquired of him how they might know whether this Austine were proud or not? Mary (quoth hee) prouide yee that hee with his company come first to the place of the Synode, or Councell-house. And if when ye approach neere, hee ariseth courteously to you, thinke yee that hee is the seruant of Christ, and so heare yee him obediently: but if hee despise you, nor will vouchsafe to rise at your presence, which are more in number, let him likewise be despised of you.

And truely, as this Anchorite bade them, so did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, Austine was already there, and sate in his chayre: which when they saw, straightway waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeuored to ouerthwart and gainsay whatsoeuer he proposed: his Oration briefely was thus: Although, deare brethren, in many other points yee doe contrary to our custome, or rather contrary to the custome of the vniuersall Church of Christ: yet notwithstanding, if ye will in these three things consent vnto me, that is, to celebrate the Easter in due time, to accomplish the Ministery of Baptisme, according to the Romane, and Apostolike Church, and last of all, to preach with vs to this English Nation, the Word of our Lord, all your other Ceremonies, Rites and Customes, though they be contrary to ours, yet wee will willingly suffer, and be content to beare with them. But they answered, they would doe none of the things requested, neither would account him for their Bishop: saying, Nay, if he would not so much as rise to vs, truely the more wee should now subiect our selues to him, the more would hee hereafter despise vs, and set vs at nought. To whom Austine threatfully prophesied, that if they would not take peace, and be at accord with their brethren, they should receiue and feele warre from their enemies. And if they would not preach to the Englishmen the way of life, they should suffer at their hand, and by their power, the vengeance of death: which thing came to passe afterward, as shall be shewed in the raigne of Edilfride King of the Northumbers.

The Brytaines refuse Austine to be their Archbishop, or to obey him in any thing. Austin threatneth the Brytaines.

The said yeere of Christ, 603. also died Augustine the Archbishop, the 26. of May, after the decease of Saint Gregory, two moneths, two weekes, and two daies: And after himselfe had beene consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury eight yeeres, fiue moneths, and one and twenty daies, but before he deceased, he ordained Laurence to succeed him in the Archbishoprick, which he saw in his life time the rather perfourmed, left that after he was dead, the state of the Church (being as yet but rude, and lately conuerted) might beginne to waxe and fall, if it should haue lacked a Pastor or Ruler neuer so little awhile: his body was for a time layde in the porch of the forenamed Church of Saint Peter and Paul, because the Church was not yet finished, nor dedicated, but shortly after the dedication of the same, (which was done by Laurence his successor) hee was translated into the Church, and layd on the North side thereof decently. And vpon his Combe was written this Epitaph, Hic requiescit Dominus Augustinus Doroberniensis Episcopus primus, &c. Heere resteth blessed Augustine, the first Bishop of Doraborna, who being sent hither of holy Gregory Bishop of Rome, and strengthened of God by the working of miracles, conuerted King Ethelbert and his people from the worshipping of Idols, to the Faith of Christ, and fulfilling in peace the daies of this office, hee dyed the twentie sirth of May, in the raigne of the same King Ethelbert.

Augustine the Archbishop deceased.

Gocelini monachi antiqui Epitaph. of Augustine.

The Noble King Ethelbert, making prouision for them that should come after, brought the Lawes of his Country into the mother tongue, thereby to reward the good accordingly, and to withstand the wicked by seuere meanes, and let nothing whereof his posterity needs to doubt in any matter, and then after his temporall raigne, which hee had kept most gloriously ouer the Kentish Saxons, the space of 54. (or after Bede 56.) yeres, he entred into the eternall Blisse of the Kingdome of Heauen vpon the foure and twentieth day of February, being the eleuenth yeere after that he had receiued the faith of Christ, and the nineteenth yeere after S. Augustine, with his company were sent to the English Nation to preach: he was the third King, and raigned ouer all the South Prouinces, which are separated from the North, by the River of Humber, and the borders adioyning thereunto. King Ethelbert being married to the Lady Bertha, a Christian woman, and Daughter of the King of France, receiued of her a sonne, named Edbald, (who married Emma the daughter of the King of France) and a daughter named Ethelburge, otherwise called Tate, that was married to Edwin, king of Northumberland, which Edwin was conuerted to the faith by Bishop Pauline. The place of King Ethelberts buriall was in S. Martins Parish within the Church of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul, neere Canterbury, on the North side of the same Church, which he builded from the ground, as before is declared, where also the Noble Lady, Queene Bertha, his wife, was buried before him, and the Bishop Luiardus that came out of France with her, and vpon his graue was left this inscription:

Rex Ethelbertus hic claditur in poliandro,
Fana pians certus Christo meat absque meandro.

EDbald, when he had taken vpon him to rule the Realme, and stood no longer in awe of his father, hee did not onely refuse to accept the faith of Christ, but was also polluted with such a fornication, as the Apostle witnesseth, neuer had beene heard of among the Gentiles, which is, that hee had married his fathers wife, with the which two haynous facts hee gaue occasion to his subiects to returne to their former filth, which vnder his fathers raigne, for fauour or for feare of the king, had perfect to the Lawes of Christian faith, and chastity: but the scourge of God, and vengeance from Heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaithfull King: for he was plagued with often frensie of minde, and raging fury of an vncleane spirit: but by Laurence, Archbishop of Canterburie, hee was at length conuerted from his Idolatry, and vnlawfull fame, and was turned againe to the Faith, and being baptized, hee endeuoured to maintaine the state of the Church in all points to the vttermost: he builded a Chappell within the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul, and gaue to that Monastery a great portion of Land: hee is said to be the first founder of Fulkstone in Kent, but I haue seene no Charter thereof: he raigned 25 yeeres, and was buryed by his Father in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul.

640. ERcombert, the Sonne of Edbald by Emma his wife, hee first suppressed the Temples of the Idols, and because his people were giuen to excesse, commanded a solemne fast of forty daies long, to bee obserued thorowout all his kingdome, and raigned twenty sius yeeres. It is recorded in the Antiquities of Chsikes Church in Canterbury, that about this time,

The Archbishoprickes of Canterbury and Yorke erected.

Honorius, Archbishop of Canterbury, diuided his Prouince into Parishes. Which Honorius deceased in Anno 693. when hee had sate Archbishop 20. yeeres.

667. W. Malmesb. EGbert his Sonne succeeded, whose quiet gouernment for a long season was afterward defaced by the cruell murther of Ealbert, and Egelbright his cousins Germans, whom either he slew himselfe, or procured to be slaine by a trap, named Thanor: he raigned 9. yeres.

The Lady Domneua, next true heyre to the Crowne from Edbald, erected a Monastery called Minster in the Ile of Thanet, and became first Abbesse there.

674 OThanus succeeded his brother Egbert, who being assaulted oftentimes by Edrike, the Sonne of Egbert, in a cruell fight was shot thorow with a dart, whereof hee dyed vnder his Surgeons hands, when he had raigned thirteene yeeres, and was buried with his predecessours, Kings, in the Monastery of Peter and Paul by Canterbury.

EDrick the Sonne of Egbert, within the space of two yeeres, lost both life and kingdome. After his death, the kingdome being sometime gouerned by vsurpers, and sometime by forreiners, began to decay.

The Kentishmen by casting of fire, did cruelly burne Moll, the brother of Cedwall, King of the West Saxons, and twelue of his Knights with him: wherewith Cedwall being mooued to fury, did vilerably harry and spoyle all Kent, so that by these pace of fiue yeeres, there was no King in that Countrey.

698 WIthredus, the Sonne of Egbert, purchasing peace with money, was then established King, in which state he behaued himselfe very honorably, both in peace and warre. Hee founded the Priorie of Saint Martin at Douer, and raigned 33. yeeres, with whom King Swebheard de raigned iointly in one part of his kingdome.

732 EDbert the Sonne of Withred, walked in his fathers ordinances, and had like successe, and raigned 23. yeeres.

This yeere 737. the Visigots ended their raigne, and about foure yeeres past, dyed the venerable Bede.

The end of the Visigots. The venerable Bede died.

This yeere 729. two dreadfull Starres appeared, the one before the Sunne rising, the other after the Sunne setting, both which appeared in the moneth of January, the space of 15. daies, and carryed with them the likeneese of a bundle of fire against the North, and somewhat towards the West, at which time, the Pagans infested France and Spaine.

754 EDelbert his brother succeeded, in whose time the City of Canterbury (as is to be thought) was burned by chance: he raigned not 11. yeres, and was buried in the Monastery of Peter and Paul at Canterbury.

769 ALricke, the third Sonne of Withred, ruled Kent after his brethren, and was vanquished shed in a fought field against Offa King of the Mercians: hee raigned 34. yeeres, and was the laſt of the line or ſucceſſion of the Kings of Kent.

799. EDelbert or Egbert, otherwiſe called Pren, then vſurped the kingdome, and leuied war againſt the Mercians, by whom hee was taken priſoner, and not long after reſtored, but the Kentiſhmen would not receiue him. Cuthred then vſurped, and bare a Title of a Kentiſh king for the ſpace of eight yeeres.

BAlbred the heyre of Cuthred then tooke on him the Princely dignity, but Egbert King of the Weſt Saxons, ſo diſcomfited him in battell, that hee fled ouer the Riuer of Thames, and loſt both his kingdome, when he had raigned 20. yeres, and was neuer heard of afterward. whereby this kingdome of Kent was united to the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons. 827.

The yere 829. Wilfred, Archbiſhop of Canterbury deceaſed, and was buried in Chriſts Church in Canterbury, when hee had ſate 27. yeres, after whom ſucceeded Fleogild.

SOVTH-SAXONS.

SOuthſex the ſecond kingdom contained the Counties of Southſex and Surrey, which had on the Eaſt ſide Kent, on the South ſide the Sea, and on the Weſt ſide Hampſhire, and on the North, the Riuer of Thames: it containeth the Dioceſſes of Chicheſter, and part of Wincheſter.

847. AEle the eighth from Woden, with his three ſonnes, Cimen, Plencing and Ciſſa, came into Bryttaine with three ſhips, and landed in a place called Kimenſhore, and there ſlew many of the Bryttaines, and forced the reſt to make their flight into a wood which is called Andeſeage. After ward fighting with the Bryttaines in a place nere vnto Marcredes burne, ſlew many of them, and put the reſt to flight. Then hee and Ciſſa his ſonne after long ſiege, brake into the Citty of Andeds Ceſter, and ſlew the inhabitants from the greateſt to the ſmalleſt, and ſo began the kingdome of Southſex: hee raigned 36. yeeres.

514. CIſſa his ſonne ſucceeded, he built the Citty of Ciſſaceſter, now called Chicheſter, and named it after his owne name: hee raigned, as it is ſaid, 76. yeeres.

590. ETheluulfus, whom Bede nameth Edelwach, was chriſtened in the Prouince of the Mercies, in the preſence, and at the exhortation of King Wulfhere, who alſo at the Font was his godfather, and in ſigne of that adoption, gaue him two Prouinces, that is to ſay, the Ile of Wight, and the Prouince of Manures, in the Weſt part of England. Bede. First chriſtened King in Southſex.

Wilfride the Biſhop, came to the Prouince of the South Saxons, vnto them did hee miniſter the Word of Faith, by the permiſſion and great reioycing of the King. This Biſhop chriſtened the chiefe Lords and Knights of the Countrey: and the reſt of the people at the ſame time, or ſome after were chriſtened by other Prieſts. The Queene Ebba was chriſtened in her Ile which was in the Prouince of the Uiccians: for ſhee was daughter of Eanfride, who was Eanheres brother, where were both Chriſtian men, and all their people. But all the Prouince of South Saxons had neuer before that time heard of the name of God, nor the faith: yet there was in that country a certaine Monk, a Scot borne, named Dicuil, which had a very little Monaſtery in a place called Boſanham, all compaſſed about with woods and the ſea, and therein liue or ſixe brethren ſeruing God in humble and poore life, but none of the people there did giue themſelues either to follow their life, or heare their preaching: but when Biſhop Wilfride came and preached the Goſpell vnto them, hee deliuered the people not only from the perill of damnation, but alſo from an horrible murrain of temporall death. For in three yeres before, it had not rained in all thoſe quarters, whereby a famine deſtroyed the people by heaps, in ſo much that diuers times 40. or 50. in a company being famiſhed for hunger, would goe together to ſome rocke, or ſea-bank, and caſt themſelues all downe either to be killed with the fall, or drowned in the Sea: but on the ſame day they receiued baptiſme and faith, there fell a plentifull ſhowre of raine, wherewith the earth flouriſhed againe. This Biſhop alſo taught the people there to get their ſuſtenance by fiſhing.

Edilwach gaue vnto Biſhop Wilfride the Land of 87. tenements, where hee might place his company, the name of the place was Seole-ſay. In this place hee founded a Monaſtery, to be his Epiſcopall Sea. Seales the nunnery in Southſex.

CEadwall a valiant young man of the Weſt Saxons, being baniſhed from his Country, came with an hoſt of men, and ſlew King Edilwach, walked that Prouince, cruelly murthered and ſpoyled euery where: Edilwach raigned 25. yeeres. 605.

And ſoone after, Ceadwall was driuen out by two Captaines of the Kings, Bertham and Anthum, which from that time did hold and keepe the Dominion of that Prouince, the chiefe of which two, was afterward ſlaine of the ſame Ceadwall, (being then King of the Weſt Saxons) and the Prouince ſubdued and brought into more grieuous ſubiection then it was before. Againe, Ine, that raigned after Ceadwall, oppreſſed it with like miſery and bondage many yeeres, whereby it came to paſſe, that the people of Suſſex in all this time could haue no Biſhop of their owne: but were faine (their firſt Biſhop Wilfride being called home to Yorke) to be vnder the Dioceſſe of the Geniſes which belonged to the Weſt Saxons, as many as were in the Territory of Seleſey.

After that Ceadwall had thus obtained the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons, hee tooke the Ile of Wight alſo, which was ſo altogether giuen to the worſhipping of Idols, that hee intended vtterly to baniſh and driue out thence all the old native inhabitants, and to put people of his owne Countrey in their places. For, though hee was not yet at that time baptized, and regenerate in Chriſt, yet he bound himſelfe with a vow, that if he tooke the Iland, he would giue vnto God the fourth part thereof, and of all the prey. Which thing hee ſo performed, that Biſhop Wilfride happening to be there at that time, a man of his owne Countrey, he offered and gaue the ſame vnto him, to the vſe and ſeruice of our Lord. The ſaid Iland contained as the Engliſh did rate it, 1200. tenements, whereof was giuen to the Biſhop, the poſſeſſion of the Land of three hundred Tenements, which portion the Biſhop gaue and committed to one of his Clerks, named Bermerni, and appointed thereto a Prieſt, named Hildila, to miniſter the Word and baptiſme of life to all that would be ſaued. Two children of the blood Royall, being brethren to Druadle King of that Iland, being fled into the next Prouince of the Vites, where they had hidden themſelues in a place called Stonecſtat, were betrayed and found out, whom the King commanded to be put to death. Which thing when a certaine Abbot named Cimberth had heard of, whoſe Monaſtery was not farre from thence, at a place called Redfoyd, hee came to the king, and deſired him, that if hee would needes haue the children put to death, yet they mought firſt receiue the Sacraments of Chriſts Church. The King granted his requeſt, and then he take and Catechized them in the faith of Chriſt, and waſhed them with the font of Baptiſme, made them ſure in perfect hope to enter the Kingdome euerlaſting: then were they put to death by the Hangman. When after this order, all the Prouince of great Bryttaine had receiued the Faith of Chriſt, the Ile of Wight receiued the ſame alſo: In which notwithſtanding, becauſe of the miſery and ſtate of forraine ſubiection, no man take the degree of the Miniſtery, and place of a Biſhop, before Daniel, who was Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons, and of the Geniſes, Suſſer and Hampſhire. The Ile of wight. Stonecſtat. Redfoyd. The Ile of wight receiued the faith but not the Biſhop.

The ſituation of this Ile is ouer againſt the mids of the South Saxons and Geniſes, the Sea comming betweene, of the breadth of three miles, which Sea is called Solent: in which two armes of the Ocean Sea, that brake out from the maine North Sea about Bryttaine, doe daily meete, and violently runne together beyond the mouth of the Riuer Homelen, which runneth along by the Country of the Vites that belong to the Prouince of the Geniſes, and ſo entreth into the foreſaid Sea, and after this meeting and ſtriuing together of the two Seas, they goe backe, and flow againe into the Ocean from whence they came.

Now at length (ſaith Bede) it was determined by a decree in a Synode, that the Prouince of South Saxons, which to that day appertained to the Dioceſſe of Wincheſter, where Daniel was Biſhop, ſhould haue a Sea and Biſhop of their owne ſeuerally: whereupon Cadbert, Abbot in the Monaſtery of Biſhop Wilfride, was made, and conſecrated firſt Biſhop of that Dioceſſe. Suſſex and Hampſhire diuided.

After his death, Ceolla take the Biſhoprickе vpon him: after whoſe departure, the Sea ſtood vacant many yeeres.

EAST ANGLES.

EAſt Angles, the third kingdome, contained the Countries of Norfolke and Suffolke, Cambridge, and the Ile of Ely, which had on the Eaſt and North ſides the Sea, on the Weſt, Saint Edmonds Dike, with a part of Hertfordſhire, and on the Southſide Eſſex: it containeth the Dioceſſe of Norwich and Ely.

492. VFfa the eighth from Woden, firſt King of the Eaſt Angles, raigned 7. yeere.

499. CTitulus raigned 20. yeeres.

519. W. Malmeſ. REdwaldus the tenth from Woden, as men writte: this is he, that for the fauour of Edwine, killed Edelfride king of Northumberland. The ſame Redwald was by the perſwaſion of Edwine baptized, but in vaine: for after by his wiues counſell, hee fell from the Faith againe: his ſonne Dorwaldus in pure and vncorrupted Chriſtianity, was ſlaine by the Pica, then Rochbert: Redwaldus raigned 25. yeres.

554. GErpenwald, ſonne to Redwaldus, ſucceeded in the kingdome of the Eaſt Angles, raigned 12. yeres.

569 SEebert, brother to king Gerpewald, taken vpon him the kingdome, a man in all points learned, and moſt Chriſtian, who whileſt his brother was yet liuing, being himſelfe baniſhed into France, was baptized and inſtructed in the Faith, of which Faith he laboured to make all the Realme partakers, as ſome as he came to the Crowne. To whoſe good endeuour, Biſhop Felix did greatly apply himſelfe. Who, when he came from Burgundy (where he was borne) into Bryttaine to Honorius the Archbiſhop, and had obtained licence of him to preach the Word of God vnto the foreſaid Eaſt Angles, his zeale and vertuous deſire proſpered not in vaine, for he found in that Nation plenteouſneſſe of fruit, and increaſe of people that beleeued him. For, hee brought all this Prouince vnto the Faith, and workes of iuſtice, and in the end, to reward of perpetuall bleſſedneſſe, according to the abodement of his name, which in Latine is called Felix, and in our Engliſh tongue, Happy: he was made Biſhop of Dunnocke, or Dunwich, an ancient Citty in Suffolk, now ſore decayed, and as is ſuppoſed, more then halfe ſwallowed vp in the Sea. East Angles receiued the Faith. Felix Biſhop of Dunwich.

The common fame and report of the inhabitants is, that before the Towne came to decay, there belonged thereunto two and fifty Diuine houſes, as Parith Churches, Priories, Hoſpitals, and Chappels, as many Windmils, and as many toppe Shippes. But certaine it is, as appeareth by manifeſt and found record, Liber Domeſd. Records Dom.

which I haue saine, that euen of late time, there was within the said Towne fiue Parish Churches, two houses of Friers, an house which had beene of Templers, two Hospitals, and three Chappels, foure of these Parish Churches are now of late swallowed vp in the Sea, and but two of them remaining on the Land, to wit, S. Peters, and all Saints. The men of Dunwich desiring succour for their Towne against the rage of the Sea, affirme that a great piece of a Forrest, sometimes thereby, is deuoured and turned to the vse of the Sea.

There hath beene a Mint, many men of that Towne can yet shew of the coynes, which are sterling pence, with this inscription, Ciuitas Dunwich, 20. of which pence weighed an ounce, 12. ounces apoinct Troy, and so being 20 s. in money, was both a pound in payment, and also a pound in waight, as is aforesaid. This Citty was gouerned by a Maior and three Bailifes, besides inferior officers: Felix their first Bishop sate 18. yeres, and ended his life there An. 649.

Sebam, now called Somerfoure miles from Ely.

and was buried at Sebam, a place where sometimes a great famous Monastery stood replenished with religious persons, vnder their Abbot, Warsred, which house was founded by a Noble man, named Luringus, and was wholy subuerted by the Danes: the body of Felix was remoued to Ramsey. Bishop Felix founded a Church at Radham.

Radham, which was also amongst other destroied by the Danes. Felix also founded Schooles at Felixstowe, now called Filchestow. After Felix, succeded Thomas, a Deacon, borne in Gerwy, he sate 5. yeres. After him Berergilius, surnamed Bonifacius, a Kentish man borne, sate seuentene yeres. After him succeded Bisi, who diuided the Sea into two Bishoppicks, to wit, Dunwich, and Helmham. Thus much for Dunwich.

Felixstow.

Sebert the King, being desirous to follow the godly order which he had seene in France, set vp Scholes in this kingdome (by the ayd of Felix, whom hee had taken out of Kent for that purpose) appointing Maisters and Teachers to bring vp children in learning and vertue, after the manner of the Kentish men. This Sebert was so inflamed with the loue of Heauen, that leauing at the last all affaires of his Realme to the gouernment of his cousin Egrike, he became a Monk, and entred a Monastery by him builded, wherein he bestowed his time in diuine studies, and contemplation: but the vplandish English-men with their old Captain Penda, inuaded his dominions, so that his people after long resistance, finding themselues too weak, they pluckt Sebert out of the Monastery, and brought him against his will vnto the field, where, of the cruel heathen people he was kill'd, with king Egrike, and the whole army discomfited, about the yere of CHRIST 652.

At this time the Christian faith was in most places gloriously increased, and peacefully established, so as the Gospell sweetely flourished, which blessednesse, Satan enuied, as hee did mans estate in Paradise, and now infected the minds of diuers, to plant a new Religion, the chiefe whereof, was MAHOMET, whose dauelish doctrine hath done extreme damage to the christians, particularly and generally.

The life and Doctrine of the false prophet Mahomet.

MAHOMET, of the stocke of Ismael, an Orphant of poore parentage, of an excellent wit & great strength, borne in Arabia, in his youth taken and sold to a rich Marchât, who employed him in all his affairs, his Master died, then he married Cadiga his Mistris, of 50. yeres of age, by whom hee had much wealth, the which in few yeres he encreased mightily, as well in Treasure, Camels, Munition, as other commodities: he gaue great entertainment in his house, and was liberall vnto the poore, hee was very skilfull in Magicke, and had learned many deceits of the Egyptians: for the which he was held in admiration of the rude ignorant Sarazens, and distracted Arabians: And albeit he was of very small reading by reason of his education as otherwise, yet hee diligently hearkened vnto such as were learned, especially if they were any way malecontented, either with any established Religion, State, or Gouernment, among which number, hee enclined earnestly vnto the censured Heretike Sergius, a Monke of Constantinople, which should haue beene punished for maintaining the Nestorian heresie. This subtle Mahomet attributed great diuinity to himselfe: and hauing the falling sickenesse, he denied it, saying, hee was onely in a trance, being rauished with the vision of the Angell Gabriel, who deliuered him secret instructions and new commandements from God. Hee taught a white Doue to pecke foode out of his eares, which hee made the people beleeue, was the holy Ghost that came to inspire him: by meanes whereof, and other his illusions which his cunning confederates vsed in his behalfe, he strongly possest the multitude with a most holy and reuerent opinion of him, and perswaded them also that hee was the Great Prophet of the Ismaelites, or as they call themselues, Sarazens, because they would be thought to be descended of Sara the wife of Abraham:

And then by the helpe of Sergius and the rest, in contempt of the old and new Testament, he made his Antichristian Alcharon, wherein he forbade the beliefe and vse of holy Scriptures,

commanding them to continue Circumcision, and vtterly to abolish baptisme, saying, that to them belonged the diuine promise (in contempt of Iewes and Christians) he commanded euery Friday for euer to be held his holy Sabbath, he commanded them not to eate Swines flesh, nor drinke Wine by day, he allowed euery man to haue many wiues, and constituted a voluptuous Paradise, like to the Manichees, he absolutely denied the Trinity, and the diuine Doctrine of our Sauiour Christ and his Apostles, except onely such sentences of the Text, as hee wrested to serue his satanicall purpose, saying, Christ was a holy Prophet, and his forerunner, and had foretold much of him and of his coming. He taught that the holy Ghost was a creature, like as did the Nicolaitans, with many other abominations and blasphemies not fit to be spoken by a Christian: all which at this time he beganne publikely to preach, this yere 620. being the 12th yere of Hyraclius the Emperour. And by degrees it was so followed and beleeued, that hee grew mighty in fauour with all sorts of people, chiefely with the Sarazens. Then he entred into Armes, and with a great hoste wasted Assyria, tooke Damasco, and ouerthrew the Persians: he enueigled to his seruice, the warlike Scenits, who reuolted from Hyraclius for want of pay, and hauing subdued many Nations, caused himselfe to be crowned king of Persia, then hee proclaimed himselfe a great Prophet, and by force established his blasphemous Alcharan, consisting of the dregs of all religions then in vse. Which diuelish and Antichristian doctrine, through the negligence and ciuill dissention of the Christian Princes, hath ouerspred all Asia, Africa, and the best part of Europe, and in many places of India: he dyed in the yere 632. being poysoned by his Allies, vpon hope to succeede him in his gouernment: some write at 60. yeeres of age, and some write at 40. yeeres, being dead, he was put into an yron Chest, and placed it vpon lofty Tresels, in the City of Mecca in Persia, vnto whom, and other his Saints, they make their daily prayers, and the Turkes goe thither in pilgrimage from all places: Read Egnatius 2. booke, Blondus 9. booke, Charles Fontaigne his 2. booke of Pedals, and Polidor Virgil 7. booke.

But they will be extreme drunke in the night.

637. ANna, the sonne of Ewide, brother to Edwald, succeded Egricus, and was likewise slaine by the fury of Penda, Captaine of Marches, or vplandish Englishmen, then heathen and vnchristned people, vnder whom he had raigned nineteene yeeres, and was buried at Blidzburgh, in which place also was buried his son Firminus, but was after translated to S. Edmundsburie. He had issue by his wife Hereswida, daughter to Herericus, the Nephew of Ardwine, King of Northumbers, sister to Hilda, Etheldred, Ethelburga, and Saxburg. Etheldred, daughter to Anna, founded the Church of Saint Peter in the Ile of Ely, in the yeere of Christ 674. placing there an hundred persons of both seres, vnder monasticall habite, and the her selfe became their first Abbatesse. This Countrey of Ely is a Prouince of the East English, and containeth about two hundred housholds, and is compassed on each side, as an Iland, round about with fennes or waters: and for that many Eeles are taken there, some suppose the Ile to be called Ely: but other thinke the same to take name of Willowes, wherof the Ile aboundeth. The ground heere is very plentifull of all kinde of fruites, full of pleasant woods and vines, replenished with many kinds of wilde beasts, fowles and fishes, &c.

Athelhere, brother to Anna, succeded, and both hee and Penda were slaine by Oswinus, King of the Northumbers, and that deseruedly, because hee had ayded Penda against his owne brother, and his kinsman.

Adelwaldus, his brother, succeeded him with like fortune, and left the kingdome to Aldulfus, Elohwoldus and Hisberna, sonnes of the same Athelhere.

Ethelbert succeeded him: he had by his wife Laondrine, a sonne named Ethelbert.

ETHelbertus his sonne succeeded in the kingdome of the East Angles. This man in his youth much profited in learning, not giuen to voluptuous pleasures, but to prayers, almes, and other good workes: hee was praised in counsell, mercifull in iudgement, and sober in speech: he was at length perswaded so marry, for the encrease of children, whereunto hee assented. At length, Offa, King of the Pecties, vsing deceit, when strength failed, for this king Ethelbert promised him many great things, but when hee had got him into his Palace, which was at Sutton Wallis, three miles from Heuefoyth, Northward vpon Lugge in Herefordshire, by the counsell of the said Offaes wife, for ambition of his kingdome, caused his head to be stricken off, by one Grimbert a familiar to king Offa, on the eighteenth day of May: his body was buried on the banke of the River Lugge, where now standeth the Parish Church of Maurdine. And so Offa vniustly inuaded and obtained the kingdome of the East Angles: but when a Virgin named Alfride, daughter to Offa, whom Ethelbert should haue married, vnderstood thereof, shee willed his seruants to hasten them into their Countrey, for their Master was beheaded. And being taught by the Holy Ghost, prophesied to her mother in this manner, quoth shee, Thy sonne shall not liue three yeeres, and the kingdome shall be vnstable, and thou thy selfe shalt not liue in the confession of God ouer three moneths, but shalt be possessed with a wicked spirit, and shalt eate thine owne tongue, and dye an euill death: And it followed, (saith mine Author) as the Virgin had spoken: which Virgin vowed to liue a religious life, and became an Ancresse at Crowland.

Sutton Wallis.

Maurdine.

When King Offa heard hereof, he repented him, and caused the body of Ethelbert to be remooued to Hereford, three miles from Kenchester, and foure miles from Sutton Wallis, where afterward ouer him was builded a goodly Church by king Milfride, which Church hee endowed with great possessions, and made the same a Bishops See: since which time that Church is dedicated to the said Ethelbert.

At Sutton Wallis there appeareth yet notable ruines of some ancient and great building, and therefore great likelihood that it was sometime the mansion house of king Offa, at such time as Brencheſter stood, or else Hereford was a beginning. Maurdine village is about a mile from Sutton Wallis, and hard by is a hill, wherein men say, Saint Ethelbert was beheaded. At this Village is now a fayre Church dedicated to Ethelbert. I thinke he was slaine at Sutton in king Offaes house, but the name of Maurdine seemeth to expresse the martyrs hill.

Brencheſter. Brencheſter, three miles from Hemefozth Westward, a mile from the banke of Wy River, there was a Palace of Offaes (as some say) the ruines yet remaine: there haue beene found ditches and tombes. This Towne is farre more ancient then Hereford, it standeth on the same side of the River Wy, and 3. miles or more above Hereford, and was in the Romanes time, as appeareth by many things, especially by antike money of the Cæsars very often found within the Towne, and in plowing thereabout, the which, the people there calleth diwarfe money. The compasse of Brencheſter hath beene by estimation as much as Hereford, excepting the Castle, the which at Hereford is very spacious: pieces of the walls and Towzes yet appeare from the foundation: the people of Hereford haue fetcht much away from thence to build withall. The place where the Towne was, is all overgrowne with brambles, hazels, and like shrubs: there haue beene found in our time Paytaine bricks, conduites for water, stoned pauements, pieces of gold, and other strange things. To be short, of the decay of Brencheſter, Hereford rose and flourished.

Hereford. The towne of Hereford is large and strongly walled. Also hauing a maine Castle hard by the ripe of Wy, the Castle is thought nigh as great of circuit, as Windsore. The Dungeon of the Castle is high, and strong, and in the Dike not farre from it, is a faire spring called Saint Ethelberts Will. Within the Castle in digging haue beene found the bones of men of great bignesse, and hard by in the ripe of the banke also are found the like bones: the wall of the Towne is compassed with a Dike, allway filled with moorish water descending into it: this water resorteth to the bottome of Wy. There bee in the Towne foure Parish Churches, one being the Cathedrall Church, of a very strong building. Saint Ethelbert was buried there: but since the Welshmen destroyed the Towne in king Edward the Confessours time, his Reliques haue not beene seene there. There be in the suburbs two Parish Churches, there hath beene a cell of blacke monkes, and two houses of Fryers, blacke and gray. Some say, that this Towne tooke the name of an old foord or passage ouer Wy, not farre from the Castle: some say it was called Fernelege, or Fernehill: and the place where the Cathedrall Church now is, was a Chappell of our Lady called Fernelege. Thus much for Hereford.

After Ethelbert, few men of might raigned in East England, by means of the violence done by the Mercians, vntill Edmond, borne in Saxony, in the City of Magdenberge, sonne to King Alkemond and Queene Siware. In which time raigned in East Angle a king named Offa, who minding a voyage to the Holy Land, take his iourney thozow Saxony, there to visit his cousin Alkemond, and Nephew Edmond, which Edmond hee adopted to be his heyre of East Angles. Now so it happened, that the said Offa, hauing accomplished his voyage at the holy Sepulture, and returning, deceased at Post Saint George, hauing before sent his King to Edmond, making him governour of the East Angles, his father Alkemond prouided him of men famous by experience, both in armes and gentlenesse: hee had also clerks circumspect and wise, to counsell him, he stuffed his ships with men and victuall: which thing done, and leaue taken of his father and mother, he sailed and landed in East England, at a place called Gaudenbour, where falling on his knees, hee made deuoute prayer vnto God, that his comming thither might be to him acceptable, and to all the countrey profitable. And not farre from thence hee builded a royall Tower, which to this day is called Yunkfantsone, which betokeneth liwetnesse and great might: there he held his houshold nigh one yeere, and then remooued to Athelzhough, where hee remained one whole yeere, and learned his Psalter in the Saxon tongue, which booke was referued in the Reuestry of the Monastery of Saint Edmundsbury, till the same Church was suppressed in the raigne of King Henry the eighth, as I haue beene credibly informed.

Edmond raigned 15. yeeres, in whose time Hinguar and Hubba, Danish kings, entring the Prouince of the Northumbers, raged ouer all the same, and made great spoyles. Hinguar hauing gotten a great prey, left Hubba, and with his Nauy sayled into the East Angle, and arriued at a certaine Citty thereof vnawares to the Citizens, set it on fire, and slew both man, woman and childe. This wicked Hinguar tooke Edmond, king of that Prouince, in a Village then called Hegleſdune, where to a tood bearing the same name, where this holy Edmond being constant in the Christian faith, was first by the Pagans beaten with bats, then scourged with whips, he still calling on the name of Iesus: his aduersaries in a rage shot him full of shafts, and then smote off his head and threw it in a bush: after which time the Angles ceased to raigne in the East Angle, but the same was possessed by Danes, till fifty yeeres after, that Edward, the sonne of Etheldred, did expulse the Danes, and ioyned that Prouince, and also the East Saxons, to his kingdoms of the West Saxons.

EAST

EAST SAXONS.

ESSex, the fourth kingdome, containes Essex, Middlesex, and Hertfordshire, being bounded on the East with the Germane Ocean, on the South with the River Thames, on the West, with Colme, and on the North with Stowze, which at this day, parteth Suffolke from Essex: it containeth the Diocelle of London.

527. ERchenwine, the eighth from Woden, from whom all the Saxons deriued their Geneologies, first erected this Country to be a kingdome, which neuertheleſſe he held as feodary to the kings of Kent, who were as yet the beyr soueraignes of the whole Country from Thames to Humber. And as we haue specified, Vortiger yelded vnto Hengist for his deliuery, when the Peerss of the Paytains were slaine on Salisbury-plaine, and he taken prisoner.

Bede. 587. SLedda, the sonne of Erchenwine, succeeded his father in the gouernment, and to establish the state more sure, married Ricula, the daughter of Ermenrich, king of Kent, and enioyed his gouernment so quietly, that hee minisired small matter to Hiſtoziographers.

603. SEbert, the sonne of Sledda by Ricula, ruled this kingdome after his father. The second peare of his raigne, which was the peere of Christ 604. Augustine, Archbishop of Canterbury, consecrated two Bishops, the one named Miletus, the other Iustus: Miletus he appointed to preach to the people of the East Saxons, which are separate from Kent, with the River of Thames, and are fast ioyned to the East Sea, whose chiefe City is London, a princely port Towne of many people, arriuing thither by sea and Land. Now as sone as this Prouince by meanes of Miletus, had received the word of truth, Ethelbert, king of Kent, builded in the City of London S. Pauls Church, wherein Miletus and his successors were appointed euer after to haue their Sea. Iustus was ordained Bishop of Rochester in Kent, where king Ethelbert builded the Church of S. Andrew the Apostle, and gaue many goodly gifts to the Bishops of both Churches. Which Ethelbert in his Charter to the Church of S. Paul hath these words: Aedilbertus Rex, Deo inspirante, pro animæ suæ remedio dedit Episcopo Mileto terram quæ appellatur Tilingham, ad monasterium sue solatium, scilicet, S. Pauli. Et ego Rex Ethelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi, vt in perpetuum monasterij visitator sys manear, &c.

Afterward king Vvilliam the first, surnamed Conqueroz, by his Charter, confirming the Lands giuen by the said Ethelbert king of Kent, to the said Church of S. Paul in London, hath these words: Vvilhelmus, Rex Anglorum, omnibus fidelibus suis Francis & Anglis de Middlesex salutem. Sciatis quod concedo Deo & sancto Paulo suisque seruitoribus 24. hidas quas Ethelbertus dedit Ecclesiæ sancti Pauli, intra Ciuitatem London, quando eam fundauit, in perpetuum liberas esse, & solutas, & quietas, de Dane-gelt, & omnibus aliis gildis, & ab omni expeditione, & ab omni opere, & volo, & firmiter præcipio, vt bene, & honorifice, & in pace teneant, & ne aliquis super hoc eis iniuriam vel contumeliam faci it. Teste Lanfranco Archiepisco, &c. Moreouer, beside this confirmation aboue said, the same king Vvilliam gaue vnto the Church of S. Paul in London, and vnto Maurice then Bishop thereof, the Castle of Stratford, or Stoureford in Essex, and all things which belonged thereunto, and namely the Land which Vvilliam the Deacon, and Ralph his brother held of the king. Thus much for the foundation of Saint Pauls Church in London, founded by Ethelbert, king of Kent, and confirmed by king William the Conqueroz.

Stoureford in Essex.

King Sebert, by the perswasion of king Ethelbert his Uncle, and through the preaching of Miletus, hauing embraced Christianity, was baptized by the same Miletus, and immediately, to shew himselfe a Christian, built a Church to the honour of Saint Peter, on the West side of London in a place, which because it was ouergrowne with thornes, and inuironed with Waters, the Saxons at that time, called it Thorney, and now of the Monastery, and West situation thereof, is called Westminster. In this place long before was a Temple of Apollo (as Sulcardus writeth) which being ouerthrowne with an earth-quake, Lucius then built thereon a Church for the Christians. Sebert (when he had raigned 13. yeeres) died, and was buried in the Church which hee had built, with his wife Aethelgoda, whose bodies many yeeres after, to wit, in the time of Richard the second (saith Thomas Walsingham) were translated from the old church, to the new at Westminster, and there enterred.

616. SErred, Steward and Sigbert, sonnes of Sebert, iointly (as it seemeth) then ruled Essex, men wickedly giuen, irreligious, and deadly enemies to the Christian profession: who presumed contemptuously to the Table of the Lords supper, being not baptized: and because Miletus would not permit them to be partakers of the Christian sacrament, they expelled him from his See at London, but shortly after, Serred encountring with the West Saxons, was slaine with both his brethren by king Kinegles.

Sigebert, surnamed the Little Sonne of Seward, succeeded in this kingdome, and left the same to Sigebert his kinsman.

Sigebert, sonne to Sigebalde brother to Sebert, then ruled in Essex, he by the perswasion of Oswy king of the Northumbers, abandoned all superstition, and became a Christian, and tooke an holy man Ced with him, who did mightily beate downe errours, and wan many by preaching the Christian Religion in his Dominions, whereupon Ced was by Finan consecrated Bishop of the East Saxons, and then proceeded with more authority in his function, ordering Priests and Deacons in all places of Esser, but especially at Ythancester, and Tilbery.

Bede. Bede. Bede.

This City of Ithancester stood on the banke of the river Pante, that runneth by Maldune in the hundred of Dancy, but now that Citty is drowned in Pante, so that nothing remaineth but the Ruines of the Citty in the said River. Tilbery standeth on the Thames side.

In the good proceedings of Sigeberr, he was slaine by a kinsman for his owne, vpon none other occasion, but for that he vsed too much clemency towards his enemies, as the murtherers themselues confessed.

Swidhelin, sonne of Sexbald, succeeded then in his regiment, who was baptized by Ced, in a Town of the kings, called Rendlesham in East England: Edelwald, king of the East Angles, brother to Anna, was his Godfather at the Font.

Sigher then ruled with Sebba, or Sebbi, although they were also vnder the allegeance of Wulfhere, King of the middle Englishmen. This Prouince being visited with a great plague and mortality. Sigher with the people ouer whom he ruled, forsaking Christs Religion, fell to Apostasie, for both the king himselfe, and many of his people, as well of the Nobles, as of the meaner sort, began to renue their Temple, which had stood desolate, they worshipped their Idols, as though they could by that means haue escaped the mortality. But Sebbi, his companion with all vnder him, perseuered deuout in the Faith, and he ended his life in great felicity, as we shall hereafter declare. Wulfhere hearing, vnderstanding part of his dominions to fall from the Faith, for to call them backe again, sent vnto them Iarumanus the Bishop of Richfield, successor to Trunihere, who by much labor and diligence, being a man of great vertue, painfull and zealous (as a certaine Priest waiting then vpon him, and helping him in preaching the Gospel, reported vnto Bede) brought them to the Faith againe, both the king and all his people, so that abandoning, and throwing downe their Temples and Altars, they opened againe Churches, confessed gladly the name of Christ, and chose rather in hope of resurrection to dy, then in the filth of Idolatry to line. Which being so brought to passe, their Priests and Instructers returned home with much ioy and comfort.

Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, appointed Erkenwald to be Bishop of the East Saxons in the City of London. This Erkenwald, in the yere of Christ, 677. before hee was made Bishop, had builded 2. goodly Monasteries, one for himselfe at Crotley, in the Ile of Crots in Surry, by the River of Thames: and another for his sister Edilburge, in a place called Berching in Saxlser, for his sister Edelburge (she was first Abbas there. Sebbi, king of the East Saxons (as is aforesaid) a man very deuout and godly, being giuen to often prayer, and charitable almes giuing, eſtoomed the celebrary and monasticall life, before all the riches and honours of a kingdome, which kinde of life hee had a long time before taken, and had giuen by his kingdome, had not his wife refused to be separated from him. And therefore some men thought (as it had beene often said) that a man of such a nature and well-disposed minde, was more mete to be made a Bishop then a King. Now when this Souldiour of the Ecclesiasticall kingdome had passed 30. yeeres in his temporall raigne, at length he died: but first he admonished his wife, that then at the least they should giue themselues both together to serue God, whereas they could no longer now inioy or serue the World together. Which thing, when he had with much adoe obtained of her, he came to the Bishop of London, named Waldhere, who had succeeded Erkenwald, and at his hands receiued the habite of Religion, which he had long desired, to wit, of a Monke, for at that time were Monks in the Church of S. Paul in London, as writeth Radulphus, Dedicero and other.

To this Bishop hee brought a great summe of money to be bestowed and giuen to the poore, reserning nothing at all for himselfe, but rather desiring to remaine poore in spirit for the kingdome of Heauen. And when hee perceiued the day of his death to be at hand, because his foresaid sickenes grew still vpon him, for the princely and hautie courage that hee had, hee began to feare, lest at his death, through bitter paine hee might lap, either to bitter with his mouth, or with his body doe any thing that were not decent for his person: hee sent for the Bishop of London, where hee also then continued, and desired him, that at his departing out of this world, there should be no more present but himselfe, and two of his Chaplaines: which thing when the Bishop had promised gladly to doe, the third day after hee gaue vp the Ghost, and was buryed in a coffin of stone, and layde in the Church of the blessed Apostle Saint Paul, by whose good Lessons hee had beene taught to labour, and long for the ioyes of Heauen.

Sigher King Sebbi Monke in Pauls Church Radul. Dedicero.

King Sebbi buried in Pauls Church of London.

Sigheard, sonne of Sebbi, then raigned ouer the East Saxons for a time, and after him his brother Seofride.

Seofride, sonne to Sebbi, and brother to Sigeherd, raigned next successiuely, of whom I finde nothing recorded of his acts.

Offa, the sonne of Siger, then ruled this Prouince, hee enlarged with building, and enriched with Lands the Church of Westminster, and then forsaking his wife Genefwede, Pendacs daughter, Lamos, Kin, and Countrey, he went to Rome with Kenred king of Mercia, and Edwine Bishop of Worcester, and there in a Monkes coule ended this life, leauing Selred to rule his Countrey.

Sthred after Selred was slaine, raigned in Esser: but Egbert king of the West Saxons the very yeere that he conquered Kent, subdued also this Suthred, and annexed Esser to his kingdome: yet London with the countrey confining about it, came not in subiection to the West Saxons, but obeyd the king of Mercia, as long as that kingdome continued. 748.

Sigehrike

Sigehrike and Sigehard afterward aspired to the kingdome of the East Saxons, but with no good successe: and so that kingdome ceased.

Wonderfull great frost and snow and terrour.

This yeere 764. was a most extreme cold Winter: for a hard frost beganne the first of October, and so continued vntill February: and diuers Chronicles write, the frost was so extreme violent within forty degrees of the Equinoctiall, that the maine Sea was frozen in very many places, and the Ice remained like Rockes, as it doth toward the North pole, and other cold Regions: also the Snow couered the Ice in many places aboue twenty foote thicke: and this yere also the Starres seemed as if they would fall from Heauen, as saith Sigebert, and the people feared that the generall day of Iudgement was come, and the first day of June, there was a great Eclipse of the Sunne, which continued six houres, and in the yeere 787. it rained blood. Blood rained.

MERCIANS.

MErcia the fifth kingdome and greatest of the other, contained Glocester, Hereford, Chester, Stafford, Worcester, Orford, Warwith, Darby, Leicester, Buckingham, Northāpton, Nottingham, Lincolne, Bedford, Huntington, and part of Hartfordshire. It had on the West side, the river Dee, fast by Chester, & Severn, fall by Shrewsbery vnto Bristow in the East, the East sea, in the South, Thames vnto London, in the North the River Humber, and so Westward, downe to the River Perce, vnto the corner of Wrysball.

This kingdome of Perce in the beginning was parted into three parts, into West Percia, middle Percia and East Percia: it containeth the Diocesses of Lincolne, Worcester, Hereford, Coventrey and Lichfield.

585. CReda (the eleuenth from Woden) first king of the Percies, raigned 10. yeeres.

596. Wibba his sonne, raigned 20. yeeres.

616. Ceorlus his sonne, raigned 10. yeres.

626. PEnda the sonne of Wibba, a man active in warres, a frantike and most wicked man, tooke on him the kingdome of the Percies, when he was 50. yeres old: he tooke the Cities, and disturbed the borders of the kings, that were his owne Countreymen borne: he slew Edwine and Oswald, kings of Northumberland: (where Oswald was slaine, is now situated the Towne of Oswaistre, which of him tooke that name) hee also slew Sigebert, Egfride, and Anna, kings of the East Angles, which all were of holy life and conuersation: hee banished Kenwallus king of the West Saxons, but in the end, himselfe was slaine by Oswin which succeeded Oswald his brother, when he had raigned 30. yeres. W. Malmes.

PEda the sonne of Penda, succeeded in part of the kingdome which was call'd middle England, who comming after to Oswine king of Northumberland, required his daughter Alfleda to wife, which suite he obtained, vpon condition he would receiue the Christian Faith, and be baptized: and so hee received Baptisme at the hands of Bishop Finan, in a famous Towne of the kings, called Admurum, by the Picts wall, 12 miles from the East sea, from whence he returned home with 4. Priests, notable for learning and vertue, which should instruct & baptize his people. These preached the Word of God, and were gladly heard, whereby many daily, as well Noble, as of the base sort, renounced their filthy Idolatry, & were baptized: neither B. Penda, father to the young Prince, did with stand the preaching of the Gospel in his dominis, but persecuted such as hare the names of Christians, and liued not accordingly, saying that such men were wretched, which regarded not to serue the God in whom they professed to beleeue. These things began thus 2. yeres before the death of Penda. Admurum, Berwith. Ingulphus

A notable saying of a heathen Prince.

In these daies, king Oswine, after often and cruell inuasions of the heathen Tyrant Penda, forced of necessity, offered many and most precious Iewels, with an infinit summe of treasure, to redeeme quiet and peace to his Countrey, but the barbarous Tyrant, pursuing his deadly enterprise, and protesting vtterly to extinguish the whole Nation from the highest to the lowest, king Oswine called to God for help against his enemies, vowing, that if he had the vpper hand, his young daughter should bee consecrated to God in perpetuall virginity, and 12. farme places with the Land, should be conuerted to the erecting of Monasteries. Then preparing himselfe to battell, with a very small army, the army of the Heathen reported to be 30. fold as many, he ouercame them: and this is to be noted as a great helpe to the Christians, that whereas the field was fought nigh to the River Iuenet, the said River did at that time to ouerflow the banks and fields about, that in the flight of the heathen, more were drowned then perished by the sword. And thus was King Pendaes power ouercome, and himselfe slaine, when he had raigned 11 raged cruelly 30. yeres. This Penda (saith Ingulphus) had sonnes that were most deuout maintainers of Christian religion, to wit, Peda, Vifere, Ethelred, Marwald and Mercelini, and daughters, Kinitburga and Kenefwith, both for holy conuersation excelling. The foresaid battell was fought by king Oswin, in the Countrey of Leid, the 13th yeere of his raigne, the yeere of Christ 659. the 15. day of Nouember. Oswine hauing obtained this victory, rendred due thanks therefore to God, gaue his daughter Elfleda to be brought vp and consecrated to perpetuall virginity, and also the 12. possessions promised, by performed. The Lady Elfleda entred the Monastery of Harts-eye, to be brought vp vnder Hilda the Abbesse, and afterward builded for her selfe a Monastery in a place called Strenshalt, 30. miles from Yorke, and was there buried. Ingulphus Strenshalt founded.

OSwine now raigning ouer the Percies and ouer the South people of England, subdued also the Picts, for the most part, to his allegiance: he founded Lichfield, and preferred it to be a Cathedrall Church of that Prouince: Dwina was first Bishop of Percia, & also Alchefields founded, and made a Bishops See.

of Lichfeilde, for there were then so few Priests, that one Priest was compelled to governe two Parishes. This Duma was a Scottishman, and governed the Church of Lichfield two yeeres, and died at Foxping. The second Bishop was Ceidach, a Scot, who ere long left his Bishoprick, and went to Lindesfearne. The third was Thumbere an Englishman, who was also Abbot of Ingetling, a Monastery builded where the King Offwine was slaine. The fourth was Jarman. The fifth was Cedda, who was buried at Lichfield, though he had founded an Abbey at Lindsey, in a place called Stheare. The first was Winfrothus. The seventh Sexulfus, a great builder of Peterborow Abbey: after whose decease, two Bishops ruled the Province or kingdome of Mercia, to wit, Winifred at Chester, and Heda at Lichfield, after, Winefred was reiected, and Heda sate alone, and died in the yeere of Christ, &c. Now concerning the name of Lichfield, John Rowse saith there was in Britaine a great number of Christians, which hearkened to the preaching of Amphibale (instructer of Alban) martyred and slaine in a place at Lichfield, called Cadauerum campus, a place of dead bodies, &c. This Colwne for the most part, standeth upon a low and equall ground, onely the close and the Cathedral church, with a long street that lyeth North on the Bridge of the Towne, is somewhat upon a high ground: there is no token that ever the Towne was walled: a ditch was made in a part of the Towne by Langton, Bishop of Lichfield. There hath beene a Castle of ancient time, but no part of it standeth: the place of the ditch is seene, and it is yet called Castle-field. In the maine Towne, which is a faire large thing, be three Parish Churches, S. Maries, a right beautifull piece of worke, in the very market steade, where was a Guild or Brotherhood begunne about King Edward the thirds time, and since much encreased by one Heywood, Deane of Lichfield: Saint Nicholas in the South East end of the Towne: Stowe Church in the East end of the Towne, whereas is Saint Coddes Well, a thing of pure water, where is seene a Stone in the bottome, on the which (some say) that Cedde was wont to kneele and pray. At this Stone, Cedde had his Oratory in the time of Vlfere, King of the Mercians: at which time, all the Countrey about Lichfield was a Wooreff, and wilderneffe. There was an house of Saint John in the very South end of the Towne, wherein was a Master and Fellowes. Smith, Bishop of Couentry and Lichfield, in King Henry the seuenths dayes, and afterwards Bishop of Lincolne, began a new foundation at this place, setting vp a Master, two Priests, and tenne poore men in an Hospitall. Besset there alfo a Schoolemaister, and an Vsher to teach a Grammar schoole. King Henry the seuenth gaue vnto it an old Hospital, called Denball. An Vrychall in Cheshire, with the Lands and the impropriation of Burton Church in Wirehall: there was an house of gray Fryers in the North West part of the Towne, Alexander Bishop of Lichfield was the founder of it: There commeth a conduite of water out of an hill to the Towne, and hath two castelets, one in the East wall of the Fryers close, and the other about the Market place, besides water to serue the close and the Prebends houses. There was a faire old Crosse, enuironed with steps in the Market-place: Denton, Deane of Lichfield compassed this Crosse with eight faire Arches of stone, making a round vault ouer them for market folkes to stand dry in: it did cost him an hundred and threescore pounds. The North part of Lichfield is diuided from the South part with three Ponds or Lakes, whereof both the two first lying by West, are nothing so great as the third, that lyeth by East: there be diuers Springs in these pooles, but the principall Spring is a brooke that entereth into them, and feedeth them, comming from Dwe, about a mile and halfe by west from Lichfield: the first westward poole is diuided from the second poole by a great maine causway walled on each side with stone, and in this causeway, be Arches of stone for the water to issue into the second pole: and this causeway serueth to come out of the South part of the Towne into the North. This causway was last made by Langton, Bishop of Lichfield. There is also a stone causeway, and an issue for the water betwixt the second poole, and the third, leading out of the Towne hard to the South gate of the close of the Cathedrall Church, and on the East side of it, is a fayre Pill: this causeway is little more then a quarter so long as the first. The third pole that lyeth by west, is a very faire thing, and plentifull of fish, and goeth in length about halfe a mile, or euer the whole water be drawn into a narrow bottome, that three miles lower goeth into Trent by the right ripe.

The Cathedrall Church of Lichfield being first erected by King Offwine, was of later times renouated and dedicated to Saint Mary and S. Cedde. The whole close of the Cathedrall church was newly ditched and walled by Bishop Langton, and he made one gate of a maiestly and great strength at the West part of the close, another but a lesse gate, at the southeast part of the close: hee made also the Bishops Palace, at the East end of the close: he made Cokelehal castle, Shobrow Manor place, and the Palace by Stond at London, besides many other great acts: hee was treasurer to K. Edward the first. The Prebendaries in the close be very faire builded. The Choristers haue a goodly house lately builded by Bishop Blithe. Farewel a small priory of Nuns suppressed by Thomas Wolsey Archbishop of Yorke, and giuen to Lichfield, in recompence of a pension that should haue beene giuen out of his college in Oxford, was impropriate to the Choristers of Lichfield. The Liuary, at the North west part of the cathedral church was erected by Tho. Heywood, Deane of Lichfield. The glory of the church is the work of the west end, that is exceeding coftly and faire. There be three pyramides or steeples of stone, two at the west end, and one in the midst of the Church. That part of the Towne that lyeth by North the great cause-cause-way or bridge, is but one faire streete in length. And this much for the City of Lichfield: all which spaze of the Monastery there. King Offwine gaue to Peda sonne to Penda, because hee married King Offwines daughter, as is aforeshewed, the kingdome of the South marches, diuided by the River of Trent from the North marches.

Hugo de Peterborow. Peda the first Christian king of Mercia.

Peda, now King of Mercia, being also the first Christian king of that kingdome, began to plant Christianity, throwing downe, and destroying the Idols, and erecting Churches of Christian Religion. Among the which hee began the foundation of Medilhamstede, now called Peterborow: but he raigned not long, for he was trayterously slaine by the meanes of Alfled his wife, in the feast of Easter, in the yeere of Christ, 657. And king Offwine three yeres after his great victory ouer the cruell Pagan Penda; the Nobility of the Mercians, Iumin, Eaba, and Eadbert rebelled against him, aduancing to the Crowne, Vlfere, brother to Peda.

661. Vlferus brother to Peda, earnestly preferred Christianity, which his brother had begun, but he was the first (saith William of Malmesbury) that through the sinne of Symony, sold the Bishoprick of London vnto Wina.

Worcester. I reade in a Legar booke of the Monastery of Peterborow, that Vlferus, King of Mercia, remaining at his Castle of Worcester in Staffordshire, and vnderstanding that his sonne Vlfade had led his brother Rufin to Chad (vnder colour of hunting) by whom they were both instructed in the Christian Faith, and had receiued Baptisme, by the perswasion of Werebode, goeth to the Oratory of the Holy man, where, finding both his sonnes in diuine contemplation, he killed them with his owne hands, whose bodies, Ermenhelde, the Queene their mother, did bury in a Sepulchre of stone, and in procelle of time, caused a Church of stone there to be builded: which place was after called Stones, by reason of the stones which the multitude brought thither for the building thereof, when they came to frequent the place.

Vlfere slew his owne sonnes. Priory of Stones in Staffordshire.

Medilhamsted or Peterborow.

But Vlfere after, repenting thereof, destroyed all the Temples of the Idols, and in place of them did build Churches and Monasteries, among the which he bestowed great cost on Medilhamstede enriching it with large possessions.

This Church standeth in the Prouince of Gerwy, or such as inhabite the Fennes, and may not be come vnto, except on the East side: on the South side where doth runne the River of Nenne, in the midsoll of the which course is a place, as it were, a Whirlepole, which is so deepe and cold, that in the Summer none can fathome or dine to the bottome, and yet it is neuer frozen in the Winter: for (as they say) there is a Fountaine, out of the which issueth water, which place the ancients did name Medeswell, of which the Monastery built hard by, was called Medilhamstede, with the three brethren, Peda, Vlfere, and Ethelred, the sonnes of Penda, with their sisters, Kenesburge, and Kenelwith, and king Offwine did build from the foundation. But Peda in the yeere of Christ 675. with the deuout multitude, by the helpe of Sexulfus first Abbot there, began this Monastery, and layd the foundation there, of such stones as eight yoke of Oxen could scarce draw one of them, which stones were same when the Monastery was burned. This Church was destroyed by the Danes, as all other Monasteries were, and so remained 96. yeres, till the time that Ethelwald, Bishop of Win, comming into a place called Tindall or Dondall, began there to make a new foundation, but after comming to Medilhamsted, which he found desolate, by the help of king Edgar and Adulphus his Chancellor, he did new repaire the Monastery there: and the Monastery at Dundall was made a Parish Church. In Anno 1117. this Monastery of Medilhamsted with the whole Town was burnt, but in the yeere after begun to be new builded by Abbot Iohn, from the foundation, and the Monkes entred againe in the yere 1140. King Vlfere raigned 17. yeres, and was buried at Lichfield: Ermined his wife, after his decease became a Nun at Ely vnder her mother Sexburg.

Dundall in Northamptonshire.

676. Ethelred, brother to Vlferus, succeeded in the kingdome of the Mercians: hee obtained a Bishops sea to be in the City of Worcester: Bosellus was first Bishop there: Egwinus was the second. This Egwinus, by the helpe of Kenredus, king of the Mercies, founded the Monastery of Euesham, in a place then called Souesham, of the Shepheards field a house purchased by the said Bishop. The Towne in the Saxons time was called Hothebolne. About the same two Noblemen, Odo and Dodo, founded the Priory of Tewkesbury. Also Olricke, Duke of Gloucester founded the Monastery of Gloucester, then for Nuns: since the same is a Bishops Sea. Ethelred became a Monke at Bardoney in Lincolnshire, when he had raigned 30. yeres.

706. Kinredus, sonne to Wolferus, in the 5. yeere of his raigne went to Rome, and became a Monke in the Church of S. Peter the Apostle, where he continued in fasting, prayer, and almes giuing, vntill his dying day.

710. Elred, the sonne of Ethelred, who as he was marueilous in prowesse against Ina, of the West Saxons, so was he miserable by vntimely death, for he raigned not past eight yeeres, and was buried at Lichfield.

718. Ethelbald raigned in continuall peace many yeeres, and then by the procurement of Beruredus, was slaine of his owne subiects. Also this Ethelbald, Boniface, the second Bishop of Mentz in Germany, after Archbishop of Mentz vpon the Rhene, an English man borne, who was afterward martyred, for the profession of Christ and his holy Gospell, sent an Epistle, of the which I will here set downe a piece to be seene, for that it serueth partly the estate of that time then present, and serueth for example in time to come.

Chronicle of Mariana. Polydor. Hollinshed.

To his most deare Lord, and to be preferred in the loue of Christ aboue all other, Kings of England, Edbaldus, Boniface Archbishop, to Ethelbald the Germane Legate, perpetuall health of charity and love in Christ. We acknowledge before God, that wee did reioyce to heare of your prosperity, your Faith and good workes: and wee be sorry when we heare any thing that goeth against you, either in successe of warre, or in danger of your soule, for wee haue heard, that you forbid theft and robbery, that you loue peace, defend the widdow, and the poore, for the which wee giue God thankes: but in that you refuse lawfull marriage; which if it were to the preferring of chastity, it were commendable: and sith you wallow in lechery and adultery with Virgins consecrate to God, it is both shamefull and damnable, for it doth confound your renowne, both before GOD and man, placing you among Idolaters, because you violate the Temple of God. Wherefore, my deare sonne, repent, and remember how filthy a thing it is, that thou, who by the gift of God raignest ouer so many Nations, shouldest to the great displeasure of God, make thy selfe a bondslaue to thine owne fleshly lust. We haue heard also, that the more part of Noble men and people of the Mercians, by thine euill example, haue left their lawfull wiues, and haue denied the wiues of other, and also Virgins, which how farre it differeth from all good order and honestie, let the lawes of strange Nations teach you: for in the ancient country of the Saxons (where was no knowledge of GOD) if either a mayde in her fathers house, or being married to an husband, were become an adultresse, she should be strangled by her owne hand closed to her mouth, and the corrupter should be hanged vpon the pit where the adultresse was buryed. If she were not so vsed (her garments being cut away downe to the girdlestede) the chaste Matrones did scourge and whip her, and pricke her with knives, and so was sent from Towne to Towne, where other fresh and new scourgers or whippers did meete and whip her, vntill they had killed her. Likewise the Womedians, who are the most vncleane kinde of people, had this manner of wage with them, that the husband being dead, the woman together with the dead body, should cast her selfe headlong into the fired stake or pile of wood prepared for the burning of their bodies. If therefore the Gentiles (not knowing God) had so great zeale to chastity, how much more (my deare sonne) is it to be required at thy hands, who art a Christian and a King? Haue therefore compassion of thine owne soule, and spare the great number of the people, that by thy fatherly example yet may beware to offend God, for whose soules thou shalt giue an account.

Adultry among Infidels punished by death.

Consider also, that if the English Nation, despising lawfull matrimony, doe increase by aduoutry, (as the Frenchmen, Italians, and also the very Pagans doe call in our teeth, and vpbrayd be withall,) of such coniunctions and copulations, shall spring by a peakish dastardly people, which shall despise God, and with their wicked qualities inuade the country, as it came to passe to the Burgundians, the people of Piacenance, and the Spanyards, whom the Saracens haue many yeeres assaulted for their sinnes which in times past they had committed. Besides this, it is told vs that you take away priuileges of Churches, and thereby giue euill example vnto your noble men to do the like: but I pray you remember how terrible vengeance God tooke vpon the kings, your predecessors, which committed such offences as we rebuke you for.

A wicked spirit came vpon Solredus, your predecessor, which was a defiler of Virgins, and a breaker of Ecclesiasticall priuiledges: for sitting royally among his Barons at a dinner, the diuell plucked away his soule without confession of his sinnes. The diuell also driue in such a rage, Ofredus, king of the Northumbers, which was guilty of the same crimes, that with a vile death, hee lost both kingdome and life in his lustie young age. Also Charles, king of France, which ouerthrew churches, and altered the Church money to his owne vse, was consumed with a long torment and fearefull death. It followeth therefore (my deare beloued sonne) that with fatherly and earnest prayers wee beseech you, that you will not despise the counsell of your fathers, which diligently doe admonish your Highnesse: for nothing is more commodious to a good king, then willingly to amend such faults when hee is warned of them, as Salomon saith, Who so loueth Discipline, loueth Wisedome. Therefore (my deare sonne) declaring our aduice, wee beseech you by the liuing God, by his Sonne Iesus Christ our Lord, and by his holy Spirit, that you will remember how transitory this present life is, and how short and momentany the pleasure of this filthy flesh is, and how vile and shamefull a thing it is, that man shall leaue euill examples to his posterity for euer: begin therefore to frame your life in better daies, & amend the errors of your youth, that you may obtaine praise with men in this life, and eternall glory in the life to come: We wish your Highnesse well to fare, and to encrease in all goodnesse.

Moreouer, the same Bonifacius sent an Epistle of the like tenor vnto Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, adding thereunto, that he should rebuke the Clerkes and Nuns for their finenesse and pompe of apparell and garments. Hee also willed Cuthbert not to marueile that hee meddled with other mens matters, nor to thinke it no part of his charge, to deale with the English Nation, but to vnderstand that Gregory, Bishop of Rome had bound him, by the Sacrament thrice received, to let him vnderstand of the manners and blages of the Nations about him: which indeede (hee said) hee would doe, if his gentle admonition tooke not good successe.

The Epistle of Boniface to Ethelbald tooke such effect, that Ethelbald foorthwith sending to the Archbishop Cuthbert, and other his Clergy and Nobility, by their counsell, amongst other things hee caused to be published, as followeth:

I Ethelbald, king of the Mercians, foreseeing that I ought to prouide for the kingdome euerlasting, and the remedy of my soule, that I may deliuer (herein) the bondage of sinne. And forasmuch as Almighty GOD, by his mercifull clemency, without any of my deserts going before, hath giuen mee the Scepter of the Kingdome, gladly therefore will I render vnto him of the things which he hath giuen mee, and for this cause, I giue this gift by my life time:

That all Churches of my kingdome shall be discharged of all maner of tribute, in works, and burdens, except it be in the building of Towers, Castles and Bridges, which cannot be released vnto any. Moreouer, that seruitours of Monasteries and Churches, shall haue their own proper liberty in the profit of woods, and of fields, and shall not be bound to giue any reward vnto the King or Princes, except they will, but shall be free, that they may serue God, &c.

This Councell, or Conuocation was holden by Cuthbert the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other Bishops and Prelates, in the yere of our Lord and Sauiour Iesus Christ, seuen hundreth, forty and seuen, and was in the three and thirtieth yere of Ethelbald King of the Mercians, who then was present with his Princes and Dukes, where when there was assembled out of diuers Prouinces of Bryttaine, Bishops, and other spirituall persons, and the writtings of Pope Zachary were read in two parts, wherewith hee did admonish the people of England to liue more continently, he threatened that the despisers of his commandements should be excommunicated: whereupon the Bishops and Prelates agreed vpon certaine Articles as followeth.

W. Malmesburies fore the Church of England.

That the Prelates should liue more carefully and warne their subiects.

That they should liue in one peaceable mind, although they liued separate in bodies.

That euery yere they should visit their Parishes and charge.

That euery one in his iurisdiction warne the Abbots and Monks to liue orderly, and the Bishops not to oppresse their subiects, but to cherish them.

That they also see that the Monasteries, the secular men that cannot be taken away, be decently ordered.

That none be admitted to orders, vnlesse his life before be well examined.

Holy Scriptures to be read in the Church.

That the reading of holy Scriptures be frequented in the Monasteries.

That the Priests be not buyers and sellers in worldly affayres.

That the Priests receiue no reward for baptizing of children, and other Sacraments.

The Lords Prayer and Creede in English.

That they learne and teach in English the Lords Prayer and the Creede.

That all doe finish their Ministery after one and the same manner in their Churches.

That they sing seruice in the Churches with sober voyce.

That the solemnization of our Lord, and the birth daies of Saints be solemnized at one and the same time.

That the Sunday be kept honourably holy.

That intercession be made for Kings and Rulers, &c. In all thirty Articles.

Ethelbald founded the Monastery of Crowland, and because the marish of this Crowland, as the very name declareth (for it signifie hornby ground and mire) was not able to beare a Stone building, the foresaid king caused many and mighty piles of Oake to be driuen into the ground, and commanded hard earth to be brought thither 9. miles off by water in boats, from the higher ground, and to be mingled with the marish, and in this sort he laid the foundation, and finished the Church of Stone.

The Monastery of Crowland founded.

When Ethelbald had raigned 41. yeeres, fighting against Cuthred, in the warre not prudently begun, vpon Segisiwald, or Secondone (as some say) three miles from Tamworth, he was slaine by the Tyrant Barred, and was buried at Ripendine, or Ripon, at that time a famous Monastery.

Segisiwald by Tamworth.

BEraredus the murtherer of Ethelbald did nothing worthy the remembrance, but was slaine by Offa, and had an end meet for a traytor. 749.

OFfa, Nephew to Ethelbald succeeded: hee ioyned battell with Kinculfus King of the West Saxons, and got the victory. Hee sent for Ethelbert, King of the East Angles, promising great things by flattery: but when he had got him to his Palace, hee caused him to be beheaded, and then vniustly inuaded the kingdome of the East Angles, as is shewed in the raigne of the East Angles. Vita Albani.

This yere 788. and the eighth yere of the raigne of Constantine the seuenth of that name, and the seuenty seuenth Emperour of the Romanes, at the request of Pope Adrian and Tharasius Patriarke of Constantinople, there was an vniuersall Councell held at Nice, of three hundred Bishops, in which Councell, the Catholike Faith was strengthened and confirmed, and all ancient heresies and new Schismes condemned. And at this time in France, flourished the famous Englishman, Albinus, alias Rabanus, surnamed Abcainus, whom the King of England sent to conclude the peace with Charlemaigne, and after that became his Tutour for Logicke, Rethoricke, and the liberall Sciences, and was also an excellent Astrologian: he also procured the translation of the Vniuersity from Rome to Paris, in like manner as that of Greece was translated to Rome: hee dyed very famous and memorable. 3 generall Councells at Nice.

Albinus the famous Englishman.

The Vniuersity of Paris found ded.

He caused the reliques of Saint Alban to be taken vp, and put in a Shrine adorned with gold and precious stones, and builded there a Princely Monastery, endowing the same with Lands by his Charter, dated the yere of Christ 793. in the yere of Offaes raigne, 32. in the famous place called Celchyth, with the witnesse of himselfe, his Sonne Egfride, 9. Kings, 15. Bishops, 10. Dukes, &c. S. Albans builded.

Hee founded the Abbey of Bath.

He translated the Archbishops See to Lichfield.

Hee made a Dike betweene Wales and the kingdome of the Mercies, which ditch extendeth by Offas Dike.

by South from the parts about Bristow, ouer the Mountaines of Wales, eso North, toward Flint, and vnder a hil of coale, euen to the mouth of Dee, or the North Sea, which Dike is yet to be seene, and manifestly appeareth in diuers places. He raigned 39. yeres, and died at Oslay, and was buried in a Chappell which then stod on the banke of the River Ouse, without the Towne of Bedford. Which Chappell with the Sepulchre of the King, the said River hath swallowed vp, whose Tombe of Lead (as it were some phantasticall thing) appeareth often to them that seke it not, but to them that seke it (saith Rowse) it is inuisible.

The original of Flanders and Holland.

This yere 793. the waste countrey of Flanders began to be an Earledome: the first Earle thereof was called Lindericus: the people of this Prouince are descended from the Seines and Saxons, after they were returned from the warres of Charlemaigne.

Munster founded.

Charlemaigne builded the Bridge in Collen, and founded Munster in Germany, and in the yere 864. the countrey of Holland began to be an Earledome, being two yeres after the Bulgarians had receiued the Christian Faith.

796. EGbertus, bz Ecfride his sonne, raigned one yeere: Alquine wzit to Osbert of the Bercians, that the noble young Ecfride dyed not to some for his owne faults, but because his father Flaccus Albinus. was a great theder of blood.

796. KEnulfus, Nephew in the fifth degre vnto Penda, warred on the Kentish Saxons, pu-W. Malmes. nished their Countrey very sore, and carried away bound their King Egbertus, but not long after, when he had builded a Church at Winchelcombe: on the day of the dedication thereof, he deliuered him, declaring a worthy example of clemency. He founded the church of S. Ethelbert in Hereford, and raigned 24. yeres. Winchelcombe founded. Bishops seate Hereford founded. 820.

KEnelmus sonne to Egbertus, a childe of seuen yeeres, was innocently slaine by his sister Quenda, whereby he obtained the name of a Martyr.

COelwulfus, bzother to Kenulfus, raigned one yeere, and was expulsed by Bernulfus. 820.

BErnulfus in the third yere of his raigne was ouercome by Egbertus, king of West Saxons at Clyndune. 821.

LVcanus, after hee raigned two yeeres, was oppressed by the East Angles. 824.

WIthlafus, being at the first subdued by Egbirth, raigned 13. yeeres, paying to him and his sonne a tribute. 826

BErthulfus raygned 13. yeeres, in the same estate, till at last he was chased beyond the Seas, by the Sea-rouers of Denmarke. 839. W. Malmes.

BVrdredus paying the tribute, enioyed the same 20 yeres, and then he being deposed, and driuen out of his Countrey, fled to Rome, and there was buried at the English Schole. Then that kingdome was by the Dane deliuered to Ceolwulfus, and in few yeeres after that, Alphred the Nephewe of Egbirth gate it. So the kingdome of the Bercians fell away in the yeere of Christ 875. 852.

NORTHVMBERS.

THe firth kingdome was of the Northumbers, which contained Lancashire, Yorkeshire, Cumberland, Westmerland, Northumberland. It had on the West, the Sea, by South the River of Humber, and so downward toward the West, by the ends of the Shires of Nottingham and of Darby, vnto the River of Perce, and hath the Diocelles of Yorke Durham, and Carleile.

At the beginning, it was diuided into two kingdomes, Bernitia, and Deira. Bernitia stretched from Edenburough Frith to Tine: and Deira, from Tine to Humber, but these two were shortly vnited.

W. Malmes. When Hengist had established himselfe in Kent, hee sent his brother Octa, and his Sonne Ebusam to possesse the North parts of Britaine, where many times they put the men of that Prouince to flight, and for the space of ninety nine yeeres: they and their successours ascribed to themselues the names of Dukes, and bare themselues vnder the kingdome of Kent: but in the yeere of Christ, 547. the yeere after Hengists death 60. that Dukedome was changed into a kingdome.

IDa the ninth from Beldegius, and the tenth from Woden, continued 14. yeeres in the kingdome of Deires. 547.

AElla his successour of the same kindred, but by mother line, strongly aduanced his kingdome 30. yeeres. 559.

In his time, children of Northumberland were carried to be sold in the market at Rome, where, when the Citizens beheld them, and wondred at their comelinesse and beauty of face, amongst other, Gregory the Archdeacon of the Apostolicall seat being one, asked of what Nations they were. Vnto whom it was answered, That they were the children of Englishmen, of the Prouince of Deires, and subiect to Alla their King, but were Painims: whereunto Gregory said, They shall be taught to sing Alleluia there, during the raigne of Alla ouer the Deires. 582. W. Malmes. ETheliricke, the sonne of Ida, raigned in both Prouinces of Deiric and Bernicia 5. yeres.

587. Matthæus Florianensis. ETheltride, bzother to Echelricus, made greater spoyle of the Brytaines, then all the kings of the Angles, and vnpeopled and subdued moze of their Countries, and made the same tributary and habitable foz Englishmen: wherfoze Aadan, king of the Scots, being greatly moued with this happy successe, came against him with a mighty army but was ouercome and put to slight of a few Saxons; which battel was fought by Athelfreth, in a place called Degsastan, in the 11. yere of his raigne, and in the first yeere of Phocas the Emperour, which was the yere of Christ 603.

This king also, not long after this time, leuied a new power, and according as Augustine the Archbishop of Canterbury had before spoken, marched toward the Citty of Legions, which of the Brytaines is called Cairlegion, and there slew 1200. Monkes, assembled to make prayer vnto God for the good successe of their souldiers in battell: and afterward he ouerthrew the whole power of the Brytaines host. Hee was slaine by Redwald king of the East Angles, in a battell nere vnto the River which is called Idle, in the yere of Christ 616. when hee had raigned 27. yeeres. The Monks of Bangor murthered. W. Malmes.

617. EDwine succeded Ethelfride, and droue out the seuen sonnes of king Ethelfride.

In Anno 626. Paulinus being the third Bishop of Rochester, was constituted by Iustus, then Archbishop of Canterbury, to be Bishop ouer the Northumbers, and sent by Eadbald to Edwine the king of that Nation, with his wife, being the daughter of king Ethelbert, and sister of the said king Eadbald. Fitt Christian king of Northumberland. Matthæus Florianen. W.

A certaine desperate fellow, named Eomer, was sent vnto king Edwine, by Guicheline king of the West Saxons, who came vnto him on Easter-day, and hauing a naked weapon vnder his garment, assayled the King, but Lilla his seruant thrust himselfe before the stroke, yet notwithstanding, the King was with that stroke wounded thozow the bodie of his faithfull seruant.

The same night the Quene his wife was deliuered of a daughter, which vpon Whitsunday next after was the first that was baptized of Paulinus the Bishop, and named Eanfleda.

In the yeers of Christ, 628. Edwine the most mighty king of the Northumbers, and his people, receiued the Word of God, at the preaching of Paulinus the Bishop: this was done in the 11. yere of his raigne, and in the 230. yere after the arriuall of the Angles in Brytaine.

Edwine gaue vnto Paulinus a Bishops Sea in the City of Yorke, and began the Cathedrall Church of S. Peter there, which Church was after finished by king Oswald his successor: after this, in encreasing of the Christian faith and heauenly kingdome, his earthly possessions did wonderfully encreale, foz he first of all the Angles brought Brytaine wholly vnder his subiection, sauing the kingdome of Kent. Cathedrall Church of Yorke founded.

Edwine, in the 17. yere of his raigne, and the 48. of his age, was slaine in a battell which hee fought at Heafsield, with the most valiant Patrun, Penda, king of the Mercies, and Ceadwalla, king of the Brytaines. Paulinus the Bishop builded the great Church at Lincolne. In the raigne of king Edwine, such was the peace and tranquillity thozow all Britaine, which was soeuer king Edwines dominions lay, that a weak woman might haue walked with her new borne babe ouer all the Iland without any damage. Lincolne Minster founded. Bede.

Moreouer, foz the refreshing of trauailing men, he ordained cups of yron oz brasse, to be fastned by such cleare Wels and Fountaines as did run by the waies side, which cups no man durst touch, further then to his owne present vse and necessity, foz the love and good will they bare to their Prince, who was foz the time of his raigne so honoured and loued, that the triumphant banners were borne before him, not in warre only, but in peace too, whereseoeuer he went abzoad. Cups of brasse by the high way.

After the death of Edwine, the kingdome of Northumberland was againe diuided.

OSrich, sonne of Elfrike, who was Edwines vncle, succeeded in the gouernance of Deira. And Eanfride the sonne of Ethelfride, ruled the Wernicians: but both these forsaking the Christian profession, wherein they were instructed, yeelded themselues to be defiled with the filth of Idolatry: but this Apostasie was reuenged by Cedwall King of the Brytaines, who slew them both, and with tragicall slaughter spoyled Northumberland. 633.

OSwald, bzother to Eanfride, then gouerned this kingdome, who with a small army ouercame the Brytaines, and slew Cedwall their king at Denisesburne. He sent foz Aidan a Scot to aduance the Christian Religion among his people, assigning to him the Ile of Lindisfarne oz Holy Iland, foz his Sea. He greatly enlarged his kingdome, reconciled the Deirians and Wernicians, which did deadly hate one another. And when he had raigned 8. yeres, was slaine in a cruell battell at Palefield, by Penda, King of Mercia, and canonized a Saint. 634.

OSwine, bzother to Oswald, succeeded: he buryed the head and armes of Oswald, which Penda commanded to be hanged vpon poles. His gouernment was greatly disturbed by insurrection of the Bercians, rebellion of his owne sonne Ælfride, and insurrection of Adilwald, sonne to Oswald. Hee murthered Oswy, the sonne of Olrich, who ruled Deira, being traiterously deliuered vnto him at Ingelthing, where afterward a Monastery was erected. But at length he deliuered his Country from foraine inuasion, banquished the Bercians with Penda, in a fought field, neere the River Iewet, brought them to his subiection, and caused them to be instructed in the Christian Faith. 642. Liber Lichfield. T. Rudburne.

Hee builded a Church among the Mercians, called Lichfield, and procured the same to be a Bishops Sea, in Anno, 657. Lichfield Church & Bishops Sea founded.

Dwina was first Bishop there of Mercia, and also of Lindesferne: for there were then so few Priests, that one Bishop was compelled to governe two Provinces. King Oswine ended his life quietly, when he had raigned 32. yeres.

670. EGfride, his lawfull son, then inherited Northumberland: hee deposed Wilfride of the Bishopricke, and appointed two Bishops over the Northumbers. Mildred, otherwise called Etheldred, his wife, would by no meanes accompany with her husband, but continued a Virgin, and after the had beene married twelue yeres, toke at the hands of Wilfride the vaile and habite of a Nunne, and built the Monastery of Ely, where she was Abbesse.

Egfride her husband fought a battell with Edilfride king of Mercia, but after they were reconciled by Theodore the Bishop. Then turning his power against Ireland, hee sent Berte thither, who miserably destroyed the silly people. But the yere following, he marched against the Picts contrary to the good counsell of Saint Cuthbert (whom hee made Bishop) and was slaine by them in an ambush, in a place called Nectansmere, when hee had raigned 15. yeeres, and was buried in S. Columbes Iland.

685. ALfride, baſtard sonne to Oswine, succeeded after his brother Egfride. Hee did repaire the decayed state of Northumberland, but could not recouer all that Picts, Scots, and Britains tooke from the Northumbers, at the death of his brother. He raigned 29. yeres.

704. OSred his sonne, a childe of eight yeeres succeeded, who, when he had wickedly raigned 11. yeres, was murthered by his kinsmen, Kenred and Ofricke. Kenred, when hee had slaine Osred, ruled Northumberland two yeres.

715. OSricke obtained the kingdome after eleuen yeeres, and elected Ceolnulph, brother of Kenred, to be his successor.

728. CEolnulph raigned in this Prouince with great piety and victory 8. yeres, and then forsoke the state of a king, and toke the habite of a Monke, in the holy Iland.

Glasing brought among the Saxons. Bede famous

Benedict, who first brought Palons, Painting and Glasing into this Realme to the Saxons, flourished at this time. Beda also that famous learned man, liued at this time, who dedicated his Historye of the Church of England to the forenamed Ceolnulph.

736. EGbert, cousin germane to Ceolnulph, raigned in Northumberland 20. yeeres peaceably, and then forsaking the world, entered into Religion, and became a Monke: his brother bearing the same name, was Archbishop of Yorke, which Sea he greatly aduanced, and founded there a most worthy Library, replenished with all good Authors.

W. Malmesb. Library at Yorke.

758. OSwulfe succeeded his father, who was slaine by the people in the first peere of his raigne.

758. MOllo then toke the regiment, and after 11. yeeres was traiterously murthered by Alered.

769. ALered raigned after him 11. yers, and was enforced by the people to leaue the Countrey.

780. AThelred, or Etheldred, the sonne of Mollo, was aduanced to the Regiment of Northumberland by the people, and the 5th peere after was by them depriued.

785. AElfwold then was proclaimed king of Northumberland, and when hee had raigned 11. yeeres, was slaine by his subiects: hee lyeth buried at Hauguſtald.

796. OSrede, the sonne of Alerede, then succeeded, but the first yere he was deprined.

AThelred, or Etheldred, who was before depoſed, now received the kingdome, and when he had ruled foure yeeres, was also miserably slaine. After his death, this kingdome decayed, and was pittifully ransacked by ciuill sedition, and forraine inuasions, for the space of thirty yeeres, in which space, there ruled here without Title of kings,

WEST

WEST SAXONS.

THe 7th kingdome was of the West Saxons, which contained the countries of Barkshire, Southhampton, Wiltshire, Dorsetshire, Somersetshyre, Deuonshire, and Cornwal, and hath Dioceses, Bath and Wels, Sarisbury and Cresester: hauing on the East side Southsex, on the north side Thames, on the South and the West, the Ocean Sea.

This kingdome, although it take beginning long after the first comming of the Saxons, yet the same endured longest, and ouercomming all the other kingdomes, brought them againe to one Monarchy.

CErdic, the tenth from Woden, with his son Kenricke, and other Saxons in fiue ships, in Anno Christi, 499. landed in Brytaine, at a place called Cerdikesford, and slew Natanleod King of the Brytaines, and fiue thousand men, of whose name the Country as far as Cerdikesford, was called by the name of Natanleod. From thencefoorth hee kept the Brytaines in great quiet, for they thought not good to stirre where they wanted hope to preuaile.

519. CErdike and Kenrike beganne to raigne as kings, and the same yeere they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdikesford, and departed banquithers.

After that, they fought with the Brytaines in a place called Cerdicklege. These two Kings, to wit, the Father and the Sonne, toke the Ile of Wight, and gaue the same to their Nephews, Stuffe and Withgare, and slew the Brytaines in a place called Withgarberg. He raigned 17. yeeres. Withgare the Nephew of Cerdic was king of the Ile of Wight, and was buryed at Withgarberg, or the City of Withgare in the Ile of Wight.

526. KEnrike, the sonne of Cerdic, fought with the Brytains at Searesburige, and afterwards at Berambrige, and at both times put them to flight, and raigned 25. yeeres.

560. CEauline, the sonne of Kenrike, tooke vpon him the kingdome of the West Saxons.

In the beginning of his raigne he discomfited Ethelbert King of Kent, and slew his two Dukes, Oslaue and Cnebban at Wibbandune. Afterward his brother Cutholfe vanquished the Brytaines at Bedford, and wan from them the Townes of Libanburge, Egelsburge, Benfington and Egnesham.

Liganburge.

Sir yeres after, Ceauline slew three Kings of the Brytaines, Commeaile, Condidan, and Fariemeile, at Droxham, and toke three Cities from them, Gloucester, Cirencester, and Bathancester.

After hee fought with the Brytaines at Fethanleah, in which hee had the victory, but lost his sonne Cutha: for now his fortune changed, and when he had raigned 33. yeeres, hee was ouercome at Woodnesbeorge, or Wannes ditch in Wiltshire, and expelled out of his kingdome by the Brytaines, by the meanes of Cealrike his brother Cuthas son, that now rebelled against him, and expulsed him the kingdome, when hee had raigned 30. yeeres.

The Redborn Leyland.

Cealrike, the Sonne of Cutholfe, ruled the West Saxons 5. yeeres. 591.

CEolwulfe, sonne of Cutha before named, succeeded, who had continuall warres eyther with the Englishmen, with the Britaines, with the Scots, or with the Picts, and lastly moued warre against the South Saxons, and there ended when hee had raigned 14. yeeres. 598.

KInegilsus, the sonne of Ceolrike, succeeded. He brought his host against the Brytaines into Beandune, and there slew of them 2046. 611. Marian. Floria. Wigor.

Hee also fought with Penda, King of Mercians, neere vnto Cirencester, and after made peace with him.

And shortly after, in the yere of Christ, 635. by the preaching of Berinus, King Kinegilsus, and all his people received the Christian Faith, to whom King Oswald was God-father at the Font, of which kings, the said Berinus had granted to him the City of Dorchester, and builded there an house of Canons for his Bishops Sea. Kinegilsus raigned seuen and twenty yeeres. Westsex baptized. Vita Berini. Dorchester a Bishops sea.

CVicheline, the sonne of Kinegilsus, was baptized by Berinus the Bishop, in the City of Dorchester, and deceased the same yeere. 638.

CVthedrus, the sonne of king Guicheline, was baptized at Dorchester, by Berinus the Bishop, who was his God-father at the Font. He raigned foure yeeres. About this time, Honorius, Archbishoppe of Canterbury diuided his Prouince into Parishes. 639.

KEnnewalcus, the sonne of King Kinegilsus, tooke on him the kingdome of the West Saxons. 649.

Hee founded the Cathedral Church in Winchester, placing there a Bishops Sea. Winchester a Bishops sea. Malmesbury buylded.

Hee gaue Sepdulfusburgh to Adelmus the Abbot, there to build a Monastery. Afterward being infested with warres, by Penda, King of the Mercians, because he had forsaken his wife, sister of the said Penda, was by him driuen out of his kingdome, and fled to Anna, King of the East Angles, where he was baptized of Bishop Felix, and after was restored to his kingdome by the help of the forenamed Anna. He raigned 30. yeeres. After whome Quéene Sexburge his wife governed a while. She founded a Monastery of Nuns in the Ile of Sheppey, and became her selfe a Nun, and after Abbesse of Ely. Vita Adelm.

EAsewinus, Nephew to Kinegilsus succeeded, hee fought a battell against Wulfere, King of Mercia, in a place called Biddanfeafold. He raigned two yeeres. 672.

676. KEnewinus, sonne to Kinegilsus, chased the Brytaines suen to the Sea shore, and raigned 19. yeeres.

685. Marianus. CEadwalla, Nephew to Ceauline succeded in the kingdome.

Hee slew Berthune, Duke of the South Saxons, and brought that Province vnder grieuous bondage.

After that, hee and his brother Moll wasted Kent, and subdued the Ile of Wight, which till that time was giuen to Idolatry, whereof hee purged them, giuing the fourth part thereof to Bishop Wilfride, who appointed Preachers to conuert the people of that Ile to Christianity. Ceadwalla once againe spoyling the Country of Kent, his brother Moll, and 12. of his Knights were slaine by fire cast vpon them, after which time, euen before he was baptized, hee gaue for Tithe of Tenth to God all the prey and spoyles he had gotten to his owne vse: in whom (saith Malmesbury) although wee praise his affection, wee allow not the example: for it is written, that whoso offereth the sacrifice of poore folkes good, doth as it were sacrifice the sonne in the sight of his father.

After this hee went to Rome, when Sergius was Pope, hee was there baptized on Easter Euen, the yeere after Christs birth, 689. and falling sicke he dyed on the 20. day of Aprill, and was buryed honorably in S. Peters Church, with an Epitaph in Latine verse, and another in Latine prose, which may be Englished thus:

Ceadwall buried at Rome. Heere Ceadwall is buryed, otherwise named Peter, King of the West Saxons, who dyed the 20th of Aprill in the second indiction, and lined 30. yeeres, or thereabouts, when that Noble and mighty Prince Iustinian was Emperour of Rome, and had raigned 4. yeeres in the Empire, and Sergius a true patterne of the Apostles, had sate two yeeres in Peters seate.

687. Asser. INe raigned among the West Saxons, a Noble man, of great power and wisedome, and therewith valiant and hardy, in feats of armes very expert: he maintained such warre against the Kentish Saxons, that hee constrained them to seeke and intreat meanes of peace, giuing to him, for the same, great gifts, 30000. Mancas (pieces of gold so named.)

Floriacensis. This Ine was the sonne of Kenred, the sonne of Ceadwolde, brother to Keadwold, and sonne to Chenling, sonne of Kenri, sonne of Cirdic, the first King of the West Saxons. This man was more for his industry and naturall prowesse, then for his succession of the right Line called to be King. Hee was a Patrone of strength and manlinesse, an Image of wisedome, and his like was of no man knowne at that time, for Religion in profession, and framing himselfe thereafter in his liuing. He made also diuers good Lawes, which are yet to be seene.

Asser. About the 26. yeere of his raigne, hee fought a great battell against Ceired King of Mercia, Cuneburg. at Wodnesbury. And the same yere he inuaded the South Saxons with a mighty army, and slew in battell Anthun, King of the South Saxons, and supped that kingdome vnto his.

He builded a Colledge at Welis, dedicating it to the honour of God, and Saint Andrew the Apostle, in the yere of Christ, 704. which Church was since translated into a Bishoppes Sea, by Kenulphus, King of the West Saxons. He new builded the Abbey of Glastenbury, in a fenny place out of the way, to the end the Monks might so much the more giue their minoes to heauenly things, and chiefely die the contemplation meete for men of such profession; this was the 4th building of that Monastery. Besides which the said King did also erect a Chappell of gold and siluer (ta wit garnished) with ornaments and vessels likewise of gold and siluer, to the building of the which Chappell, he gaue 2640 pounds of siluer, and to the Altar, 264. pound of gold, a Chalcis with the Patten, ten pound of gold, a Censar 8. pound, and twenty Mancas of gold, two Candlesticks, twelue pound and a halfe of siluer, a Viser for the Gospell booke, twenty pound, and 60. Mancas of gold, vessels for water to the Altar, thirteene pound of gold, a Vason eight pound of gold, an holy-water Bucket twenty pound of siluer, Images of our Lord, and the twelue Apostle, 175. pound of siluer, and 28. pound of gold, a Pall for the Altar, & ornaments for the Monks, of gold and pretious stones subtilly compacted, all which treasure he gaue to that Monastery. In the yeere of Christ 705. Hedda, Bishop of the West Saxons, departed this life, after whose death, King Ine caused that Bishoprike to be diuided into two Parishes, the one to Winchester, which he gaue to Daniel, the other, to wit Shirebone, was giuen to Aldethelme, where he ruled 4 yeeres.

Also Eadberte Abbot, was made Bishop of Selsey by Chichester.

This Ine, King of the West Saxons, was the first that caused the mony called the Peterpence to be paid to Rome, and this was called the Kings almes, and was leuied in this manner, euery man that had 30. pennie worth of good of one manner cattell in their house of their owne proper, should giue a penny at Lammas yeerely. And when he had gouerned the West Saxons, by the space of 37. yeeres by the earnest labour of his wife Ethelburge, he left his worldly kingdome to his cousin Ethelard, and went to Rome, and there ended his life in poore estate.

ETheland, kinsman on the fathers side to Ine, succeeded in the kingdome, notwithstanding Oswald a yong man of the Kings blood, did disturbe the beginning of his raigne: for he stirred vp rebellion among the inhabitants, but not long after he dyed, and then Ethelard raigned quietly 14. yeeres. 749.

CYthrede, his kinsman, made warre on Ethelwald, King of Mercia against the Brytaines, and had of them the victory.

In his time, there appeared 2. blazing starres, calling as it were burning brands towards the South. He raigned 16. yeeres. Blazing Starres.

The Englishmen buryed not the bodies of their dead in Cities, vntill the time of Cuthbert Archbishop of Canterbury, who procured of the Pope Burriall in Churchyards. Pope, that in Cities there should be appointed Churchyards, for Honorius, when hee diuided his Province into Parishes, appointed not to them Churchyards for burriall.

75. W. Malmes. See Chron. SIgebert was King of the West Saxons. He was cruell and tyrannous towards his subiects, and changed ancient Lawes and customes after his owne lust and pleasure, and because a certaine Noble man some-deale sharply aduertized him to change his manners, hee put him to cruell death: and for so much as he continued in his malice, and would not amend, he was deprined of all Kingly authority, and lastly, as a person forlorne, wandring in woods, and hiding himselfe in caues of wilde beasts, hee was slaine in Andreads Wald by a Swineherd, whose Lord and Master, called Cumbra, hee had wrongfully put to death, when he had not raigned one yeere.

757. KEnulphus of the blood of Cerdicus, appeased certaine murmours and grudges that were amongst the people, for the deposing of his predecessour Sigebert.

Bishops sea at Wels founded. He founded the Cathedrall Church of Wels. As he haunted a woman which he kept at Merton, he was slaine by the treason of one Otio, the kinsman of Sigebert late king, when he had raigned 29. yeres, and was buried at Winchester.

786. BRithricus of the blood of Cerdicus, was made King of West Saxons, a man more desirous of peace then of warre.

He married Ethelburga the daughter of Offa king of Mercia, by whose power he expelled Egbert, that was an inner King in the Lordship of the West Saxons.

Blod rayned. In his time it rained blood, which falling on mens clothes, appeared like Crosses.

The Danes first arryued in this land. Marianus. In Anno 800. the Danes arriued in the Ile called Portland, but by the puissance of Brithricus, and other Kings of the Saxons, they were ouercome at Tegnemouth, driuen backe and compelled to auoyd the Land.

The King poysoned by his wife. Brithricus was poysoned by his wife Ethelburga, when he had raigned 17. yeres, and was buryed at Wartham. For this deede the Nobles ordained, that from thenceforth, the Kings wiues should not be called Quenes, nor suffered to sit with them in place of estate.

Eadburge with infinite treasure fled into France, where, offering a great portion of her gold to King Charles of France, he said vnto her, chose Eadburge whom thou wilt haue to thy husband, me or my Sonne: and shee answered, If choyce be granted me, I chose your son, because hee is younger then you: then (quoth Charles) If thou hadst chosen me, thou shouldst haue had my sonne, but because thou hast chosen my sonne, thou shalt haue neither him nor mee: and then gaue to her a Monastery wherein shee professed herselfe a Nunne, and became there Abbesse a few yeeres, but afterwards committing adultery with a Lay man, and cast out of the Monastery, she ended her life in pouerty and misery, as of many that haue seene her wee heard, saith mine Author Asserius.

After a wicked life, followed a miserable end to Queene Eadburg. Hougden.

EGbrichus obtained the gouernment of the West Saxons. He tamed the Wellshmen, vanquished Bernulphus king of the Mercians at Hellendone, and subdued to his obeysance the Kentish Saxons, East Saxons, and Northumbers. Hee caused the brazen Image of Cadwaline king of the Brittaines to be throwne down, and this land no more to be called Brytaine, but Angita, or England. He was crowned at Winchester. 800. W. Malmes. Sea. Chron. Brytaine first named England.

In the 33. yere of his raigne, the Danes arrived at Lindefferne, and sought with the Englishmen at Carham, where two Bishops, two Earles, and a great number of the English people were slaine. Two yeres after, the Danes arriued in West Wales, where Egbright ouercame them at Pengiftendon. In Anno 832. the Danes spoyled the Ile of Sheppey in Kent, and yet were they expelled out of the Ile of Thanet. He raigned ouer the most part of England the space of seuen and thirty yeres and seuen moneths, and was buried at Winchester. Danes arriued here. Sea. Chron.

839. W. Malmes. I. Brompton. AEthelulfus, the sonne of Egbrichus, late Bishop of Winchester, (saith Iohn Brompton Abbot of Iarwaux) began his raigne ouer the most part of England. Hee take to wife Osburgh his Butlers daughter, and after her, Iudith, daughter to the King of France, and had by his first wife 4. sonnes, which were kings after him.

Aredus Rituall. Danes spoile Rome. In his time there came a great army of the Pagan Danes, with 350. ships into the mouth of Thames, and so to London, spoyled it, and put to flight Beorthulfe, King of Mercia, with all his power which came to bid them battell: Then the Danes went with their army into Southry, where Adhelnulfus with his sonne Adhelbald, and a great army came against the forsaid Danes, and at a place called Aolea, they fought a cruell battell, wherein the most part of the Danes were slaine.

Sea Chron. The same yeere, Adhelstane, the sonne of Adhelnulfus, and Chalchere the Earle slew a great army of the Pagans at Sandwich in Kent, and take nine of their ships.

Adhelnulfus sent his sonne Alfride to Rome with a great number of Noble men and other, at which time, Pope Leo confirmed the said Alfride, and take him to be his sonne by adoption, and also conferred him King.

Tenth giue to the church by King Adhelnulfus. This Adhelnulfus did make the tenth part of his kingdome free from tribute and seruice to the King, and gaue it to them that did serue Christ in the Church: and the same yere he went to Rome, where hee repaired the English schole, which was first founded by Offa, King of the Mercies. He confirmed that grant of the Peter Pence to Rome, and as hee returned home through France, hee take to wife Iudith, the daughter of Charles, the bald King of France. English schoole at Rome repaired.

In the meane season, his sonne Adhelbald rebelling, vsurped the kingdome, so that when Adhelnulfus returned, hee was forced to diuide the kingdome, & to take the worse part. He raigned 18. yeres, and was buried at Winchester, where sometime he had bin Bishop (elected belike) but was after the deceasle of his Father, of neere kin taken from thence and made king.

7. Aug. A Dhelbald raigned after his father: against God, and the worthinesse of Christianity, yea, and contrary to the custome of all Pagans, hee presumed to his fathers marriage bed, and with great infamy married Iudith, the French kings daughter. He raigned after his father 2. yeeres, and was buried at Sherborne.

S. Ce. Ethelbrick, brother to Athelbald, tooke vnder his dominion, Kent, Southrey, and Sussex. In this time, the great army of the Pagans inuaded and spoyled the Citty of Winchester, who, when they returned with a great pray, towards their Ships, Ofrike, Earle of Hampton, and his folke, and Adhelmulus the Earle, with Warkeshire men met them, and farre from any Towne they ioyned battell, where the Pagans were slaine in euery corner, and the Christians kept the field.

The Mozmans and Danes made a firm league with the Kentish men, who promised them money to keepe the league, but notwithstanding the Pagans brake priuily out of their Castels by night, and spoyled all the East parts of Kent.

Athelbrick raigned fiue yeeres, and was buried at Shirborne.

865. Ethered, brother to Athelbrick, receiued the kingdome of the West Saxons. In the first yeere of his raigne, a great Daup of Pagans came into England, and remained all the winter in the kingdome of East England.

The Pagans departed out of Mozthumberland, came to Nottingham, and there wintered, but Beorede, gathering a great army against them, strengthened besides with Etheldreds power, king of the West Saxons, forced them to leaue Nottingham, and to goe backe againe to Yozk, where remaining till winter was passed, they then passed ouer by Boate into Linsey, and comming vp to Humberstane, spoiled the whole Country, they destroyed the most famous and ancient Monastery of Bardeney, slaying all the Monks without mercy, they ranging the Country, slew the Abbot and Monks of Croyland, and fired their Church, with the houses belonging to the Monastery. At Spoldishamstede, or Peterborough, they made the like slaughter, hacking and spoile, and so proceeding toward Huntington, preying & spoyling the Country, euen into Grantbrigesshire, and to the house of Nuns in the Ile of Ely, where they murthered all, as well women as men. Thus entering into East Angle, they slew the most valiant Earle Walkerulis, and all his company that resisted. The king also of the same Prouince, holy Edmond they take, bound him to a stake, shot him full of arrowes, and strake off his head, by meanes whereof they possessed all East England, and soiourned there all winter.

The yeere 871. the said army of the Danes came to Reading a Towne of the Kings, situate on the South side of the River Thames in Barkeshire, and there two of their Earles with a great power, rode forth to spoile the Country; in the meane time, the other cast a trench betweene the Thames, and Cinium or Kynet, on the right side of the same Towne, with whom Ethelwolfe Earle of Barkeshire did meete in a place called Englefield, (or field of the Englishmen) where one of the Earles being slaine, and the rest chased away, the Christians obtained the victory.

The Christians within 4. daies fought a battell with the Pagans, in Assendune, but the Pagans diuided themselues into two battels, for then they had two Kings, which when the Christians saw, they likewise diuided their army into two companies. Battell at Assendune.

It was determined that king Etheldred with his battell should goe against the two Pagan Kings with their battell, and that his brother Aelfred with his army should set on all the Pagan Dukes and their army. All things thus ordered, when the king tarried long in his prayer, and the Pagans being readily prepared, came to Chipenhame, where the battell was pitched: Aelfred seeing he must either retire, or set on his enemies before his brother did come, he straight waies set vpon them, though the place of battell was vnequall, for the Pagans had gotten the higher ground, and the Christians brought their battel from the valley. There was in that place one onely thorne tree, very short, about which tree, the battels met, & ioined, where when they had long time fought, Hubba one of the Kings 5. Earles, and many thousands mo of the Pagans being slaine, the other were chased. Battell at Chipenhame. Sca. Chron.

A great heape of stones was laid copped vp, where Hubba was buryed, and the place called Hubbelow. Hubbelow. Sca. Chron.

This being done, king Etheldred and his brother Aelfred, shortly after gathered their power againe to fight with the Pagans at Basing, where, after a long and sore battell, the Pagans had the victory. Pagans vanquished.

After this battell, came another army of Pagans from beyond seas, and ioined with the first.

When king Etheldred had raigned 5. yeeres, hee was slaine of the Pagans at Whittingham, and buried in the Monastery of Wimburne, with this Epitaph.

A Elfred, borne in Barkeshire, at a Village called Wanting, the 4th son of Athelwolfe, received the gouernment of the whole Realme, and within one moneth after, with a very small number, fought a sharp battell against the whole army of the Pagans, in a place called Wilton (which lieth on the Southside of the River Wily, of which River, the whole Shire taketh his name) and after they had fought a great part of the day, the Pagans fled: but seeing the fewnesse of them that pursued, they set themselues in 871. in battell a fresh, and got the field.

The West Saxons made a League with the Pagans, vpon condition, they should depart out of their Country. The next yeere they wintred at London, and made league with the Mercies.

The next yeere they wintered at Lindesey, which was in the kingdom of Northumberland.

The next yeere at Ripendune: they constrained Burgoredus king of Mercies, to fly beyond the seas, who went to Rome, where he dyed, and was buryed in the Schole of the Saxons. Burgoredus death.

The Pagans subduing the whole kingdome of the Mercies, which they committed to Ceonulfus: The next yeere one part of the Pagans wintered in Northumberland, neere to the River Tine, subdued the whole Country: the other part went with Guthram, Oskettellus, and Amandus three Kings of the Pagans, to Grantbridge, and wintered there.

The yeere following, the Pagans going from Cambridge in the night, entred the Castle of Wareham, where there was a Monastery of Nunnes, situate betweene two Rivers, Frawa and Trent, in the Country called in the Saxon, Thomseta, a most fare seat, except the West onely, where it layneth to the Land, with whom king Aelfred made a League that they should depart his kingdome, but contrary to their oath, they rode into Denonshire, to Exancester, and there wintered. Exceter.

Hinguar and Halfdene with 23. ships, came out of North Wales, where they had wintered, and like to fierce Wolues, had shed much Christian blood: setting fire to diuers Abbies, and made them equall with the ground; neuer kingdome or Country suffered greater calamity, at the hands of any Nation, then did the English, especially the Monks and religious women, for them they burnt in their houses, or otherwise tormented them to death. Monks and Marriages of religious people here.

The next yeere 120 of the Pagans ships were drowned at Swanaway: And king Aelfred pursuing an army that went by Land to Exceter, tooke of them pledges, and also an oath to part with all speed.

In the yeere following, the Danes came to Chipingham, a Mannor of the Kings, situate on the left side of Wiltshire, & there wintred, compelling many of the West Saxons to leaue their Country and to go beyond the seas, the rest that remained they subdued. King Aelfred himselfe was oft times brought into such misery, that none of his people knew where he was become. On a time being forced to hide himselfe with a Cow-heard in Somersetshire, as he sate by the fire, preparing his Bow and Shafts, the Cow-heards wife baking bread on the coales, threw the Kings Bow and Shafts aside, and said, Thou fellow, why dost thou not turne the bread which thou seest burne, thou art glad to eate it, ere it be halfe baked. This woman thought not that it had beene king Aelfred, who had made so many battels against the Danes, and gotten so many victories. For GOD did not onely vouchsafe to giue him victory ouer his enemies, but also to be wearied of them in the sight of his owne people, to the end hee should know there is one God of all, to whom all knees shall bow, and in whose hands the hearts of Kings consisteth. The brother of Hinguar, and of Healfdean, who had wintered in Mercia, and had made great slaughter of the Christians, sayled with 23. Shippes into Denonshire, where, doing great mischiefe, he and the most part of his people were slaine, the rest escaped by flying to their shippes. In this battell among many rich spoyles, was taken a Banner or Ensigne called Reafan, which among the Danes was had in great estimation, for that it was imbroidered by the three sisters of Hinguar and Hubba, the daughters of Lodbroke. King Aelfred made a Castle in Aethellingei, from thence hee went to Petram Egebrichti, which is on the East side of the Chase called Selnudum, in Latine Silua magna, the great wood: there met with him also the inhabitants of Hamshire, which, when they saw the King, reioyced as though he had beene risen from death to life. The King with his army went to Ethandune and fought against the Pagans, where he made great slaughter, and pursued the rest to their Castle, who after 14. daies, desired peace, gaue pledges, and tooke oath to depart this Realme: and Gythram their king received baptisme here by Ethelingsey, in a place called Aire, whom Aelfred received to be his God-son. Gythram king of Danes christened.

The next yere, the Pagans went from Cirenceaster to the East English, dinding that Country among them, and there inhabited. The Pagans that wintered at Fullanham, went into East France.

In the yeere 885. an army of Pagans came into Kent, and besieged the city of Rhofeceaster which lyeth on the East side of the River Medowegs, and before the gate of the same Citty they made a strong Castle, but Aelfred with a great army chased them to their ships. Rochester besieged. The Castle builded. Medway.

The next yere Aelfred restored and honourably repaired the City of London (after it had beene amongst other Cities destroyed with fire and the people killed vp) hee made it habitable againe, and committed it to the custody of his sonne in Law Adhered, Earle of the Mercies, vnto whom before hee had giuen his daughter Ethelfleda. And now with king Aelfred, all the English, Mercians, Kentishmen, South and West Saxons (which before were in captivity vnder the Pagans) willingly came and submitted themselues. Asserius. Horiace. The same yere, Hastings came with 80. ships into the mouth of Thames, and made a strong Towne called Middleton, in the South side of the Thames, and another on the North side, called Beauflete.

Fernham.

The same yere also Aelfred fought against the Normans at Fernham in Kent, in the Parish of Neles ford, where hee slew them, wounded their king, & chased the remnant thorow the Thames into Eastsex, where by many of them were drowned, they which escaped, fled to an Iland called Byrhtsey, situate in a streame of the River Colne.

Aelfred hearing that a great number of the Pagans were arrived at Cranceastre, he took with him a great army, and by battell ouercame and chased them away.

Beauflete taken from the Pagans.

In the meane season, Adhere, Earle of the Percies, and the Citizens of London, with other came to Beauflet, and besieged the Castle of the Pagans and brake into it, where they take exceeding rich spoyles of gold, siluer, horses and garments, among which was taken the wife of Hastings and his two sons, which were brought to London, and presented to the King, who commanded them to be restored againe. But Hastings came againe into Beauflet, and repaired the Castle which they had broken downe. From thence he went to Sceabridge, and there builded a strong Castle: there was ioyned vnto him the army that remained at Apuldrane, and other that came from the East Englishs, and from the Northumbers, who altogether spoyled and robbed, till they came to the banke of Seuerne, and there at Bultingatune they made a strong Towne, but by Adhered, Earle of the Percies, and other, they were besieged, and shortly through famine forced to come out. where many on both sides were slaine, but the Christians had the victory.

In the yeere 895. the Pagans wintered in a little Ile called Merlig, in the East part of Cester, situate in the sea, and the same yere they sayled by the River of Thames, after by the River of Ligia, and twenty miles from London began to build a Fortresse. In the Summer following, the Londoners and other here adioyning, did seeke to destroy the Fortresse of the Danes, but they being put to night, King Aelfred pitched a field not farre from the City, lest the Pagans should take away the harnesse of the Countrey, and viewing the River one day, perceiued that the Chanell might be in one place dammed vp, that the Danes should not get out their ships, he forthwith commanded on both sides of the River a damme to be cast, and diuided that River into 2. streames, that where ships before had sayled, now a small Boat could scantly row, which when the Pagans perceiued, they leaving their wiues and ships, fled a foote to Quatbridge, and there builded a fortresse, lodged there the Winter following, whose ships the Londoners brang some to London, the other they brake downe and destroyed. Anno 897. the Pagans came from Quatbridge, part into East England, part into Northumberland: some got them ships and sayled into France. After all these verations by the cruell Danes committed, followed far greater the space of three yeeres, by death of cattell, and mortality of men: twenty Danish ships were taken, being Pirates, and the Pirates slaine or hanged on the Gallowes.

Leofer.

Ioannes Leofer in his third booke of the description of Africa, writeth, that about this time (to say) about the yere of our Lord 905. the Englishmen at the perswasion of the Gothes, besieged the great City Argilla in Barbary, which the Africans call Arrella, being 70. miles distant from the straight of Marrocho Southward, hoping thereby, to withdraw the Sarazens out of Europe, where they fought with so great courage and good successe, that they wanne the said Towne, and so ransacked it with fire and sword, that scant one escaped there, and the Towne lay desolate, and without inhabitants for the space of thirty yeeres. Wee account this to haue happened in the foresaide yeere, because the Authour after the fashion of the Sarazens, doth referre it to the 314th yere of Mahomets Hegira, which by conference of their places doth seeme to beginne in the yeere of our Lord, 591. which number being added, doe bring forth 905.

Edhelwoldus, king of the Pagans, brought a great army from Calster, into the East English, which robbed and spoyled thorow all Mercia, and the West countrey, vntill they came to Cerikelade, and there went ouer the Thames, and take great spoyles about Wadney.

King Edward gathered an army and went toward the Danes, but while hee tarryed for his Army out of Kent, Adhelwolfe, King of the Danes came vpon him with a great power, and made him battell, wherein Cochricus, and Adelwolfe, kings of the Pagans were slaine.

The Empire translated into Germany.

OTto the Great Sonne to Henry the first of that name, was the 84. Emperour of the Romanes, hee beganne in the yeere of the world, 4892. and from the foundation of Rome 1686. and in the yeere of our Redemption, 935. and from the time that the Court Imperiall of seate of the Emperours was held in Germany, 135. yeeres, that is to say, from Charlemaigne, but if you reckon from Lewes the Stammerer that was king of France, then it is but fifty and fiue yeeres. Hee was anoynted Emperour by Pope Iohn the 12. in the 24. yeere of his raigne, and raigned foureteene yeeres after: he was the eleuenth Emperor after Charlemaigne, who translated the Empire from Greece into Almaigne, as appeareth in the Decretall: and in the time of this Otto, the Pope sent his Chapline called Poponius to Denmark, where with great diligence and diuine industry, hee conuerted and baptized Alardus King of Danes, being the 90. King of Denmarke, about the yeere of our Sauiour Christ 950. This Otto founded Magdeburgh, and constituted it Metropolitane of Sclauony, and about the end of the raigne of this Otto, old Nicephorus raigned Emperour of Constantinople, who seeing himselfe to be aged, waxed very iealous of his children, that they should supplant him and aspire to the Crowne, whereupon he determined to haue his Sonnes geloed. The old Emperour their mother vnderstanding certainely thereof, at last perswaded Iohn her eldest Sonne to kill his Father Nicephorus, and then hee raigned Emperour of Greece seuen yeeres after, and in the tenth and last yeere of his raigne, hee was poysoned by his wife, shee was a Romane, shee poysoned him at the very time, when shee saw he would depart from Rome: and after him succeeded Henry the second of that name, hee was the first Duke of Bauary: and then beganne a gratious and deliberate order by the Princes of Germany, for the election of Emperours to auoyd pretended right in succession, whereupon they constituted 6. Princes Electors, 3. whereof to be Ecclesiasticall, that is to say, the Archbishops of Maguntia, of Treuer, and of Collen, the other 3. are secular, that is to say, the County Palatine, the Marques of Brandenburgh, and the Duke of Saxony, into these sire was giuen power and faculty for euer to chuse the Emperor in time of vacancy, and they to be held the most puissant and mighty Princes of the Empire. Vnto these 6. Princes aforesaid was also added the King of Bohemia, by reason that if there should chance any diuision in their election, as three against three, that then the seuenth voyce would easily decide the difference by making the Maior part, and keepe concord in the election, at this constitution, it was also ordayned that the Archbishop of Maguntia, should be Chancellour of Germany, The Archbishop of Treuer should be Chancellor of Gaule, and the Archbishop of Collen should be Chancellor of Italy, and the County Palatine should be the Emperors chiefe Taster or Cupps bearer, the Marques of Brandenburgh should be Chamberlane, the Duke of Saxony should be Constable, and the King of Bohemia should be Butler. Touching the Consecration of this, and this new election of Christian Emperors, you may read at large in many Authors, but chiefely as I find it in the fifth booke of the Archdeacon, of his Distinctions. Conradus the second of that name, and the fourescore and eighth Emperour of the Romanes succeeded Henry in the yeere 1023. and in the first yeere of his raigne, was builded the City of Spire in Germany: in his time flourished Aretine the famous Italian Musitian, of whom is written that hee brought the art of singing to great perfection, and inuented the Gamoth, vt, re, my, fa, sol, la, and in the fourth yeere of the raigne of the foresaid Henry, there was so great and generall mortality throughout the world, as Sigebert testifieth in his History, that the liuing dyed suddenly as they were burying the dead.

brought all Mercia to his dominion: he expulsed the two kings, Anlafus the sonne of Sithricus, and Reginald, the sonne of Cuthbert, out of Northumberland, and subdued the Countrey to his dominion. He granted the priuiledge vnto S. Edmund, in which the limits of the Towne of Edmundsbury are contained.

On Saint Austins day, in the kings Towne named Pucklechurch, the king (whilst he would haue saued his Sewar from the hands of a wicked theefe, called Leofe) was slaine, when he had raigned 5. yeeres, and 7. moneths, and was buryed at Glastenbury.

EAldred succeeded Edmund his brother: for his sonne Edwine and Edgar were thought too young, to take on them so great a charge. He tooke on him but as Protector, but afterwards he was crowned at Kingstone.

This Eldred had the earnest fauour of the Commons, because he was a great maintainer of honesty, and also most abhorred naughty and vnruly persons: for his expertnesse in feats of armes, hee was much commended, whereby he quieted and kept in due obeysance the Northumbers and Scots, and exiled the Danes.

He placed the Bishop of Cornwall at Saint Germans, where it continued till the time of Edward next before the Conquest, in whose time it was translated to Exeeter.

Martinus Conerb. Record.

In the yeere of our Lord, 951. he committed to prison Wolstane, Archbishop of Yorke in Luthabury, because he often had beene accused to haue commanded many Citizens of Thetford to be slaine, in reuenge of the Abbot Adelme, vntruthly by them slaine: he was a yere after released, and restored to his See.

Aller.

King Eldred builded much at Abindone, gaue great Lands, and confirmed them Charters with seales of gold.

Hee raigned 9. yeeres, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church at Winchester, in the old Monastery.

EDwin succeeded his vncle Eldred in the kingdome: hee was crowned at Kingstone, of whome is left vnto honest memory, for one hapnes act by him committed in the beginning of his raigne.

In the same day of his cozonation, he suddenly withdrew himselfe from his Lords, and in the sight of certaine persons rauished his owne kinswoman, the wife of a Noble man of his Realme, and afterward slew her husband, that hee might haue the vnlawfull vse of her beauty. For which act, and for banishing Dunstane, hee became odible to his Subiects: and of the Northumbers, and people of middle England, that rose against him, was deprined, when hee had raigned 4. yeeres. He dyed and was buryed in the new Abbey of Winchester.

959. King crowned at Bathe

EDgar the peaceable brother to Edwine, was crowned at Bathe. Hee was so excellent in iustice, and sharpe in correction of vices, as well in his Magistrates, as other subiects, that neuer before his daies was vsed vnlesse felony by robbery, or extortion, bribery, or false officers:

He chastised the great negligence, couetousnes and vicious liuing of the Clergy, and brought them to a better order. Of stature hee was but little, yet of minde valiant and hardy, and very expert in Martiall policie. Dunstane was ordained Metropolitan and Primate of England, by whom, and other Wise men, the King being instructed, did in euery place oppresse euill persons, repooued rebels vnder sharpe correction, the iust and modest man beloued and cherished: Churches that had beene destroyed he repaired, casting out of Monasteries secular Priests, and gathered together companies of Monks, and of Nuns, giuing good admonition to the Pastours, whom he appointed to haue rule ouer them. He was in his gouernment discreete, ciuill, liberall, gentle, mercifull and valiant: in warres hardy, defending with warlike power, the right of his kingdome, bringing his people vnder the obedience of their gouernours, framing his Magistrates to iustice, obtaining rightfull Lawes, whereby hee enioyed a quiet kingdome, so that he needed not to prouoke them to warre, nor any warre was procured against him, but kept the bounds of his kingdome, so long as he liued, with prudence, fortitude, iustice and temperance: not onely the Princes of the Iles, being Tyrants, stood in feare of him, but also the Kings of many Nations, hearing of his wisdome and baliancy, did all honour him. He caused Widwall alias Edwall, king of Wales, to pay him, in name of tribute, three hundred Wolues yeerely (or rather their skins) which thing when he had performed for the space of three yeeres, the fourth yeere was none there to be found.

Marianus.

King Edgar prepared a Nauy (as diuers authours haue written) of three thousand and fiue hundred shippes, of the which after Castri euery yeere, one thousand two hundred hee appointed to come into the East part of the Realme: one thousand two hundred, into the West parts, and one thousand two hundred into the North parts: This number of ships being incredible, peraduenture one Author following another, the first being deceiued by mistaking the same, the rest haue erred: but Will. Thorne a Monke of S. Augustines by Canterbury, setteth downe the whole number of shippes to be 300. and this hath a more likelihood of truth. But to the matter, with the East Nauy he sayled into the West, and sending that backe, hee would saile with the West Nauy into the North, and that being sent back, with the North Nauy he would saile into the East parts; and after this sort, hee vsed to saile round about the whole Iland euery Summer, by the which doing, he prouided for the defence of his kingdome against strangers, and practised himselfe and his people in exercises of warre.

In the Winter season, and spring of the yere, he trauelled through all the parts of his Realme, diligently searching how the lawes and statutes were obserued by the Lords, and men of greatest authority, lest the poore should be oppressed by the mighty and rich men.

Thus Edgar, notwithstanding his manifold vertues before rehearsed, was reported (saith W. Malmesbury)

W. Malmesbury) to be a cruell Prince, and also giuen ouermuch to the lusts of the flesh, and for example, they say, that Edgar hearing tell, that Olgar, Earle of Deuonshire, had a daughter of passing beauty, named Alfred, hee commanded Ethelwold an Earle, and also his Secretary, to goe looke vpon her, and so to prouide, that if thee were according to the common bruited fame, shee mought be his wife. Which Ethelwold take his iourney, and found it to be true: whereupon (being himselfe taken with her loue) leauing his message from the King vndone, hee laboured to obtaine her to be his wife: and returning to the King, reported the Damosell to be such a one as pasted not the common beauty of women, and therefore not meete for so great a Paiestly as hee: So that after, when the King had set his loue vpon another, Ethelwold obtained the said Damosell in marriage, to his owne destruction: for when the fame of her passing beauty was spred throw the whole Realme, the King desiring to see her, and by deceit to deceiue the deceiuer, shewing a great countenance to the Earle, appointed a day to goe looke on the woman, which he heard so much commended.

The Earle being in great heauinesse, went before to his wife, and desired her that shee would, for the safegard of his life, disfigure her selfe with some homely apparrell, and otherwise, as the night: but the breaking promise with her wretched husband, dressed her selfe in a glasse, as curiously as shee mought, omitting nothing that mought tempt the King, and prouoke his desire: and according to her meaning it came to passe; for the King no sooner saw her, but hee was taken with her loue, and to obtaine his purpose the sooner, shewing a good countenance to the Earle, he called him to go with him to hunt in the wood of Warwell, where hee shot him throw with an arrow, into the which place, a bastard sonne of the dead Earle came, euen as the deede was done, whom the King asked, how he liked such hunting, who (as men say) made this answer, I like it well, me Lord, that liketh you: with which saying, he so appeased the Kings angrie minde, that the King neuer loued any man better then him, and made amends to the sonne for the cruell act against his father. The King tooke Lady Alfred to wife, and thee builded an house of Nunnes in the same place where her first husband Ethelwold was slaine. Warwell founded.

963. Ethelwald, Bishop of Winchester, in a great famine, solo away all the sacred Vessels of his Church for to relieue the almost starued people: saying, that there was no reason, that the senselesse Temples of God should abound in riches, and liuely Temples of the holy Ghost lacke it. Bishop of Winchester his saying.

The yeere 969. King Edgar gaue commandement to Dunstane, Archbishop of Canterbury, Ethelwold, Bishop of Winchester, and Oswold Bishop of Worcester, that expelling secular Priests out of the great Monasteries, builded throw Mercia, they should place Monks, and to that effect hee made the like Oration, as followeth. Wherefore Ouadlensis.

Because our Lord hath magnified his mercy to worke with vs: it is meete (most reuerend fathers) that with worthy workes we answer his innumerable benefits: for neyther by our owne Sword possesse wee the earth, and our owne arme hath not saued vs, but his right hand, and his holy arme; for that he hath beene pleased with vs: meete therefore it is, that wee submit both our selues and our soules to him, that hath put all things vnder our feete; and that wee diligently labour, that they, whom he hath made subiect vnto vs, may be made subiect vnto his Lawes. And truly it is my part to rule the Laity, with the Law of equity, to doe iust iudgement betwixt man and his neighbours, to punish Church-robbers, to repaire rebels, to deliuer the weake from the hands of his Stronger: the poore and needy from them that spoyle them. And it also belongeth to my care, to haue consideration to the health, quietnesse, or peace of the Ministers of the Church, the Flocke of Monkes, the companies of Virgins, and to prouide the things needfull for them. The examining of whole manners belongeth vnto you, if they liue chastly, if they behaue themselues honestly towards them which be abroad, if in diuine service they be carefull, if in teaching the people diligent, if in feeding sober, if moderate in apparrell, if in iudgement they be discrete: If you had cured these things by prudent scrutinie (by your licence I speake, O reuerend fathers) such horrible and abominable things of the Clerkes had not come to our eares. I omit to speake, that their crowne is not large, nor their rounding conuenient, but want connelle in apparell, insolence in behauiour, filthinelle in words, doe bewray the madnesse of the inward man. Furthermore, how great negligence is there in the diuines, when in the holy digits, they will scarce bouthsafe to be present: when at the holy solemnities of the diuine service, they seeme to be gathered together, to play and to laugh, rather then to sing. Oration of Edgar.

I will that which good men lament, and euill men laugh at, I will speake with sorrow (if so be it may be spoken) how they flow in banquetings, in drunkennelle, in chambering and wantonnelle, that now Clerkes houses may bee thought to be bythell houses of harlots, and an assembly of players. There is dice, there is dancing and singing, there is watching till midnight, with crying and howling. Thus the patrimony of Kings, the almes of Princes, yea, (and that is more) the price of that precious bloud is ouerthrowne. Haue our fathers therefore, for this purpole, emptied their treasures? for this intent haue the Kings elchets by withdrawing of many reuenues beene giuen? hath the kings bountifulnelle giuen lands and possessions to Chriftian Churches for this end? that Clerkes harlots should be pampered with delicious dainties, that riotous guests may bee prepared for, that Hounds and Hawkes, and such like topes may be gotten? Of this the soldiers cry out, the common people murmure, the fiddlers and scoffers sing and dance, and you regard it not; you spare it, you dissemble it?

Where

Where is the sword of Leuis, and zeale of Symeon, which killed the circumcised Sichimites, being the figure of them that defile the Church of Christ, with polluted acts, abusing Iacobs daughter as a harlot? Where is the spirit of Moses, that spared not his brothold Kinsfolke, worshipping the head of the Calfe? Where is the dagger of Phinies the Priest, who killing him that played the harlot with the Madianite, with this holy emulation pacified Gods wrath? Where is the spirit of Peter, by whose power couetousnes is detected, and simoniacall hereste condemned: Endeauour ye vnitary. O ye Priests in God: It is time to rise against them that haue broken the law of God. I haue Constantines, you haue Peters sword in your hands, let vs ioyne right hands, let vs couple sword to sword, that the Leapers may be cast out of the Church, that the hallowed place of our Lord may be purged, and the sonnes of Leuie may minister in the Church, who said to his father and mother, I know you not, and to his brethren, I am ignorant of you. God is carefully I beseech you, least it repent vs to haue done that we haue done, and to haue giuen that we haue giuen, if we shall see that not to be spent in Gods seruice, but on the vnrighteousnesse of most wicked men, through bapanished liberty. Let the reliques of holy Saints, which they scorne, and the reuerend Altars before which they rage, moue you. Let the marueilous deuotion of our ancestors moue you, whose Almes the Clearkes fury deuleth.

My great grandfathers father Ethelwolfus (as you know) gaue the tenth part of all his Lands to Churches and Abbeyes: my great grand-father Alfred of holy memory, thought not meete to spare his treasures, his patrimony, no costs, nor reuenewes that he might enrich the Church: my grandfather, the old Edward, how much he gaue into the Churches, your fatherhed is not ignorant. It becommeth you to haue in remembrance, with what guifts my Father and Vncle enriched Christs Altar. O Dunstane, father of Fathers, behold, I pray you, the eyes of my father shining on thee, from the bright coast of Heauen, heare his complaining words with a certain pitie thundering in thine eares. Thou O my father Dunstane! Thou gauest me wholesome counsell to build Abbeyes and Churches, thou wast my helper and sellow worker in all things. Thee I elected as a shepheard, father and Bishop of my soule, and képer of my manners, when did I not obey thee? What treasure did I preferre before thy counsels? What possessions despised I not, thou commanding me? If thou thoughtest meet to giue any thing to the poore, I was ready. If thou judgest any thing to be giuen to Churches, I deserred not. If thou complainedst any thing to be wanting to Monkes or Clearkes, I supplyed. Thou saidst that Almes was euerlasting, and none to be more fruitfull than that which was giuen to Abbeyes and Churches, wherewith Gods seruants may be sustained, and what remaineth may be giuen to the poore.

O precious Almes, worthy price of the soule! O wholsome remedy for our sinnes! Which from the Priests Lemman, linketh in the little skinne of a strange mouse, which adorneth her little eares, which garnisheth her small fingers, which trusseth vp her delicate body in silke and purple. Behold O Father, the fruits of mine Almes, and the effect of thy promise. What wilt thou answer to this complaint? I know, when thou doest see a theefe, thou runnest not with him, neyther hast thou put thy portion with adulterers. Thou hast rebuked, thou hast intreated, and blamed them, words are contemned, thou must come to stripes, and thou shalt not want the Kings authority. Thou hast here with thee the venerable Father Ethelwold Bysthop of Winchester. Thou hast the Reuerend Prelate of Worcester Oswald: to you I commit this businesse, that both by Bishoply censure, and kingly authority, filthy liuers may bee cast out of the Church, and they that liue in order brought in.

King Edgar, hauing restored and new founded sixty seauen Monasteries, which before his time had beene destroyed by the Danes, and other Pagans, and intending to continue that his intent till the number of fifty were accomplished, he confirmed the Monasterie of Worcester with Oswald then Bishop of Worcester, by the Kings consent, had enlarged, and made it the Cathedrall Church of that shire.

Ethelwold Bishop of Winchester, renewed the Monasterie of Elie, and Edgare confirmed his foundation, with great priuiledges, as by his Charter may appeare. Liber. Ely.

More concerning the state of the Church of England in thole dayes, may appeare by the words of Edgare in his Charter to the Abbey of Malmesbury, which are to this effect: All the Monasteries in my Realme, to the outward sight are nothing but wormeeaten, and rotten timber and bordes: and that worse is: within they are almost empty and voyde of diuine service. W. Malmesb. Church of England, the date thereof.

The Danes and all other people in England, hauing vsed the vice of great drinking. The King therefore by counsell of Dunstane, put downe many alehouses, and would suffer but one in a village or towne, except it were a great Boyough: he ordained certaine cups with pins or nailes, and made a Law, that whosoeuer dranke past that marke, at one draught, should forfeit a certaine paine. Against quaffing. Lawe against drunkards.

Alwinus Alderman, Earle of East Angle, kinsman to K. Edgar, founded the Abbey of Ramsey: King Edgar confirming the same on Christmas day, the yeere of our Lord God, 969. hundred seauentie, and foure, in the presence of all the Nobilitie. The same yeere was an Earthquake through all England. Ramsey founded. Ex chartario.

Edgar being at Chester, entred the River of Dee, he take the rule of the helme, and caused eight Kings to row him into S. Johns Church, and from thence vnto his Pallace, in token that he was Lord and King of so many Prouinces. Eight Kings rowed King Edgar.

The names of the eight Kings were, Kinoch King of the Scots, Malcoline of Cumberland, Macone King of Man, and of many Iles, Dufnall King of Demecia or Southwales, Siterth and Huwall Kings of Wales, Iames King of Florilegus. Iohn Pike. Eulegium. W. Malmesb. Alfredus Beuerlc.

of Chalgraue, and Iskill of Westmerland. King Edgar raigned xvj. yeares, and was buried at Glastenbury.

Ley his first wife Egelfleade(as some doe write) or by a religious votaris, as some other doe write, he had issue Edward surnamed the Martyr, who succeeded after his Father. Of his wife Elfrith, daughter to Ordgarus, Duke of Deuonshire, he receiued another sonne named Ethelred, and a daughter named Wolfrith.

EDward the sonne of Edgar, was crowned at Kingstone, by the hands of Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury, and Oswald Archbishop of Yorke. This man might well be compared to his Father for his modesty and gentlenesse, so that he was worthily fauoured of all men, except only of his step mother, and other of her alliance, which euer bare a grudge against him, for so much as she desired to haue the gouernance of the Realme for her owne sonne Ethelred.

The king murthered.

This Edward while he was hunting in a Forrest (by chance) lost his company, and rode in the Ile of Porbecke, where, by counsell of his Stepmother Elfrede, he was traiterously murthered as he sate on his horse, when he had raigned 3. yeares. He was buried at Warham, and after at Shaftesbury. Elphred did after that take great penance, and builded two Monasteries of Nunnes, Almesbury and Warwell: in which Warwell she after lined a solitary life, till she dyed.

Warwell and Almesbury Monasteries built.

978 W. Malmesb. Speculum hist. Ri. Cirencest.

ETheldred commonly called Unready, the sonne of king Edgar, by his second wife Elfored, was crowned at Kingstone. But because he came to the kingdome by wicked meanes, and by killing his Brother, he could neuer get the good will of the people, who had conceiued an ill opinion of him: of this arose ciuill Warres within the Realme, and often diuision and discords, as well of the Nobles, as of the common sort.

In the yere 982. a great part of the City of London was burnt, which City at this time had most building from Aldgate toward Westminster, and little or none where the heart of the Citie is now, except in diuers places was housing, that stood without order: so that many Cities as Canterbury, Yorke, and other in England, passed London in building: but after the conquest it increased, and now passeth all other.

988. Dunstane Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and was buried at Canterbury. Siricus Bishop of Saroun succeeded.

A disease not knowne in England in time past, to wit, feuers of men, with the fire, and murreine of Cattell killed many.

Asferus Bishop of Cattell and Wynne Bishop of Cicester.

In the yere 994. King Ethelred erected 2 bishops sea at Cicester.

The same yeare, Anlafe King of the Northwales, and Sweyne King of the Danes on the day of the nativity of our Lord, in yblis. Galleis came vp to London, which they attempted to breake into, and to set on fire: but they were repulsed, not without their great detriment and losse by the Citizens, whereupon they being driuen with fury, leauing London, set vpon Eastker & Kent, by the Sea coasts burnt townes, and wasted the fields, without respect of sore or age killed all, and wasted with fire and sword, all what they may not carry away. At length being pacified with a tribute of 16000. pounds departed to their Ships, and wintered at Southampton.

Bishops of Durham.

In the yere 995. A Comet appeared. The Bishoprick of Lindisfer or Holy Iland, was removed to Durham: and there Aldwine the Bishop first builded a small Oratory of wythen wands or hurdles, where y body of Cuthbert rested for a time, till a larger Church were builded.

Ulfrune Hampton.

In the yere 996. the Lady Ulfrune widow, sometime wife to Athelme Duke of Northhampton, obtained licence of King Ethelred to giue land to the Church which he had founded at Hampton in Staffordshire, whereby the said towne of Hampton take the addition of Ulfrune and so was called Ulfrunehampton.

Here followeth a briefe discourse of the latter kind of Amazones, whose beginning and ending, I haue here inserted, as a matter of worthy note.

The historie of Libussa and Valasque with her Army of Bodyces.

CRocus alias Cracus, the second Duke or Prince of Bohemya had issue, three daughters. Brela the eldest was skilfull in Philicke, and in the vertue of hearbes. Therba the second, was a cunning Enchantresse, addicted vnto spels and charmes, but Libussa was youngest, and obtained the sole gouernment, for the was of an excellent feature, wit, and eloquence well studyed in Morall Philosophy, and affected vnto vertue, and was reputed as a learned famous Sibilla. She was kind and peaceable, like to her father, and ministred iustice vnto all sorts of people very indifferently. All which notwithstanding, it hapned, that 2. chiefe Citizens fell at strife about possessions, and after Libussa had fully and equally heard the cause pleaded before her, she gaue sentence with the payer, whereat the other being vexed, and enraged became factious instantly, and stirred vp great dissention amongst all sorts of people, especially amongst the vulgar, a monster of many heades, who are neuer liable in any goodnesse, so as they with one consent beganne to despise and renounce her gouernment, and with great exclamations sayd, it was a shame for men to be gouerned and iudged by a woman, especially so ancient, noble and warlike a Nation as themselues. This turbulent newes greatly amazed & troubled Libussa, yet vpō hope so appease their vproare, & to see if the multitude would would fall perfect in their suddaine determination: she came the next day into the Market-place, where the people were assembled to know her resolution, crying with lowd voices, they would no longer be gouerned by a woman, and her womanish Councell, but forthwith they would haue a man, to be their Lord and gouernor, such a one as should goe before them to battell like hardiall Martialians, and that if perseuering the whith not agree with them in the sing such a one, then would they themselues elect such a one for their purpose. Whereby their hart perceiued, that their late new deuise was no happy change, or abated: she made a very wise, eloquent oration, and amongst other things, she said, O ye Bohemians, you all know right well, that but a this day I haue taught things followed my Fathers steps, and continued your peaceable and kinde Lady, I neuer wronged nor offended any of you, neyther oppressed you, nor tooke aught from you iniuriously, neyther hath my gouernment bin like a spiderresse, but as a gracious mother, and yet you are not pleased therewith, for the cause I make no wonder, sith therein you doe but imitate all other men who neuer rest long contented with any one thing, being euermore apt and ready to vary, and with for a merciful and iust ruler, then hauing obtained such a one, to yeld him their seruice and due obedience: and as for the power and commaund which now remaines in me, I freely and willingly resigne it into your hands, and because your whole desire is, to haue a man Prince to raigne ouer you, I am well pleased it shall be so, therefore in election of your new Prince, I onely wish you to take here this my white hazle, saddle and bridle him, and from henceforth let him be ten taro ponder plaine where he, as his owne liberty, may take which way himselfe liketh, either one way or other without guide or interruption, keeping all men aloofe from him and to follow after him a farre off, vntill you that se him stay and stand still before a man, whom you shall se to sate vpon an yron table, and that man before whom he shall so stand, him haue I chosen to be my husband and your Prince. This speech highly pleased the people, and forthwith they did as she appointed, and hauing brought the hazle into the plaine field, they freely let him take what course he would, then the hazle went ten miles in length, vnto the River Byelye, and there stood still before a Clowne called Prymislaus. When y Bohemians, as well the nobles as vulgar, saw the hazle stand still, they all raune hastily thither, and obserued the strange signes of joy which the hazle made vnto the Peasant, then they with great admiration drew neere vnto him, and said, God which hath made thee and ordayned thee to be our Prince, saue thee, and now forsake thy plough, oxen and husbandrie, and get vpon this goodly steed, and goe now along with vs, for Libussa hath chosen thee for her husband, and the Bohemians doe accept thee for their Prince. Prymislaus, perceiuing he was to goe before Libussa, prepared himselfe as if he had bin to trauell a long iourney: thereupon he tooke his yron Gomer, and turned the bottome vpwards, whereupon he laid his bread and cheese, and did eate before them, which was vnto them a cleare signe, and full satisfaction of what Libussa foretold them when she said, you shall see him eating vpon an yron Table, whom they beheld with great admirament, vntill he left eating, then they set him vpon the white horse and gaue him a arrow in his hand, and as they rode, they asked him many questions, and one was, why he brought his wooden Shoes or clampers with him, he answered he would haue them kept in the Castle of Visigrade, for a memorial vnto his posterity to suppresse their pride and cause them know from whom they were descended, least they should forget their Originall: he came to Visigrade and was received into the Citty with great honour and fauour of the people, who with great pompe presented him with the Crowne and Scepter, and was married vnto Libussa, who caused all Artificers to present their workes before him that he might giue euery faculty a proper name. Within short space after, he builded walls and bulwarkes about the City of Prague, he made many good lawes, and lined a long time very peaceably whereby the people became very rich. Libussa builded a Castle neere the River Alby wherein she was buried: after her death the Country was wholly gouerned by Prymislaus and his Counsell of men, for in the dayes of Libussa, the wisest and greatest part of the privy Councell consisted of women, but with her death the authoritie of women ceased, who vntill then did what they lusted, but were now many wayes restrained: whereupon Valasque a lustie gallant Lady of wondrous Amazonian courage, not being able to endure the sodaine alteration in gouernment and womens declination, very roserily assembled most of the chiefe women of the country, vnto whom amongst other things she said, deare Sisters we haue lost our louing kinde Lady and mistresse, she that euer kept and feed vs from the yoke and bondage of men and would neuer suffer vs to be subiect vnto their slauery, so as she and we loyntly together held the Raines of gouernment in our hands, as if we had bin Quenes, see now, Oh now se how it behoueth you to looke about, least we and our sers remaine euer oppressed by the tyranny of the Male gouernment, and we and our heires become slaues, to slaues, vnlesse by our owne proper vertue, and prouidence, we regaine the sweetnesse of our former soueraignitie, now therefore if your resolute and vndaunted spirites consort with mine, we will recouer our former happines. I as you all know, was secretary vnto Libussa, and knew all that she knew. I am not ignorant of the charmes, and spells of her Sister Therba, nor lesse instructed in the vertue of hearbs, then was her Sister Brela, and I dare affirme without bunting, that the knowledge, which these thre famous Sisters had in those artes, I alone haue obtained. If therefore for the ether freeing of our selues, and our Sers, you will now lend me your strong hands, and make me your generall, such is our true worthy and valour, that I doe and dare assure you, &

un from the highest to the lowest, you shall haue the soueraignty ouer men. Vnto this, they all instantly consented, and to each hearts, & hands, to effect their will, and to ioyne together, as is vsed in such conspiracies. About this time Prymislaus dreamed, that a Virgin gaue him blood to drinke, whereat he was much troubled and sought to shun the ensuing danger. Whereupon he assembled his chiefe Counsellors, and willed forthwith, a course to be taken, to represse the great exercise, and liberty of women, for at this time, maydes and wiues vsed to ride, run at Tilt, shote, Pike, cast Darts, vse slings, and all other exercises proper to men, a thing which Prymislaus held, altogether vnbecomming their Sore, and dangerous to his estate. At this time, not in foure hundreth yeeres after, there was no vse, nor knowledge of Guns. But his noblemen scoffed at him, and held his feare ridiculous, and would not be perswaded, that women could either haue skill, or courage, to contriue and performe any thing, preiudicial to men, and therewithall commended their actiuitie, and agilitie. But Valasque ceased neyther night, nor day, to animate the conspirators ouer whom he preuailed much, with drinkes, spells, and charmes, against the loue of men, and being assembled into an innumerable company of maried and vnmaried women, not farre from Prague, who according to her appointed time, & watchword, entred fiercely into armes, and without fauour or mercy, slew all the male kind which they could find, both father, brother, husband, and children, old, and young in fields and villages. This their first eruption was performed by night, when men were ouercome with wine and sleepe. Then they went neere Prague, & hauing put certaine squadrons to flight, which pursued them to punish them for this monstrous inhumaine act, they boldly encamped before Visigrade, wherein was Prymislaus, and besieged it, but not being able to take the Castle they withdrew into a Mountaine exceeding strong by nature, and there builded themselues a Castle, which they called Dyevizo, which is to say in their language, a place of virgins: their late impious fact, became odious to all the Country, as well for the murders they had done as fearing they would attempt the like, & come vpon them againe vnawares. Then the people offered their liues and seruice vnto Prymislaus, to giue battell vnto these new bloody Amazones, vnto whom he answered, that God warned him to the contrary, and that all those should perish, which at this time attempted any harme against those women: this he spake out of his Magicall diuination, which they neither beleeued, nor obeyed, but rashly without pause, assembled themselues, and raised a very mighty host and besieged Valasque in Dyevizo, who when shee beheld them and their great strength, remained euery way as couragious, cheerfull, and resolute, as at any time before, for it was her custome to be least afraid in most apparant danger, then she animated her company that they should not abate one iot of their setled determination, assuring them the victory was theirs already, and that this huge host of Enemies which encamped before them, was wholly for their goods, because in them consisted the greatest strength and malice of their enemies, whom she infinitly would deliuer into their hands, being assuredly possest of the conquest, wishing them not to take it for any wonder or strange matter to see men subdued by women: for the Amazones of Asia, made many Nations tributary vnto them, gaue siege and battell vnto Troy, ouerthrew Hercules and Theseus: he therefore courageous and let these pestilents suffer to proue that women want neither strength, wit, nor boldnes to attaine their desires. This, and much more she spake vnto her lustie army, which so preuailed, that with one consent, rage and violence, with strength of their Castle, and with wonderous skill and valour assailed their enemies, which lay here, and there, strange, great, and terrible were the rumors, stirres, and clamours in the battell, in the end when men were put to flight, whom the women pursued as eagerly, where few escaped, but such as had lucky horses. These new Amazones, in pursuite of their enemies got great spoiles, and many gallant horses which they conuayed into secure places; with this to ecge the women became most couragious and proud, and the men waxed as disgracefull, fearful, and desperate. The chiefe women in this battell, were Malada, Nodea, Swatacyn, Volasta, Radga, Zastana and Trista. The Queene with her owne hands slew seauen other enemies. She distributed of the spoyle vnto euery one equally according to their deserts, & vnto the foresayd seauen, there were giuen chaines and Wastelets and from this time they reputed their Queene, as a Goddesse. The Bohemians with this ouerthrow were so dismayed that they durst not at any time openly attempt to molest the Amazons and therewithall their former feare increased as well touching those women, which were in hostility against them, as the iust cause of feare, and iealousie which they had of the small number of women, which yet remained with them in their Cities, became no man held himselfe secure, eyther of mother, sister, wife, or daughter. The bloudious Amazones with vnknowne fury, forraged, robbed, spoild, & bawcked all that they could come by, appertaining to men, in which space, all the premisses notwithstanding, when they had ruinated all Villages, and open habitations, and saw they could not preuaile vpon lofty walls, and well peopled Cities, then they practised all dissembling, and treacherous practises, sometimes by sending amorous Letters vnto yong noblemen, and others of note, vnto whom they protested a hatred of their owne dissolute liues and their gouernesse, and their earnest desire in humaine right to reduce and suppresse the intollerable pride of Valasque, beseeching them to come with their friends and traine into the woods: others sent messengers and tokens, which very many of your mad brained yong men accepted and beleeued, for good sooth, being therewithall enamored of their beauties, wit, and valour, went into the Woods, where there fained loues inticed them into caues, vaults, and thickets kets hauing their ambuscadoes ready, sodainly set vpon them, and slew them: others obserued the most vsuall place where the Bohemians hunted, and there presented themselues with shew of great desire of their familiar company, inticing them into the rockes, where they perished: others in the dawning of the day caused themselues to be bound to trees as being malefactors condemned to death, or torture, who when they espied the hunters, would pittifully cry, and call vnto them for rescue, weeping, and lamenting their owne danger, with curling, and raying bitterly against Valasque, and with great groanes and sighes, intreat them to alight from their horses to vnty their bonds, which some credited, and did so as they desired. Valasque lying in ambush came forth and slew them all, because none should go back to tell newes, or discour, such was the subtilty of these women, that the Bohemians thought the Diuell to be their chiefe counsellor. These women liued most by beastes, and birds, and wilde fruit, as Acornes, Nuts, wildings, wilde honey &c. like as did the ancient Bohemians, who refused to dwell in Poland, because it was an open plaine Country, whereof it taketh the name, & chose to dwell in Bohemia, because it is full & round beset with goodly woods, groues, and thickets. And albeit these women had got the chiefe command of Bohemia, yet necessity constrained them to conuerse with men, least they should sodainely end & come to naught, whereupon for the setling of their common wealth, it was agreed that they should take Husbands according to time and season, and ordained a law, that all maiden children which should be borne of them, should be brought vp with great care and diligence, and that euery man childe which should be borne of them, should haue his right eye pluckt out, and his middle finger cut off, because comming to mans estate, he should neither draw Bow, nor manage weapon. This law for their time was as duly obserued of women, as abhorred of men, thus they afflicted the Bohemians seuen yeares together, and brought them tributary, and whosoeuer refused to yeeld them tribute, were like birdes in cages, not daring to put their heads out of their Citie gates, by meanes whereof, all villages for the most part perished and tillage ceased, and at last their fell an extreame famine which oppressed the Bohemians vnnaturally in all parts, so as they were constrained eyther to die by hunger, or to submit themselues wholly to the bondage and obedience of women. Whereupon the multitude in generall not being any way able to indure the cruelty of famine, with griefe and clamour came to the Duke manifesting their intollerable misery, and boldly accused him of basenes and cowardize, that durst not goe forth to fight with women, crying they would rather forsake him & yeeld to them their obedience, then dye of that incurable desperate disease, threatning him that he wanted courage, and that if he would not defend them they would chuse another. Prymislaus seeing himselfe dangerously beset with his enemies, and tormented by his friends with faire speeches, exhortations and perswasions, besought them, to haue patience for a few dayes and he would free them from danger of their enemies, and all other greuances, with which speech they were pacified expecting the euent.

Prymislaus who did all things by his wonted magicall obseruation, in the meane space sent Letters vnto Valasque, protesting himselfe to be innocent of whatsoeuer had bene done against them from the first to the last, and that all damages & vnkindnesses whatsoeuer, which they had any way sustained, was absolutely done by the headstrong Barons, and disordered multitude without his knowledge or consent, whose miseries by their proper merits was sufficiently falne vpon them, and that if his counsell or command might haue preuailed, they should neuer haue beene vexed or moued to warre, and that her euer (as shee well deserued) respected her as his daughter, and would doe so still without bearing her any ill or hatred for aspiring to soueraignty, for it belonged vnto her, because she was the true disciple of his wife Libussa, and sith for seauen yeares space by her courage and vertue, she had swaped ouer Bohemia, hee now seeing himselfe aged and vnapt to gouerne the Subiects, and also hauing but one Sonne left of three, who was not the chiefe of his age, no way fit to gouerne, if therefore it would please her to come to Visigrade, he would deliuer the Castle into her hands, and so should all Bohemia be at her dispose, whereof shee need not doubt or feare, hauing her chiefe power to weare the Citie, and that he held it his duty to resigne his Scepter to a woman, because from a woman he received it. This politique fained Letter, with the fawning Messenger, found great fauour with Valasque, by whose meanes her selfe and followers, were all ouerthrown by the measure of their owne practise, which they vsed vnto others. Valasque rashly without pause, sends a squadron before to possesse the Fort, who entred therein very peaceably, & the Duke feasted them in his Pallace, and whilst they fate eating and drinking, a certaine band of yong men armed, being secretly placed, rushed forth and slew them all. Then Prymislaus sent forth a very mighty host, which very speedily marched towards Dyevizo, whereof Valasque had intelligence, and of all that had happened, yet neuerthelesse she retaining still her wonted spirit, mounted vpon her little horse, crying Arme, Arme, bravely leading the rest to fight, darapued her Armies like an expert Generall, and from the first onset, all talke ceased, and blowes encreased: the Battels being ioyned, Valasque was slaine, fighting in the thickest throng of her enemies, the rest enraged seeing their Queene slaine, became more fierce, not so much in hope of victory, as for reuenge, fought wonderous valiantly, each side performed great feats of armes. This battel was extreame cruell and doubtfull, one while the one side had the better hand, and anone the other side preuailed, but in the end the greatest slaughter fell vpon the Amazones, who made retreate, hoping to returne to their Castle from whence they came, but could not hauing so eagerly pursued their beast bodies couered the field. Their enemies tooke their Castle, shut the gates, and set them all in peeces that they found therein, and from that time the raigne of women ceased, and the Bohemians were freed from womens tyranny, and remained in their former estate. This was atchieued by the young men of Bohemia. Valasca remained vnburied, and became food for Beasts and Birds, who for her high and rare perfections, deserues to be recorded amongst the Ladies of renowme. The Bohemians are a very ancient noble family, descended of the Sclauonians. The aforenamed Cracus founded the chiefe Citie in Poland, and called it Cracaw, after his owne name, which of some is called Craco, but in what yeere is diuersly set downe by sundry Authors. Pyus Secundus, Nauclerus and Sebastian Munster, indifferently accord that Prage was fortified about the yeare 935. others say in the yeare 1121. whose opinion at first I followed in my abridgment. There were eight Dukes of Bohemia heathens, Borsolyus and his wife Lunilya were the first Christian Princes of Bohemia, & were Baptized by Methodius, Archbishop of Moravia. Radislaus the 25. Duke was by consent of the Emperour Henry the fourth, at an assembly at Magontia created King of Bohemia, in the yeare of our Redemption as testifieth, Pyus Secundus, Nauclerus and Munster, 1086. Diuers other Authors of lesse credit say, about a hundred yeares after. Swatacopus was King of Moravia when Methodius was Archbishop, he was the first Christian King thereof, and was the last King of Moravia: the Bohemians, Hungarians, and Polonians did him homage, but was seppast for refusing to pay tribute to Rome, after he had long reigned triumphantly: there hath beene many auncient famous Kings of Morauia.

In the yeare 1002. King Ethelred caused all the Danes in England to be slaine vpon the day of Saint Brice. The same yeare Ulricus Spore founded a Monasterie at Burton vpon Trent. King Ethelred confirmed this foundation in these words: 1004. Indictione 2. horum testimonio suppositum quorum nomina inferius annotata cernuntur.

In the yeare 1003. Swaine King of Denmarke, with a great armie inuaded England with fire and sworde: 1004. they fought a great battell at Sherstead against Vlekettell Earle of East Anglia.

In the yeare 1005. The vnciuill Edrike of Streon, had the noble Duke Alfhelmus to a banquet at Scrobesbury, from whence he had him out to hunt, where a seruant Butcher of Shrewsbury named Goodwin Forstard, whom Edrike long before had hyred, leapt out of a place where he had laine in waite for him, and wickedly slew Alfhelmus. And within a while after, his sonnes, Wulfeagus, and Wegare, by commandement of the King Etheldred at Cotham where the Court then lay, had their eyes put out.

In the yeare 1007. King Ethelred made Edrike of Streaton, Duke of Mercia, and gaue to him his daughter Edina to wife. This Edrike the sonne of Egelricus, was but a man of low liuinged, to whom nenertheleese, his eloquent tongue had purchased riches and nobilitie: why he was of wit, eloquent of speech, and passed all men in those dayes in enuie, filthood, pride, and crueltie, he had to his brethren Brictricus, Alfricus, Beda, Agelricus, Agelwardus, Agelmarus, father to Godwine Duke of West Saxons.

In the yeare 1009. Swaine King of Denmark with the Danes, fought a great battell against Vlekettell at Reagemore.

In the yeare 1010. The Armie of Danes march through the wood called Cilltron to Oxford, which towne they burnt & destroyed. Then marching about into East Angle, spoyled that Country, burnt Thetford, Cambridge. Then they spoyled the shires of Hartford, Buckingham, and Bedford. Then they wasted Southamptonshire, Wiltshire, &c. The Danes hauing spoyled the East Angles as is afore shewed, Ailwine Bishop of Helmham, brought the body of S. Edmond from Bedrelsworth through Cassiter, ouer Stratford bridge, and so to London in at Criplegate, (a place so called of Cripples begging there) at which gate (as it is said) the body entring, miracles were wrought, as, some of the lame to goe vpright praising God. The body of King Edmund rested for the space of three yeares in the parish Church of S. Gregory, adioyning vnto the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul, from whence it was conueyed backe againe to Stapleford in Cassiter, and so to Bedrelsworth, now called Bery in Suffolke, where Bishop Ailwine builded for him a new Church.

The Danes spoile East Anglia.

In 1011. East Angle, East Saxon, Middlesex, Bedfordshire, Hertfordshire, Cambridgeshire, halfe Huntingtonshire, and Northamptonshire: and on the South side of Thames, Kent, Surrey, Sussex, Southampton, Wiltshyre, and Barkeshyre, being destroyed with sword and fire, King Ethelred required Peace with the Danes, promising to them Tipends and tribute, to the which they faigningly assented, but yet they neuer left their cruelties: at length they besieged and destroyed Canterbury, and for that the Archbishop Elfegus would not yeeld to them, he was first imprisoned there, and after conueyed to Greenewich, and there stoned to death. Christs Church is spoyled and burnt: the Monks with all other men are teathed, ix. of euery x. being put to death, the tenth suffered to liue in misery: the number of them that were left aliue, was 4. and eight thousand of the law vowde.

In the yeare 1012. they tooke tribute of 48000. pounds, & at the last, after diuers murthrowes giuen to the men of this Iland, they possessed the same, and put King Ethelred to flight, contraryning him to liue in exile among the Normans.

This Ethelred had two wiues, Elfeigina an English woman, and Emma a Norman: of the first he had two children of noble farning of Edmund, who succeeded him in the kingdome, it were nothing to our purpose to speake: of the second that was Emma sister to Richard Duke of Normandie, there were borne two sonnes, to wit, Edward and Alured. And that I doe here (contrary to that is commonly used set Edward before Alured as elder brother, I am moued thereunto by no small authority, which I haue taken out of the Pifsotagrawers of that age, out of Gemeticensis, a most diligent writer of genealogies, and one other Author, who in his commentarie written in praise of Emma the Queene, affirmeth, that Edward was the elder brother, whom I doe the better beleeue, because it is not like, that he being the things with his eyes, should mistake the matter, especially writing to the Q. who was mother to them both.

Swanus in the meane time subdued all England, and the people for fear yeelded vnto him on euery side, ouer whom most cruelly he triumphed. But not long after he departed this life at Geinsburge, and left Canutus his Sonne successour in the kingdome.

The Danes spoile East Anglia.

Ethelred hearing that Swanus was dead, leauing in Normandie with Duke Richard his Sisters sonne, Emma his wife, and the children that he had by her, returned with all speed into England with Edmund his Sonne by his first wife, being then at mans estate, and by the trustinesse of his owne men, and the ayde of the Normans, moued warre against his enemie.

Canutus finding himselfe vnable to match with him, went into Denmarke, minding to returne hither immediately againe.

This yeare 1014. speed Iohannes de temporibus, he was vulgarly called of all nations Iohn of Tynes, because he had some and noted many great Alterations of time and State, he was an Squire to Charlemayne, he liued 361. yeares, of whom you may reade in diuers Authors, but namely in the Chronicle of Martinian. And in the yeare 1015. Albertus began to be Marquis of Brandenburgh, and to seperate his Marches from the Dukedome of Bauaria.

Ethelred being, contrary to his expectation, thus restored to his kingdome, shewed great crueltie vpon the Danes that remained in England, sparing neither man nor woman, young nor old. Therefore Canutus being very desirous to reuenge the same, prepared a new army, and came into England against Ethelred with all speed he could, raging wide and sle with fire and sworde. Ethelred in the meane season, whether by sickenesse or for sorrow, died, when he had raigned thirtie and eight yeares, and was buried in the North Ile of Saint Paules Church in London.

Edmund the sonne of Ethelred by his first wife, succeeded in the kingdome, who (whether it were for the great strength of his body, or for that he alwayes died to goe in armour) was surnamed Ironside.

Ironside.

Canute in the meane time, with all his naule came vp to London, and on the South side the Thames, he caused a trench to be cast, through the which he caused all his ships to be towed or drawne into the west side of the bridge. And after with a deepe and large trench and siege they compassed the Citie round about, and so shut vp all going in or out, of all manner of persons: and after attempted to haue won it by assault, but that would not serue, the citizens made so valiant resistance, that in the end, the enemies were repulsed farre from the walls: whereupon the siege for a time being dismissed, part of the armie being left to keepe the shippes, the other part went into the West Saxonie, with such speed, that they gaue no leisure vnto King Edmund to gather his armie, notwithstanding with that small army which he had, he boldly met with them in Dorsetshyre, and ioyning battell with them at Penham, neere to Gillingham he ouercame them, and put them to flight.

A trench cast, and ships towed about the South end of London bridge.

After this, King Edmund determining manfully to giue battell vnto Canute with a greater hoste then before, met with his army at a place called Shereftane in Wiltshyre, where he in the forward fiercely fought, executing the office both of a hardy Souldier and baliant Captaine. But because Edrike of Straton, the ofe named Traytor, and the beloued Almaricus, and Algarus the sonne of Meaninus, which ought to haue ayded him with the Southamptonshyre men and Wiltshyre men, were of the Danes party, he was soze wearied, but per the first day of the battell, the fight was so extreame and bloudie, that both the armies were so wearied, they were not able longer to fight.

Edrike a traytor his example of a miserable pardoned.

The next day the King had ouerthrowne the Danes, but for Edrike of Straton, who being the Englishmen haue the better hand, he cut off the head of a certaine man named Osmerus, like to King Edmund in stature and hayre, and holding it vp, cryed out, that the Englishmen fought in vaine, and held vp the head, saying: Your maister King Edmund is dead, flie as fast as you can: which the Englishmen had no sooner heard, but they were ready to flie. But shortly after vnderstanding the King to be aliue, they take courage againe, and are carried vpon the Danes, and beate down a great number of them. After this about midnight, Canute commanded his people to depart with silence, and hasting toward London, went to their ships and shortly after besieged London. Duke Edrike sued for pardon, and obtained it.

King Edmund hasted toward London, and deliuered the Londoners from the siege, chasing the Danes to their ships.

About two dayes after, King Edmund passed ouer the Thames at Brentford, but passing the riuer many of his men were drowned. He increasing his army, hated towards the West Saxons. And the Danes against ge vp to London, but could there profit nothing: wherefore going from thence with their nauy, they enter the riuer of Arepne, and passe into Mercia, there to fetch spories, slaying all they meete, and burning Townes, and so laden with spoyle returne into their shippes. After this their footemen passe in shippes into the ryuer of Medway, but their horsemen take prayes vpon the land.

Kent wasted by the Danes.

King Edmond againe passed the Riuer of Thames at Brentford, entred Kent, and fought with the Danes at Otford, and put them to flight: and if the false Edrike had not stayed him at Eaglesford or Aclesford, he had that day gotten the full victory. To be shorte, the first and last battell was at Aclleden in Essex, neere to Rochford, here he put his armie into three battels.

All driuen in Essex.

In the meane time Canute bringing his men into order, a foure battell was fought, and many slaine on both sides. But Edrike perceiuing the Danes to giue ground, he with his power fled, as he had promised to Canute, and so King Edmund and the English armie had the worst: there was slaine in that battell, Duke Alfrike, Duke Godwine, Vlketetell Duke of East Angles, Athelwardus Duke, sonne to the Duke of East Angles, Athelwine called Godsfriend, a Duke: and almost all the companie of the English Nobilitie. Cadocth also Bishop of Lincolne, sometimes Abbot of Ramsey, and Wolsey the Abbot, which were come together with their Cleargie to pray to God for the souldiers that fought, were slaine. And Edmund went almost alone on foote to Glouester, where he gathered a new force to set vpon his enemies, but Canute pursued him as he fled. And hauing prepared their armies, both the Kings themselues attempted to fight hand to hand for the right of the kingdome in the Ile of Olania, alias Oley in Seuerne. In the which combate, they both being wearied, fell to a couenant to diuide the same, so that the one halfe of the kingdome should bee Canutus, and the other halfe vnder Edmond, which Edmund not long after died at London slaine by the treason of Edrike of Stratton, and was buried at Glastenburie, leauing Edmund and Edward his children, very young.

Combat for the kingdome.

England diuided.

1018. CAnutus the Dane, taking an occasion, because in the couenant that was concluded concerning the diuiding of the Realme, no assurance was made for the Children of Edmund, he challenged all England to himselfe alone by law as they call it, or growing to, which was a most easie thing for him to doe, because there was no man that durst erect himselfe as patron to defend the children right and title, and by this subtile and crafty interpretation of the couenant, the Dane got the Monarchie of England, and slew the brother of Edmund, and conueyed the children farre away out of England, least they should at any time bee brought againe and receiue their right. Some say, they were sent to a certaine man that was a Prince in Swethland, there to be dispatched out of the way: and that the Prince vnderstanding they were kings children, spared them, contrary to the credit and trust that was committed vnto him: which appeared to be true, in that the same forayne Lord kept and brought vppe the children honourably, the youngest of which, whose name was Edward, did afterwards marry Agatha, the daughter of Henry the fourth, Emperour of Rome, of whom he had many children, of which we shall speake hereafter. And the other, which was the elder brother, whose name was Edmund, dyed without children.

The Danes possessed all England.

The Kings children conueyed into Swethen.

Agatha the Emperours daughter, wife of Edward.

In the meane season Canutus, because he had no heyre that lawfully might succeed him in his kingdome (for Harold and Swaine were begotten of a Concubine) partly that he might establish in time to come, the kingdome that he had gotten vnto his owne kindred that came by lawfull succession; and partly that he might purchase to himselfe the friendship of the Englishmen, and of the Normans, procured to haue giuen him in marriage Emma, the widow of King Etheldred, who at that time was with Edward and Alured her sonnes in exile with duke Richard in Normandie, which marriage seemeth to be made euen by Gods prouidence, who had determined to restore the common wealth in England, whereby, as by the Law and Title of Recouery, and returne out of exile, the Monarchie of all England, which the Danes had taken from the Englishmen, and had possessed fiue and twentie yeares and more, did returne againe to the Englishmen that were the right heyres. For Emma concluded marriage with the Dane, vpon condition that the kingdome of England should remaine vnto none other but vnto the children that were begotten of her, if any of them did remaine aliue: by reason of this marriage, shortly after she did beare Canutus a sonne of his owne name, commonly called Hardycanutus.

Harold Swaine, & cubines of Eden.

Marriage made vpon condition.

This second name was giuen him because of his great courage, like as his brother Harold was named Harefoote, that is to say, Lightfoote, because of his notable swiftnesse of foote.

By this affinitie and alliance, the Danes became of the more strength and power. He kept the Englishmen in his seruice so long as he liued.

At the feast of Christmasse, King Canute being at London, commanded the traytor Edrike of Stratton to be put to death in his Palace closely for feare of tumult. Some say, he was tormented to death with firebrands and tiules: some say one way, some another, but dispatched he was: for the King feared, though his treason to be circumuented of his kingdome, as his predecessours had beene before, to wit, Ethelred and Edmund. His body he caused to be laid forth of the wall of the Citie, there to remaine vnburyed, to be scene of all men. With him also were slaine, Northman a Duke, son to Duke Leofwinus brother to Leofricus, and Athelwardus, the sonne of Duke Eglomore, and Brithricus sonne of Elfegus Prince of Denonshire: these dyed without fault (sayth mine Author.) The King made Leofrike Duke in his brothers place, and held him afterwards very deare. King Canute subdued the Scots, whereby he was King of England, Scotland, Denmarke and Norway.

After that, King Canutus went to Denmark, and so to Rome, and returned againe into England, where he kept good iustice all his life: and did many charitable deedes.

Edmundsbury founded by Canutus.

Canute founded a new the Monastery of St. Edmund at Bury, restoring to the same, the donation which Edmund King of the West Saxons had giuen to Saint Edmund the King and Martyr, who was their buriel: he displaced the secular Priests for their dissolute life, and placed there an Abbot with Monkes, he gaue to them many great limolades, and made a ditch ouerthwart Newmarket heath, it is now by some called, the Diuels ditch, to inclose the lands sometime belonging to King Edmund, and discharged the same of all tribute.

Peter de Leia. Marianus. Florilegus.

King Edward the Confessor, since that time, not onely confirmed the said liberties of Saint Edmund, but also gaue to Abbot Baldwine a Kampe, and authorized to haue an exchange of mynt, and to coyne in his Monasterie: And more to increase their franchise, gaue the Mannour of Mildenhall and the towne, with eight Hundreds to their possession (saith Iohn Lydgate) and true it is, that I finde in record, the franchise of Saint Edmundsbury, to containe these hundreds following, Blackbourne, Riselridge, Thedwardster, Babbar, Cosford, Thingo, Lackford, and Cruing halfe hundred. Thus much for the liberties of that Towne. Now Baldwine a Monke, of Saint Dyonis, phyllition to the said King Edward, being made Abbot of Bury in the space of nine and twenty yeres, erected a new Church of stone, by licence of William Conqueror, brought from Caen in Normandy, lauded at Ratlisden, and from thence brought by land to Bury: the foundation was accomplished, and the body of the Martyr, was translated out of a Chappell called Rotund, into a shrine prepared for him in the new Church of Bedrisworth or Bury, in the yere of our Lord God 1095. Thus much for Bury.

Canons in Essex.

The Church which king Canute, and Earle Tuketell builded on the hill of Assen in Esser, was dedicated with great honour, of Wolstone Archbishop of Yorke and other Bishops, the King and nobles being present.

He appointed to be king of Norway, Swanus his sonne (as was said) by Algine daughter to Athelme Duke of Northampton, and Lady Vulfrune: but other said he was a Pictes son. He also appointed his sonne Hardycanutus by Emma, to be king of Denmarke, and deceased at Shaftesburie, when he had raigned twentie yeres, and was buried in Saint Swichins at Winchester. After whose decease and buriall, Queene Emma made her abode there.

Henry of Huntington of this Canute hath as followeth: Open (saith he) doe speake of the great deedes that he did: first, that he married his daughter to the Emperour Conradus: that he went nobly to Rome, and came againe with precious guifts: that he set his feet on the Sea strond while the sea was flowing, and commanded the Sea not to rise, to wet his Lords feete or cloathes: but the Sea keeping his old course, rose, and wet both his feet and his thighes: whereupon the King started away, and said: All men shall vnderstand and know, that the power and might of Kings is vaine, and banitie: and that none is worthy to haue the name of King, but he that hath all things subiect to his commandement and lawes. And after this, this Canutus neuer bare Crowne vpon his head, but he set the same vpon the head of the Crucifixe at Winchester. Peter of Poytiers. Of Peter of Poytiers.

Pictaui, ouer Chancellor of Paris, saith, that the custome to hang vp the armour of Kings and noble men, and other in Churches, sprang of that this Canutus refused to weare his crowne, and offered the same as is shewed.

1035. HArold, for his swiftnesse called Harefoote, whom Canutus had by a Concubine Alice of Hampton, a Shomakers daughter (affirming himselfe to be sonne of Canutus, and Algina the Earle of Northamptons daughter) kept not vpon the occasion and opportunitie offered, but suing the force of the Danes that dwelt in England, inuaded the realme, while his brother Hardycanute gouerned in Denmarke.

He take from his mother in law Emma, the most part of the riches and treasure that Canutus, his father had left her, and then with consent of the great Lords began to raigne, but not so mightily as his father Canutus did, for a more iust heire Hardycanutus, was looked for, whereupon the kingdome was diuided, the North part to Harold, and the South to Hardycanute.

Edward and Alfred sonnes to king Etheldred, with many Knights, came out of Normandy, to see their mother at Winchester, which sore troubled the mindes of many great men, who bare more fauour to king Harold. Especially, Godwyne Earle of Kent, fayning to receiue Alfred as a friend, came to meete him, but in the end put him in prison, part of his company he put in fetters, and after put out their eyes. Of some he caused their skinne to be plucked ouer their eares, chopping off their hands and feete. Some he commanded to be sold, and diuers were murthered at Gilford.

Queene Emma hearing of this dealing, she sent her sonne Edward backe againe into Normandy.

After this Alfred was conueyed to the Ile of Ely, where his eyes being first plucked out, he was deliuered to the Monkes to be kept prisoner there, where shortly after he departed this life, and was buried in the South Ile of the west part of the Church. Because Hardycanutus delayed to come ouer being sent for, he was vtterly reiected, and Harold, who before was king of the Mercies and Northumbers, was chosen king of all England, who shortly after expelled his mother in law Emma out of the Realme. He raigned three yeres, payed, and was buried at Westminster, and after at S. Clements without Temple-barre at London.

1041. HArdycanutus the lawfull begotten Sonne of Canutus and Emma, as soone as he had gotten cotton his fathers kingdome, fetched home his mother out of exile: & in reuenge of displeasure that was done to her, and of the murther of his brother Alured, he commanded the carcasse of Harold to be digged out of the earth, and to be throwne into the Riuer of Thames, where by a fisher it was taken vp, and brought to the Church with-out Temple-Barre.

Wikes to be set vp-pon to be S. Clements Danes, who buried is in a Churchyard, which they had at London.

Which done, the King appointed eight marks to be payed to euery Baker in his Nauie, and twelue markes to euery Pitot or Waker, which tribute was to be payd of all England, so grieuous, that scarce any was able to beare it.

Shortly after, he sent for Edward the son of Etheldred his brother, on the mothers side to come into England, and embraced him with all loue and fauor. Being at a marriage feast pleasantly drinking with the Bride and other persons in the midst of his cups he fell sodainly downe to the ground, and so remaining dumbe, departed this life the third yeare of his raigne, and was buried by his father at Winchester.

1043. Alfredus Beu. L. Rouie.

EDward borne at Islip beside Oxford, the sonne of Etheldred, whom Hardycanutus had sent for into England, at the age of almost fortie yeares, was by the helpe of Godwine crowned at Winchester.

This Edward for his excellent holines, is vntill this day called Saint Edward, who for some as he had gotten his fathers kingdome, of his owne free will released the tribute of fortie thousand pounds called Dane gilt, which the English people, euen from the very beginning of the raigne of the Danes, was compelled to pay to their Kings euery yeare. He was also the chiefe author and cause, that the Law which we call the common Law, was first brought vp, being gathered out of the lawes and ordinances of foure nations, which were receiued when the Iland was subiect to diuers regiments and gouernances, to wit, of the Mercies, of the West Saxons, of the Danes, and of the Northumbers. He was hard to his Mother, because she was hard to him in his minoritie, and also suspected with Alwine Bishop of Winchester, whom he put into prison, by Counsell of Robert Archbishop of Canterbury: but after his Mother had purged her selfe, Alwine was deliuered, and Robert the Archbishop conueyed himselfe out of England. He tooke to wife Edgitha the Daughter of Earle Godwine, who was a Virgin most chaste, in whose breast there was a Schoole of all liberall Sciences (saith William of Malmesburie.) And for a further testimony of the said Queene, Ingulphus writeth thus: Vnto this Edward was giuen to wife, the Daughter of Earle Godwine, a very beautifull Damsell, very well instructed in learning: and for behauiour, and the rest of her life; a Virgin most chaste, and for humility most holy, named Edgitha, in no point fauouring of her fathers or brothers barbarousnes, but milde and modest, faithfull and honest, enemy or hurtfull to no body: whereupon this verse was spoken of her:

Sicut spina rosam, genuit Godwinus Editham.

I haue seene her (saith Ingulphus) often when being yet but a boy, I came to see my father dwelling in the Kings Court. And often comming from Schoole, when I met her, she would oppose me touching my learning and tellon, and falling from Grammar to Logicke, wherein she had some knowledge, would fubcilly conclude an argument with me, and by a handmaiden giue vs 2 or 3 coure pieces of money, and send me vnto the place where I should receiue some bisnuits, and so be dismissed.

Now concerning this Edward, he was borne in England as is afore shewed, but brought vp in Normandie, and continuing there a long time, was in a manner become French, bringing hither, and drawing out of Normandie, very many, whom he promoted to diuers dignities, and exalted aboue measure. Among whom chiefely was one Robert, a Monke of Gemiteence, made by him first Bishop of London, and after Archbishop of Canterbury. And William the Kings Chaplaine made Bishop of Dorchester.

Then began the whole land ouer the King, and other Normans brought in, to leaue off the English rites, and in many things to imitate the manners of the French. All the noble men tooke it to be a great point of gentrie in their Courts to speake the French tongue, to make their Charters and deeds after the manner of the French, and to be ashamed of their own custome and life, as well in this, as in many other things. But hereof more in another place.

He sent for home into England his nephew Edward the sonne of King Edmund his brother, who by reason of his long absence out of the Country, was commonly called the Outlawe. This is that Edward the Sonne of King Edmund firnamed Ironside, which remained aliue, whom Canutus when he had gotten England, had sent into Sweethen with his brother. He knowing the aduise of his Uncle, came againe into England, and brought with him Agatha his wife, & Edgar, Margaret, and Christian, his children, borne in Pannonia, in hope of the Kingdome, where he liued but a while. Thus Saint Edward being disappointed, both of his nephew and his heire, for that Edward the Outlaw was both by nearenesse of bloud, and by lawfull succession right heire vnto the kingdome, without delay pronounced Edgar the Outlawes sonne, and his great nephew, to be heire of the Kingdome, and gaue him to surname Adeling, which name in those dayes, was peculiar onely to Kings children, which were borne in hope and possibility of the Kingdome: for this word Adeling in the English tongue is as much to say, as Prince or Lord, the contrary of which word is Vnderling, that is to say, seruant or bondman: or according to the Welsh speech, Adeling signifieth heire: but because this Edgar was but young of yeeres, and within age, by his testament he made Harolde the sonne of Godwine (a stout man both in warre and peace) Regent, but till the young Edgar should be of age to receiue the kingdome, and that then he should be made King: which thing Harolde with a solemne oath promised to see so performed and done.

done. Notwithstanding, he like a Wrayter (by force of armes) immediately after the death of Edward, refused the name of Regent, and presumed himselfe king, which thing shortly after brought destruction both to himselfe, and to all England.

In the yere of our Lord one thousand foure and fiue, King Edward gathered a mighty nauy into the Hauen of Sandwich, against Magnus King of Norway, that meant to haue come into England, but through that warres that Swanus King of Denmarke moued against him, his iourney was broken off.

In the yere of our Lord one thousand foure and fiue, Leuingus Bishop of Worcester, Dorsetshire, and Cornewall deceased: and the bishopricke of Cridington and Cornewall was straight giuen to Leofrike Baron the kings Chancellour. And Alfredus a Monke of Winchester was made Bishop of Worcester.

Magnus King of Norway, came to Olaus, hauing chased Swaine King of Denmarke out of his realme, subdued that kingdome to himselfe.

In the yere 1047. Swaine king of Denmarke sent Embassadors to king Edward, requiring of him a nauy against Magnus king of Norway, but none were sent.

In the yere of our Lord 1048. Magnus being dead, Swaine recouered Denmarke, and Harold Harnager son to King Swardus of Norway, returned into Norway, and shortly after sent Embassadors vnto King Edward, offering to him peace and amitie, which he accepted and promised the like againe.

A great Earthquake chaced on the first of March: mortalitie of men and beasts followed, and lightning burnt vp Downes, and Corne in the fields, where through role such a dearth, that one horse load of wheate was sold for fiue shillings.

In the yere 1049. the Irish pirates with 36. ships entring into the mouth of Seuerne, arriued in a place called Willsreapam, and with the helpe of Griffith King of Southwales, spoyled about those Coasts, and did much mischiefe. After this the said Griffith and those Irish pyrates ioyning their powers together, passe ouer the riuer Wie, and burnt Dunneham, and slew all that they there found. Against whom Aldredus, Bishop of Worcester, and other of Gloucester and Herefordshire, hastily went, but the Welshmen whom they had in their company, sent messengers to Griffith, willing him to make speed against the English men, which he did, and slew many of them, and put the rest to flight.

In the yere 1050. Edsine Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, in whose rome the King placed Robert a Norman, late Bishop of London, a great enemie to Duke Godwine.

This yere King Edward and Edgitha his wife translated the Bishops Sea from S. Germanes at Cridington, and placed the same at Exceter: the King laying his right hand vpon the Altar of Saint Peter, instituted one Leofrike Bishop there whom the King taking by the right hand, and the Queene by the left hand, stalled him in his Bishops seate, in the presence of fiue Dukes, and many other noble men: all which King Iohn of Glastenbery confirmed, and augmented by his Charter, the first yeare of his raigne.

In the yere 1051. when the earth yelded not her fruites after the accustomed fertilenesse, but famine consumed very many inhabitants, insomuch that through dearth of corne, and want of bread, many thousands of men dyed: the good King Edward mooued with compassion ouer the poore, released for euer all England of the most grieuous tribute called Dane gilt. It is reported that the Kings clemencie was moued to compassion, vpon occasion as followeth. When his exactors, (for so were they then called) or treasurers (as we call them) had collected that grieuous tribute called Dane gilt, and brought it into the Kings Chamber, the King being called to see the heape of so great treasure, was at the first beholding thereof much afraid, protesting that he did see Diuell dancing vpon the heape of money, and making ouermuch ioy. And thereupon gaue commandement, it should be forthwith rendered againe to the former owners thereof, and of so cruell an exaction, he would not keepe one farthing, but released the said tribute for euer. Eustace Earle of Bulloigne the elder, which had to wife Goda the wife of King Edward, arriued at Douer in Kent with a few shippes, in the which towne whilst his Souldiers rashly take vp their Innes, they slew one of the townesmen, in reuenge whereof, not onely the quarreller, but other of his company, with many of the Townes were slaine, which doing, so much offended Godwine Earle of Kent, that he assembled a great power out of all his Countries of Kent, Sussex, and Westsex, and his eldest sonne Harold out of his Earledomes of Oxford, Glocester, Hereford, Somerset, and Barkeshire, and his sonne Swaine out of Eassex, East England, Huntington, and Cambridgeshires, to all which he had a great armie, wherewith he marched towards Glocester, where the king then lay, vnto whom he sent Messengers to denounce warre, except he would deliuer Eustace, and his fellow Normans & Bolonians, which held a Castle vpon the Cliffe of Douer: but king Edward when he vnderstood that the armies of Leofrike Earle of Chester, Siward Duke of Northumberland, and Ranulph Earle of Hereford were comming to his aide, he answered roughly, that he would in no wise deliuer Eustace or the other demanded. But after this, Godwins armie entring into Glocester, it was there agreed, that at a day appointed, the king and Earle Godwine should meet at London: and thus departing for the time, the King increasing his armie, led the same to London, and Godwine with his power came to Southwarke, on the other side of the Riuer Thames, into his owne house, but there because his army by little and little slipped from him, he fled, and the king forthwith pronounced him, with his fiue sons, to be banished, who straight-wayes with his wife and two of his sons came to Thoney, where his ship being laden with gold, gold, siluer, and precious things, he sayled ouer vnto Flanders: his other sonnes take ship at Yarmouth, and sayled into Ireland.

The King forsaketh his wife Quéene Edgitha, for displeasure conceiued against her father Duke Godwyne, and sent her with one maiden to Wilton, in no honourable wise, where she was committed to the custody of the Abbesse.

W. Malmesf.

William of Malmesbury addeth, that her goods being taken from her to the vttermost farthing, she was sent to Wilton there to be kept vnder the kings sister, least whilest all her parents were in sorrow for their Countrey, she alone should rest in ease: but a nameless author, that wrote a Booke intituled Vita Edwardi, which he dedicated to the same Edgitha, writeth thus. The King pretending this honest cause of diuorce, that in the Monasterie of Wilton, where she had bin brought vp, she should be, to auoid such troubles of the Realme. Thus therefore with kingly honour, and Princely company (yet sorowfull) she was brought to the bonds of the Monasterie of Wilton, where almost one whole yeere in prayers and teares she expected the day of comfort.

Vita Edwardi.

At this time the most noble Earle, or Duke of Normans, William, with a great traine came into England, to king Edward, whom the king honourably receiuing, and for a while keeping him, carried him about to his Cities, and kingly Castles, and with comely humanity shewed, at length gaue him many guifts, and dismissed him to his owne, but of the succession of the Realme, hope as yet or mention betweene them was not made.

William a Norman the kings Chaplaine, tooke vpon him the Bishoprieke of London.

Henry the fourth of that name, sonne to Henry the third, was the 90. Emperour of the Romanes. He began his raigne in the yeere of Christ 1055. he raigned fiftie yeeres, and about the three and fortie yeere of his raigne, as testifieth Helinandus the Historian, the Citie of Lubecke in Germany was founded by a Pagan Sarazen, called Cryton, and at this time for fourescore yeeres space, there was not one Church nor Christian Priest in all Sclauonia: the said Cryton with great cruelty slew all the Lords of Oloembuigh, except Henry sonne to Godescalcus, who escaped by flight into Denmarke, and after a while returned, and very manfully fought with all the new possessors of his Countrey, chiefly towards the Sea of the Sclauonians: he cut off Cryton, and so by force recobtayned due possession of his heritage from the vsurpers. This Citie Lubecke at first flourished a pace, and therefore Henry Lyon Duke of Saxonie, earnestly prayed Adolph Earle of Holst, to giue him halfe the Citie of Lubecke, which at first he absolutely refused. The cause why the Duke so earnestly desired this citie, was for that the growing of this Citie, was the decay of Paris and Fayres of other Cities: the Duke seeing he could not obtaine his request, prohibited the selling of all manner of Commodities whatsoeuer in Lubeck, victuals only excepted, and that all Marchandize should be brought to his Citie of Berdewich, where he kept his rest. Hence, and there sold. He also in contempt of Lubeck, builded a new Citie nere vnto it, but it take small effect, yet in the end, the Duke with kind intreaties and promises preuayled so farre, that Adolph gaue Henry Lyon the Ile and citie of Lubeck, and then the Duke forsoke his new Citie, and commanded Lubeck to be walled and re-edified, and erected Churches within the Citie: he made proclamation throughout Denmarke, Norway, Russia, &c. that they should all come securely to Lubecke Mart, and endowed it with many royall priuiledges and then it quickly increased. The foresaid Duke of Saxonie was a deuout Christian, he visited the Holy land, he founded two Bishoprickes besides that at Lubecke, and shewed great kindnesse vnto Earle Adolph, and his heires after his death. Gerard Dernyer, the first Bishop of Lubeck died in the yere 1154.

Emma late wife to the Kings, Ethelred and Canutus, and mother to two kings, Hardicanutus and Edward, departed this life at Winchester, on the first of March, and was there buried.

Griffith king of Wales waged a great part of Herefordshire, against whom, the men of that countrey and Normans out of the Castle, went: but Griffith obtained the victorie, sleying many of them, and tooke a great prey.

In the next yere, Harold and Leofwine Sons of Earle Godwyne, returning out of Ireland, entred Seuerns, arrived with many ships in Sommerset and Dorsetshire, spoyled many Townes in the Countrey, slew many people and returned with prey: then they sayled about Portesmouth, &c.

Earle Godwine landed in Kent, gathered a power, sayled to the Isle of Wight, wasting along the Sea coastes, till his sonnes Harold and Leofwine came with a Nauie, which being come together, they take their course by the River of Thames, came to Southwarke, and there staied for the tide, & then weped by Barkor, and finding none that offered to resist them on the bridge, they sayled vp by the south side of the riuer, and his army by land placing it selfe vpon the bankes side, made them of a thicke and terrible battaile.

After this, the Nauie turned towards the North-shore, as though it would haue compassed in the kings Nauy: but they that were with the king, and with Godwine, abhorred to fight against their owne kinsmen & countrymen, wherefore a peace was made, Godwine with his Sons were restored to all their former honor, and the Normans were banished the land. Such as had giuen the king counsell against the English, a few excepted, as Robert the Deacon and his sonne in law, Richard fitz Scroby, Alfrid the kings sewer, Anfridus surnamed Geeresset, and other whom the king before the residue loued, and had beene faithfull to him and his people, these were permitted to remaine in England. Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, Wil. Bishop of London, Wino Bishop of Lincolne, and other Normans with much adoe passed the Sea, but William Bishop of London, for his honest conuersation, being shortly called backe againe is is restored to his Bishoprieke, Osberne Pentecostle, and his fellow Hugh perlued by their Castles, & by licence of Earle Leofricus went through his Earledome into Scotland, and were receiued of Machuta king of Scots.

1053. Rese brother to Griffith King of Southwales, for the often preyes which he had taken at Wolenden, is slaine by commandement of King Edward and his head sent to the king there at Glocester.

On the second day of Pasch, Earle Godwine as he sate at meat with the king, being suddenly stricken with a grieuous sickner, he shranke downe dumbe in the seate where he sate; which his sonnes, Earle Harold, Tosti, and Girthe beholding, bare him into the kings Chamber, hoping that he should haue recouered, but when his strength failed him, on thursday following he died in miserable torment, and was buried in the old Monastery of Winchester, whose Duke dome his sonne Harold tooke vpon him, and his Earledome is giuen to Algarus, the sonne of Leofricus Earle of Chester, thus hath Furens of Worcester. Now to adde somewhat out of Vita Edwardi, Duke Godwine (saith he) and his sonnes being reconciled to the king, and the Countrey being quiet, in the second peare after, died the said Duke of happy memory, whose death was the sorow of the people, him their Father, him the nourisher of them and the kingdome, with continuall weping they bewailed: he was buried with worthy honor in the old Monastery of Winchester, giuing to the same Church, gifts, ornaments and rents of lands. Harold succeeded in his Dukedome, which was a great comfort to the whole English nation, for in vertue both of body and mind he excelled all, yea, as an other Iudas Maccabeus, and was a friend to his Country, diligently supplying his fathers place, and walking in his steps, that is to say, in patience, mercy, and affability to well willers; but to disquiet persons, theeues and robbers, with a Lions countenance he threatned his full seuerity: thus much out of the ancient monument intituled Vita Edwardi.

Touching his issue (saith William Malmesbury) Godwine in his first age had to wife the sister of Knote King of England, Denmarke, and Norway, of whom he begate a sonne, which when he was past his childs age, whilest he proudly did ride vpon an hoyse, which the king his grandfather had giuen him, the hoyse bare him into the River of Thames, where he was drowned: his mother also was slaine with a thunderbolt. After her he married another, by whom he had fiue sonnes, to wit, Harold, Swaine, Tostine, Woolnod, Girthe, and Leofwine, &c.

1054. Siward Duke of Northumberland, ouercame Macbare King of Scots, and made Malcolme the king of Cumberlands sonne, king of Scots.

Griffith King of Southwales, and Algare spoiled the Monastery of Hereford, slew the Canons and burnt the whole Citie. Duke Harold repaired, but Remelinus the Bishop re-edified it of his owne proper expences.

1057. Cito Edgar sonne to king Edmund Ironside, by procurement of his vncle king Edward came into England, out of Hungary, where he had long remained, being now sent by the Emperour honorably accompanied, together with his wife Agatha, and their issue, to wit, Edgar Adeling Margaret and Christian. King Edward was purposed to haue made this Edward his heire of his kingdome: but he died: of Edgar Adeling his sonne, ye shall heare more in the raigne of W. Conqueror. Margaret his daughter was married to Malcolme King of Scots, by whom she had issue, sixe sons and two daughters, Edgar, Alexander, Dauid, Edmund, Ethelred, and Edward, three of the which were Kings; to wit, Edgar, Alexander and Dauid: Matild their sister married Henry Beauclarke King of England, her sister Mary was married to Eustace Earle of Bolougne, of Matild, came a daughter named Matild the Empresse, mother to K. Henry the second: Mary had a daughter named Matild also, married first to the Earle of Mouritaine, and after vnto K. Stephen.

1061. King Edward founded the Colledge of S. Mary Oterie in the County of Deuon: hee gaue vnto it the Village of Dorege, being of the Cite of Rhoan. S. Mary Otery.

1064. Griffith King of Wales was killed by his owne people, his head with the head of his Ship, and his armour was sent to Earle Harold, which he straightway bringeth to king Edgard.

Without the walles of London, vpon the riuer of Thames, there was a little Monastery with a few Monks vnder an Abbot, here the king intended to make his Sepulcher, he commanded therefore, of the tenths of all his rents the worke to bee begun euen from the foundation, which happily proceeded till the same was finished: he also caused the parith Church of Saint Margaret to be new builded without the said Abbey Church, for before the said Parith Church stood within the old Abbey, in the South Ile: This Church of Saint Margaret that King Edward builded, continued till the dayes of King Edward the first, at what time the staple of wools, was at Westminster, and then the parishioners and Sea-faring men builded anew the said Church of Saint Margaret, the great Chancell excepted, which was now lately made before by the Abbot of Westm. The Quéene also hauing beene brought vp in the ancient Monastery of Nuns at Wilton, which Church was but of Wood, began there a princely worke of stone, and fervently perfitted till the same was in princely sort finished, dedicated, and indowed it with large possessions, in 1605. Westminster. T. Clifford. Vita Edwardi. Wilton.

This K. Edward of famous memory (saith mine Author) before the day of his natiuitie was elected of God, who persevering in chastitie, led all his life dedicated vnto God in true marriage, wherefore as we haue knowne proued by good and sufficient men being witnesses, God greatly glorified him in his life with wonderfull signes, amongst the which, this that followeth was one. A yong woman married, but without children, had a disease about her iawes, and vnder her cheeke, like vnto kernels, which they termed apostes and this disease so corrupted her face with filth, that she could scarce without great shame speake to any man: this woman was admonished in her sleepe to goe to King Edward, and get him to wash her face with water, and she should be whole. So the Court thee came, and the King hearing of this matter, disdained not to doe it, hauing a bason of water brought vnto him, he dipped his hand therein, and washed the womans face, and touched the diseased place, and this he did oftentimes, sometimes also signing it with the signe of the Crosse, which after he had thus washed it, the hard crust or skin was softned and dissolued, and drawing his hand by diuers of the holes, out of the kernels came little wormes, whereof they were full with corrupt matter and blood, the King still purged it with his hands to bring forth the corruption, and disdained not to suffer the stench of the disease, vntill he had brought forth all the corruption with purging: this done, hee commanded her a sufficient allowance euery day for all things necessary, vntill she had received perfect health, which was within a weeke after, and whereas shee was euer before barren, within one yeere she had a child by her husband. And although this thing seeme strange, yet the Normans said that he often did the like in his youth, when he was in Normandy.

King Edward healeth a woman of a disease in her throat, commonly called the Kings euill. Vita Edwardi. W. Malmesb.

Vlfinius Spilcorne.

Next after this mine Authors affirme, that a certain man named Vlfinius Spilcorne, the sonne of Vlmere of Nurgarshall, who wee he hewed timber in the wood of Wautheullena, laying him downe to sleepe after his sore labour, the blood and humours of his head so congealed about his eyes, that he was thereof blind, for the space of 19. yeeres, but then (as he had beene moued in his sleepe) hee went walkward, and barefooted to many churches, in euery of them to pray to God for helpe in his blindnesse, and then last of all, he came to the Court, where a long time hee stood at the entry of the Kings Chamber, an earnest suiter, till at the length the King hearing of the blindmans dreame, he said by our Lady Saint Mary, I would do much with a good will, if it would please God through me to haue mercy vpon these poore wretch; and thus being driuen to it by his seruants, he layd his hand and the water vpon the blindemans eyes, and streight way the blood dropped plentifully frō him, and being healed, he cryed with a cheerefull voyce, I see thee, O King, I see thee, O King. Thus hauing recouered his sight, hee kept the Kings Palace at Windsore a long season (for there he was healed) after King Edward was dead, & deceased, in the raigne of Willian Conqueror.

King Edward sickening on Christmas Eue, deceased on the fourth of January, and was buried at Westminster, on the day of Epiphany, when he had raigned 23. yeares fiue monethes, and odde dayes; it appeareth by a Charter, that he raigned aboue 24. yeres for the Charter beareth date in the 25. yeare of his raigne. 1066.

Aluredus Rinallensis writing the life and death of this King, reporteth him to be a man void of pride, a louer of peace, a vanquisher of Ire, a contemner of couetousnes, &c. And for example he writeth, that as King Edward on a time lay waking in his bed, it chanced that his Chamberlain or Steward taking money out of one of the Kings coffers, left the same coffer open after him, & went his wayes about the Kings businesse which thing being espied of a yong fellow that was wont to wait on the Kings table to beare away empty vessell, he came to the coffer, thinking the King had beene asleepe, and thinke a great quantity of money into his bosome and going away, laid it where he thought best, no comming againe did the like, but when he came againe the third time, and that the King knew (as was thought) that his Chamberlaine was at hand, and willing the Theefe to auoyd the danger: Thou art impotunate, said the King, if thou wilt beleeue me, take that thou hast, and get thee hence, for by Gods mother, if Hugeline come (for so was his Chamberlaines name) he will not leaue thee one penny, whereupon the yong fellow ran his way, and was neyther vttered nor pursued by the King, and behold, when the Chamberlaine came and perceiued much money to be gone through his negligence, he was in such sorow, that his sighes and other noise that he made bewrayed him, whereupon the King rising, and seeming not to know the matter, asked what he ailed to bee so troubled, which when the Chamberlaine had told what had happened, hold thy peace said the King, happily he that hath taken it hath more need then we haue of it, let him haue it, that which remaineth is enough for vs. Alured. Rinal. Vngelinus Camerarius Regis nota Creatura.

1067. The peace of our Lord be with vs.

HArold, the eldest son of Godwine, Earle of Kent, hauing obtained faith of the nobilitie, take the Crowne, and that he might in some behalfe seeme to make the young Begar amends for the wrong he had done him, gaue him the earledome of Orford, and so from a Babe made him an Earle. But in the meane season England began to be tossed and tumoiled with warres within and without: for the disheriting of the right heyre is alwaies wont to be the beginning of ciuill warres.

The twenty foure day of Aprill, a Comet appeared, not onely to the people of this land, but also in other parts of the world 7. dayes. Tostus enuying (as men said) the prosperity of his brother, stirred vp troubles in the Realme

William Conquerour cousin to King Edward by the mothers side.

William duke of Normandy arriued at Pemsey in Sussex.

Battles of Pemsey, and Hastings fought.

Realme, for hee ioyning himselfe to Harold the King of Norway, assaulted England in warlike sort, both by Sea and land. Whose attempt whiles Harold of England prepared to withstand, William Duke of Normandy, who notwithstanding he was a bastard, was of kin to Saint Edward in the third & fourth degree of consanguinitie, seeing a conuenient time and occasion offered to take the kingdome in, gathered a Nauy of eight hundred ninetie and fiue ships, and came into England with a very well appointed army, alledging, that by all right and title it was due to him, by the gift of King Edward his kinsman, and also by the couenant that was made, and by oath established betwixt Harold and him. He landed at Pemsey, neere vnto Hastings in Sussex, on the twenty eight day of September, where in going out of the Ship, the Dukes foote slipped, but he recouered it well enough, and one of the soldiers that were next him, cried vnto him, and said; Oh Duke thou hast gotten England, and thou shalt bee King: hee fortified there a peece of ground, and intrenched it, leauing there a competent number of his men to keepe the same, went then to Hastings, where he built another fortresse, notwithstanding he restrained all his Hoste from rouing, and by the space of fiftene daies, he kept himselfe so quietly, that a man would haue thought he had meant nothing lesse then to haue warre.

Harold, notwithstanding he was bare of men by reason of the battel that he had fought against Tostus and the men of Norway, yet hearing of Williams comming, rose to blody dyuining him forward headlong. Notwithstanding he sent out before, them that should spye and view the number and force of the enemies, which when they were perceiued to be among the Dukes tents, Duke William caused them to be led about the tents, and then made them good cheare, commanding them to bee sent home to their Lord safe without harme. When they were returned againe, Harold asked them what tydings they brought, and they with long commendation extolled the clemencie of the Duke, and in good sadnesse declared that all the host almost did seeme to be priests, because they had all their face and both their lips shauen. For the Englishmen did leaue their vpper lips vnshaven, with the haire growing alwayes, which thing also Iulius Cæsar in his commentaries declareth to be an heathen fashion of the old Brytaines.

The King laughing at their folly, said, they bee no Priests, but men of warre, valiant in armes, and stout in courage. Girthe his brother tooke the word out of his mouth, and said, forasmuch as the Normans bee of such great force, me thinketh it were not wisely done of you to ioyne battell with them, you cannot deny but with or against your will, you made vnto him an oath, wherefore you should doe more wisely, if you keepe you out of this present necessitie and strait, and doe but only leopard vs, and let vs abide the danger to make a shew of battaile, we which neuer sware to him may iustly draw our weapons in defence of our Country, you may iustly assist, and restore vs if we die, and you may auenge our death, if we be slaine. But such was the hardinesse of Harold, that he would giue no good care vnto his counsell, because he thought it shame and reproach to turne his backe vnto any danger whatsoeuer, and with the same vnaduisednes, he drawe away a shonke that was Duke Williams Ambassador, onely bre wished that God would be iudge betwixt Duke William and him.

The Monke brought these offers to wit, that either Harold should vpon certaine conditions giue ouer the kingdome, or to be King vnder Duke William, or else that in the sight of both the armies, they two should trye the matter with the swoord betwixt them; for Duke William chalenged the kingdome (as he said) because King Edward by the counsell of Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, of Earle Godwine, and Earle Swardus, had giuen it vnto him, (a thing vnlike to be true) if Harold would denie this, he offered to stand to the iudgment of the sea Apostolike.

Of which message the Ambassadour had none other answere giuen then I told you, whereupon he departed, and incouraged the hearts of his countrymen to battell.

Then the stout Captaines on both sides set in order their battels, according to the fashion of their countries. The Englishmen (as was reported) when they had spent the whole night in dauncing, singing and daunsing, not sleeping one winke, in the morning, hauing their Masse said vpon their enemies, all to prayer. Englishmen more giuen to the footemen with their poleaxes being intrenched with their targets before them, made a rampe that nothing could enter vpon them, which thing without doubt should haue beene for their safeguard, if the Normans had not fained as though they would haue fled, and by that meanes caused them to breake the array wherein they had set themselues. The King himselfe stood afoote by the Standard, and his brethren Girthe and Leowine with him, to the end that in such a common perill and ieopardy, no man should once thinke to flie or run away. Duke William after hee had got the victory, sent this Standert to the Pope, which was made after the shape and fashion of a man fighting, wrought by sumptuous art with gold and precious stones: on the other side the Normans gaue themselues to acknowledging their sinnes, and to prayer all the night, & in the morning they communicated the Lords body. The footemen with their bowes and arrowes defended the first front, and the Horsemen were set in the rereward diuided into two wings: Duke William then with a lowd voyce, declaring vnto them, that God would be with them, because his quarrell was iust and good, called for his ar-

Standert of King Harold.

...mos into battle, and through the tumult and ...fusion of armes, if his seruant, he put his coat of armes on the wrong way, to wit, the backe part before, at which chance he laughed, and turning the right side outwards, said, the ...ing Sueedome shall be turned into a kingdome. Then they began to sing the song of Rowland, to the intent that the example of that man of armes should inflame them that should fight: then after they had called to God for aide, they began the battell, fought fiercelie, neither of both parts giuing place till the day was far spent, which thing when the Duke William did perceiue, hee gaue his men counsell to make as though they would flie, and to withdraw themselues out of the fielde, by which deuice the ranke of the Englishmen was broken, and whiles they meant to smite their enimies on the backes, the Normans turned themselues in good order, and set vpon the Englishmen, being dispersed and out of array, and so put them to flight. Thus the Englishmen, died a faire death in defence of their country, and yet they were not slacke in reuenging of themselues, for they stood hard to it, and made great slaughter of them that pursued them, for hauing gotten a hill, they ouerthrew the Normans into the valley, as they courageously did clime to attaine the said hill, and with their darts which they threw, and stones which they cast vpon the Normans that were vnder them, with small labour beat them all into the bottome. Also the Englishmen with a speare, and to them well vnderstood passage running through a certaine ditch, did ouerthrow so many of their enemies following them, that with the dead bodies they made the Valley euen, with the higher ground: thus it continued all the whole day, one while the English, another while the enemies had the better, so long as Harold was aliue, but in the closing of the euening, when he by the shot of an arrow (which pierced his braine) was killed, the Englishmen fled away in the night season: one of the souldiers when Harold was slaine, did cut him in the leg with a sword, for the which deed Duke William blaming him for his cowardlines and shamefull act, put him out of the wars. Also Duke William whilst he shewed his fiercenes in euery place, three of his best hoples were slaine vnder him that day, the power of God so defending him, that the enemy did draw no blood of his bodie, notwithstanding the number of the darts throwne at him. The two brethren of King Harold, to wit, Girthe and Leofwine were there slaine, with almost all the Nobles of England, and the Normans had the victory, especially (saith Roule) by meanes of their warden bowes and arrowes, (which the Englishmen had not then in vse) for Duke William commanded his men that some of them should shoote directly forward, and other some vpward, by reason whereof, the arrowes shot vpward, destroyed the Englishmen as they flowned, and the arrowes shot directly aforehand, wounded them that stood vpright.

And king Harold himselfe (valiantly fighting) as afore is said, was the throughout y braines whereof he died, when he had raigned nine moneths and odde daies. This battell was fought nine miles from Hastings in Southsex vpon the fourteenth day of October being Sunday, in the yeare of Christ 1066. There was slaine of Englishmen 67974. saith I. de Taller in his history of Normandy, or 47944. after other. And of the Normans 6013. besides such as were disclosed.

This was (saith Matthew Paris) the dole full destruction of this sweet and pleasant land the Kings whereof (meaning the Saxons) at their first comming, with barbarous countenance and gesture in warlike sort prouoked all men to malice and hatred towards them, who ouercame al men by warre and subtilty: but after they had received the Christi faith, and by little and little applyed their diligence vnto Religion, they neglected the exercise of armour, for the Kings did change their habite, and some at Royne, & some in their owne Countrey sought to change their temporall kingdomes, for euerlasting kingdomes: and many which al their lifetime embraced worldly things, did yet distribute their treasures vnto all y works of mercy: but afterwards when charitie waxed cold, all the study and trauaile in religion slacked, and then came the destruction of the inhabitants: first at the comming of the Danes: and now in the expulsing of the Englishmen by the Normans: for the Noble men giuing themselues to gluttony and lechery, did not goe to the Church in the morning, as Christian men vse to doe, but lying in their Chamber dallying with women, did heare the Priest hastily rattell vp Diuine seruice. The Clarkes also that had taken orders if one had learned but his Grammer, euery one wondred at him, the Monkes made a mocking of their rule, and were both finely apparelled & meetly well fed. The common people were brought to be a pray to the mightier sort, so that either their goods were fouked from them or else what was worse, their bodies were sent into farre Countries, to increase the riches of y great men that oppressed them: many when they had fulfilled their lust, and had got their maides with child, they sent them out to bee common harlots; all men in generall gaue themselues to drinking and gulling, & in that kind of exercise they continued sometime night and day. These vices made the Englishmen effeminate, and womanish, whereof it came to passe, that running headlong against Duke Will. they left themselues and their country, with ease, and that an easie and light battell.

To conclude, the Englishmen were then apparelled in garments to the mid knee, their haire rounded, & their beards shauen, all saue their vpper lip, their armes adorned with golden bracelets, and their skin marked, painted, and pointed, at meat they forced themselues to surfet, and drunke till they vomited, these lasse qualities they dealed to them that ouercame them, but I would not (saith mine author) you should thinke I speake these euils of all Englishmen, for I know that many of the Clergie, did simply obserue y parts of holines and also of the lay people, that did endeuor to serue God, &c.

When Duke William had gotten the full victory, he caused his men that were slaine to bee buried, and also gaue leaue that if anie man would they might bury their enemies in like manner, he gaue the body of Harold vnto Haroldes mother, at her request, taking no money, although by messengers she offered much, thus the receiuing his bodie, buried the same at Waltham in Essex, in a Colledge which he himselfe had founded to the honour of GOD and Saint Crosse, and had placed there a Deane and 13. Canons.

The death of Harold being knowne, Edwine and Morcare, two brethren of great rewardnesse, Caries, the one of Mercia, the other of Northumberland, which with their people had withdrawne themselues from the battell, came now to London: and sending the Quéene Egitha, the late Kings sister vnto the City of Chester, they solicited the citizens to erect either of them to the kingdome, which enterprise of theirs being frustrated, they departed into Northumberland, supposing that Duke William would neuer haue come thither. The rest of the Nobles with the Citizens of London, would haue erected Edgar the Nephew of Edmond Ironside to the kingdome, and promised with him to giue a new battell to Duke William, but through the danger that was at hand, and the discord that was among themselues, they did neither. So that the Englishmen if they had agreed together, might haue reformed the decay of their Countrey, but whilst they would haue none of their owne Countrymen to be King, they brought in a stranger. In this meane time Duke William determining to goe to London, turned forth of the right way, ouer the West Coasts of England, walking and destroying through Sussex, Kent, Surrey, Hampshire, and Barkeshire, till he came to Warringford, or Wallingford, from thence he passed ouer the riuer of Thames, commanding his Armie to settle themselues there for a while, from thence he passed through Oxfordshire, Buckinghamshire, and Hartfordshire, not ceasing to burne Townes, and slay the people till he came to Bercham, or Berkehamsted, where staying for a time (for cause as shall be shewed) thither came to him Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, Wilfre Bishop of Hereford, Cito Edgare, and all other the Noblemen about London, with many other, who altogether submitted themselues giuing pledges, and sware fealtie vnto him, with whom also hee made a league, but notwithstanding he permitted his men still to burne Townes, and to take spoiles.

Apparitions.

The cause that Duke William stayed at Berkehamsted, was this, there was at that time an Abbot of Saint Albones named Frederike who when he heard of Duke William his comming into Hartfordshire, he caused the Woods belonging to his Church round about Saint Albanes, and so in the wayes towards London to be felled, so that no man could passe y way for the trées that were laid crosse one ouer another, and thus this Abbot for the time, kept his Monasterie from spoiling, for Duke William could not come there but was forced to coast about, to the Castle of Berkehamsted (as is aforesaid) whither vnder surety he sent for Frederike the Abbot, and demanded of him, why such felling of woods was made about him more then in other places: whereunto Frederike answered, and said, I haue done but as becommeth mee, for if the Spirituall persons throughout this land had done their endeauour against thee as they mought and ought to haue done, it should not haue beene in thy power to haue entred y land so farre: quoth Duke William, is the spiritualtie of England of such power? If I may liue and enioy that which I haue gotten, I will make their power lesse, and especially I mind to begin with thee. The Abbot perceiuing he had said too farre, as soone as he could departed home to his Monasterie, where calling a chapter of his brethren, he told them of Duke William what he had said, and then taking his leaue of them, departed, and went to the Ile of Ely from whence he neuer returned to his Abbey.

Lib. S. Albani. Abbot of S. Albanes his policie against Duke William.

When Christmas approached, Duke William marched with all his army towards London, whose scouts comming together before him to see the manner and behauior of the people, found them assembled in the streets, determining to resist Duke William, with all their might; but when the Duke came thither, he made a great slaughter of the Citizens, till perceiuing the selues not able to resist him they submitted themselues, & gaue pledges vnto him.

And thus ended the raigne of the Saxons, who were first sent for by Vortiger King of y Britaines, as is aforesaid, about the yeare of our Lord foure hundred and fiftie, and had continued sometimes in warres with the Britaines, then with the Danes, and now with the Normans the space of 600. yeares.

Verses of the Blazing Starre, which appeared on the 24. of April last before passed, as is shewed,

A thousand sixe and sixty yeere, it was, as we doe read, when that a Comet did appeare, and Englishmen lay dead.
Of Normandie Duke William then, to England-ward did sayle, who conquered Harold with his men, and brought this land to baile.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King WILLIAM the Conquerour.

WILLIAM Duke of Normandy, surnamed Conquerour, Bastard Sonne of Robert the 6. Duke of that Duchy, and cosingerman vnto K. Edward on the mothers side, hauing slaine king Harold, and obtained the victory in the battell neere vnto Hastings in Sussex, on the 14. day of October being Saturday, in the yeare of our Lord 1066. And also now hauing obtained ỹ Citie of London (as is aforesaid) was there both by the Normans and Englishmen chosen and proclaimed king on Christmas day, which that yeare fell on the Monday, and forthwith the same day crowned not by Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury, and Primate of all England, who refused (as some said) to crowne him, for that by blood and cruelties he had obtained the kingdome: but other affirme, that Willam would not take the crown at his hands, because he was chalenged of Pope Alexander, not to haue received the Pall Canonically, Robert a Norman, sometime frō London by K. Edward translated to be Archbishop of Canterbury, as then liuing: wherfore Elred Archbishop of Yorke, associating vnto him Walter Bishop of Worcester, and Walter Bishop of Hereford, with others of the Nobility of England, annointed and crowned him king at Westminster: but before he was consecrated the Archbishop required an oth, which he took on the Altar of S. Peter, where he promised before the Cleargie, and all the people, to defend the holy Church of God, the Pastors thereof, and all the people subiect vnto him, he should iustly gouerne, he should ordaine good Lawes, and obserue true iustice, and to the vttermost of his power to withstand all rapines and false iudgements.

This William was of a good stature, proud of heart, very coste, and big bodied, with a cruell countenance and a bald forehead, his beard alwayes shauen, for so was the custome of the Normans, he had great strength in his armes, so that many did wonder at him, because no man could draw his bow, which he would bend sitting on his horse back, stretching out the string with his foote: he made great ⁊ costly feasts vpon high and principall dayes, keeping his Christmas offering at Gloucester, his Easter offering at Winchester, ⁊ his Whitson offering at Westminster, in each place being crowned, and thus he vsed euery yeare so long as he continued in England. He called all his Nobles of what estate soeuer they were to come to those feasts, to the end, that the Embassadors of forreine countries might wonder at the sight of such a multitude of people ⁊ preparation of delicate, and dainty fare, and hee was at no time more courteous, or ready to grant pardon to any that had offended, then at such times: onely couetousnesse of money was the thing, whereof he mought worthily be blamed.

King William tooke his iourny towards ỹ Castle of Douer, to subdue that, and the countie of Kent: which when the Archbishop Stigand, and Egelsine the Abbot of S. Augustines (being as it were the chiefest Lords and gouernors of all Kent) did perceiue and consider, that the whole realme was in an euill state, ⁊ that wheras in this realme of England before the comming of the foresaid Duke William, there were no bondmen, now all, as well noblemen, as the common people, were without respect made subiect to the perpetuall bondage of the Normans, taking an occasion by the perill and danger that their neighbours were in, to prouide for the safegard of themselues ⁊ their country, they caused to assemble at Canterbury, all the people of the county of Kent, and declared to them the perils and dangers imminent, the miserie that their neighbours were come into, the pride and insolencie of the Normans, and the hardnes of the griefe of bondage and seruile state: wherevpon all the people rather chusing to end their infortunate life, then to submit themselues to an vnaccustomed yoake of seruitude and bondage, with a common consent determined to meet Duke William, and to fight with him for the lawes of their Country. And the foresaid Stigand the Archbishop, and the Abbot Egelsine, chusing rather to dye in battell, then to see their nation in so euill an estate, being incouraged by the examples of the holy Macchabees, became captaines of the armie.

nie. And at a day appointed all the people met at Swanescombe, 3 miles west from Gauelend, and being hidden in the woods, lay priuily in wait for the coming of the foresaid Duke William. And because it cannot hurt to be very warie in such cases, they agreed before hand, that when the Duke was come, and the passages on euery side stopped, to the end he should no way be able to escape, euery one of them, as well horsemen as footmen, should beare boughes in their hands. The next day after, when the Duke was come into the fields and territories neare vnto Swanescombe, and saw all the country set ⁊ placed round about him, as it had bin a stirring and mouing wood, and that with a meane pace they approached and drew neere vnto him, with great discomfiture of minde he wondered at that sight. And assone as the Captaines of the Kentishmen saw that Duke William was inclosed in the middest of their army, they caused the Trumpets to bee sounded, their banners to be displayed, ⁊ threw downe their boughes, and vp their bowes bent, their swords drawne, and their speares and other kind of weapons stretched forth, they shewed themselues ready to fight: Duke William and they that were with him (stood as no marualle it was) sore astonied and amazed, and he which thought that he had already all England fast in his fist, did now despaire of his owne life. Therefore in the behalfe of the Kentish men were sent vnto Duke William, the Archbishop Stigand, and Egelsine Abbot of Saint Augustines, who told him their message in this sort.

My Lord Duke, behold the people of Kent commeth forth to meet you ⁊ to receiue you as their liege L. requiring at your hāds ỹ things which pertaine to peace, ⁊ that vnder this condition, that all the people of Kent may enioy for euer their ancient liberties, and may for euermore vse the lawes and customes of their Country, otherwise they are readie presently to bid battell to you, & them that bee with you, and are minded rather to die here altogether, then to depart from the lawes ⁊ customes of their Countrey, and to submit themselues vnto bondage, whereof as yet they neuer had experience. The Duke seeing himself to be driuen into such a straite and narrow pinch, consulted a while with them that came with him, prudently considering, that if he should take any repulse or displeasure at the hands of this people, which be the key of England, all that euer he had done before, should be vndone againe, and of no effect, ⁊ all his hope and safety should stand in danger and ieopardy: not so willingly as wisely he graūted the people of Kent their request. So when the couenant was established and pledges giuen on both sides, the Kentishmen being ioyfull, conducted the Normans (who also were glad) vnto Rochester, and yeelded vp to the Duke, the Earledome of Kent, and the noble Castle of Douer. Thus the ancient liberties of England, and the lawes and customes of the Countrie, which before the comming of Duke William out of Normandy, were equally kept throughout all England, do (through this industrie and earnest trauell of the Archbishop Stigand and Egelsine Abbot of Saint Augustines) remaine inuiolably obserued vntill this day, only in the county of Kent.

The ancient liberties and lawes remaine in Kent onely.

Thus farre Thomas Spot, after him William Thorne.

King William brought the Iewes from Rhoane to inhabite here: he received homage, oath of fidelitie, and pledges of the Nobles, and commanded that in euery towne and village a Bell should be rung euery night at eight of the clocke, and that all people should thē put foorth their fire and candle and goe to bed, which order was obserued through this realme, during his raigne, and the raigne of William his son. Thus were the Englishmen forced to imitate the Normans in habit of apparell, shauing off their beards, fewtre at the Table, and in all other outward gestures.

Iewes brought into England.

Fire and light appointed to be put out euery night.

The Historiographers of that time accounted ỹ yere to begin at Christmas, after which account then began the yeare 1067. but after the accompt of England now obserued, ỹ yere beginneth not till the 25. of March following.

And now because those houses may not be vnremembred, vnto whom King W. bestowed ỹ lands and possessions of this realme for their good seruice, I haue thought good to publish ỹ names of them as heretofore I haue done, out of the Chronicles of Normandy, gathered by William Tayleur of Rhoane.

To wit, Odo Bishop of Bayon: Robert Earle of Mortaigne: These two were brethren to Duke William by his mother: Bandonni de Buillon: Roger Earle of Beamont, that was surnamed with the Beard, of him came the linage of Meleat.

Yuoire.

This yeare through the great ſute and labour of William the Norman, then Biſhop of London, King William granted the Charter and liberties to the ſame William Biſhop, and Godfrey Portgreue and all the Bourgies of the Citie of London, in as large ſorme as they inioyed the ſame, in the time of Saint Edward before the Conqueſt: In reward wherof, the Citizens

Citizens haue fired on his graue, being in the middeſt of the great Weſt Ile of Saint Pauls Church in London, this Epitaph following.

Reddita libertas duce te, donataque multis,
Te duce, res fuerat publica muneribus.
Dinitias, genus, & formam breuis opprimat hora,
Hæc tua ſed pietas, & benefacta manent.

Gvilielmo viro ſapientia & vita ſanctitate claro qui primum diuo Edwardo regi & Confeſſori familiaris, nuper in Epiſcopum Londinenſem, electus, nec multò poſt apud inuictiſſimum principem Guilelmum Anglia regem eius nominis primum, ob prudentiam fidemque ſingularem in conſilium adhibitus, ampliſſima huic vrbi celeberrima priuilegia ab eodem impetrauit: Senatus populuſque Londinenſis bene merenti poſuit. Sedit Epiſcopus Annos 20. Deceſſit anno à Chriſto nato 1070.

Hæc tibi, clare pater, poſuerunt marmora cines,
Præmia non meritis æquiparanda tuis:
Namque ſibi populus, te Londonienſis amicum,
Senſit, & hu[illegible] vrbi non lene præſidium.

To William a man famous in wiſedome and holineſſe of life, who firſt with Saint Edward the king and Confeſſour being familiar, of late preferred to be Biſhop of London, and not long after for his prudencie and ſincere fidelity, admitted to be of Counſell with the moſt victorious Prince William King of England, of that name the firſt, who obtained of the ſame great and large priuiledges, to this famous Citie: The Senate and Citizens of London to him hauing well deſerued, haue made this. He continued Biſhop twenty yeares, and died in the yeare after Chriſt his natiuitie, 1070. This ſeemeth by Engliſh.

These Marble monuments to thee thy Citizens aſſigne, Rewards (O Father) farre vnfit to thoſe deſerts of thine.
Thee vnto them a faithfull friend, thy London people found,
And to this towne, of no ſmall weight, a Kay both ſure and ſound.
Their liberties reſtor'd to them, by meanes of thee haue beene,
Their publike weale by meanes of thee, large guifts haue felt and ſeene:
Thy riches, ſtocke, and beauty braue, one houre hath them ſuppreſt,
Yet theſe thy vertues and good deeds, with vs for euer reſt.

King William (leauing his brother Odo Biſhop of Bayon, and William Fitz Osberne whom he had made Earle of Hereford, to be wardens of England, returned into Normandie, which at that time was bent to thinke from him. He toke with him, Edgar Etheling, Stigand Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Frederike Abbot of Saint Albones, Egelnothus Abbot of Glaſtenbury, Edwine Duke of Mercia, Morcare Duke of Northumberland, Walden Earle of Northampton and Huntington, Robert Earle of Hertford, Renulph Earle of Cambridge, Gospatrike Earle of Cumberland, Gualter the Sonne of Siward, and many other Nobles of England, thinking they would be truer to him in a forreine Country then in their owne: by their diligence he induced the rebelling Normans. Yeodigna[illegible] the King of Scots marr[illegible] to Margaret. Siſter to Edgar. Caſtles at Nottingham and Yorke builded.

When winter was at hand, king William returned, and ſet an importable tribute on the Engliſh men.

William Conqueror gaue to Geffrey Magnaule, the Earledome of Eſſex, to the which Earledome, of ancient right belonged bearing of the Kings ſtandart, ſaith the Chronicle of VValtham.

After this, going into Deuonſhire, he beſieged Exceſter, which the citizens and other Engliſhmen held againſt him. The Counteſſe Githa mother of king Harold, and ſiſter to Swanus king of Denmarke, with many other fleing out of the Citie eſcaped, and got them ouer into Flaunders, and the citizens yelded to the king.

Mathild wife to king VVilliam, came forth of Normandie, and on Whitſonday, was conſecrated Queene by Aldred Archbiſhop of Yorke. Marleſwine, Gospatrike, and other Noble men of Northumberland, to auoyde king Williams rough and boyſterous dealing, and fearing to be put in ward, taking with them Edgar Etheling with his mother Agatha, and his ſiſters, Margaret and Chriſtian, went by Sea into Scotland, where they were receiued and well entertained of Malcolme king of Scots, who toke Margaret the ſiſter of Edgar to wife. King VVilliam with an army went to Nottingham, and there builded a Caſtle. He alſo went to Yorke, and there cauſed two Caſtles to be builded, and put in them garriſons: he commanded alſo Caſtles to bee made at Lincolne, and in other places. Whiles theſe things were in doing, Godwine and Edmond ſurnamed the Great, ſons to king Harolde, returning forth of Ireland, landed in Sommerſetſhire, where Edmothus that was maiſter of the horſe to king Harolde, met them with a great army, and fighting with them was ſlaine amongſt many other. The two brethren hauing got the victory, toke many great preyes in Cornewall and Deuonſhire, and returned into Ireland.

It was the practiſe of king VVilliam to put the Engliſhmen into all places of danger, by that meanes to weaken their force: for againſt certaine Engliſhmen, that after the battell at Haſtings, fled into Denmarke and Ireland, and came againe the third yeare after, with a great power, he ſet an Engliſh Captaine with an hoſte of Engliſhmen, ſo both the armies fought, and brought the victory to the king: the ſtrangers were chaſed into Ireland, but with great ſlaughter of themſelues, and loſſe of their Captaine Edmothus, a man excellent in the time of the Engliſhmen, both at home in his owne Country, and alſo abroad. He was the Father of Harding, who lined in the time of king Henry the ſecond. Thus when the power of the lay peo- Harding the ſonne of Edmothus.

...ished, that no Clarke of the English nation, should be suffered to come to any preferment. He abhorred both the gentlenesse of Edward which sometime had been King of England, for that he restored them, whom he had ouercome, vnto all their promotions and honours: whereby it came to passe, that when he was dead, the inhabitants did easily expulse the strangers, and challenge their old right, and title.

Leofrike. But King William deposed them, distributed the Earledomes, Baronies, Bishoprickes and dignities to his Normans: onely Hereward aforementioned in the yeare of our L. 1070, 1062. had rewarded with a prosperous end. For being in Flanders, and hearing, that the Realme was subdued by strangers, and that his Fathers inheritance (his father Leofrike being dead) was given to a Norman, and that his Mother a widow was much troubled and vnquied, commeth with speed into England with his wife Thurfride, and gathering together a company of his kindred, chased them out of his Fathers inheritance. Then goeth to his vncle by the Fathers side, then Abbot of Peterborough, and first making confession of his sinnes, and absolution receiued, watcheth all night in the Church, in prayers and talking, and the next day offered his sword vpon the Altar: and after the Gospell, the Abbot put the same hallowed sword about Herewards necke, with a benediction, and communicating the holy mysteries of Christ, from thenceforth remained a lawfull souldier of knight.

Hereward made knight.

This custome of consecration of a Souldier, the Normans abhorred: and not onely this in Rome, but many other they did alter and change: for the Englishmen making deeds and Charters, which to the time of King Edward had beene firme, by the subscriptions of the faithfull with Crosses of Gold, and other holy seales, the Normans did condemne those Charters and Deeds, and appointed them to make their Charters and Deeds firme, with a pinne set vpon wax, by the speciall Seale of euery one, vnder three or foure witnesses.

Charters made.

At the first, many Farmes and Mannors were given by bare words, without writing: onely with the sword of the Lord, or his head-peece, with a horne, or standing goblet: and many tenements, with a quill, with a hose combe, a bow, or arrow, to wit, in the beginning of his raigne: but in the yeares after this maner was changed. They did so much abhorre the very speech, that the Lawes of the land were pleased in the French tongue. And boyes in Schooles were taught their letters, & principles in Grammar in French, and not in English, &c.

Among the lawes of William Conqueror, there is one of the Church as followeth. If any man breake the peace of the Church violently, he is in the jurisdiction of the Bishops to haue iustice, but if the partie that is guilty, flye from it, or arrogantly refuse the Bishops order, the King within foure dayes shall bee enformed of it, who will presently take surety of him, that he shall satisfie God first, and then the King: but if within thirty dayes he cannot be found, the king by the words of his owne mouth shall outlaw him, and if after he be found, and may be kept, he shalbe deliuered to the king alive, or else his head if he defend himselfe, for he beareth the head of a Wolfe, after the day of his outlawrie, this is the generall law concerning outlawes.

Outlawes. Ecclesiastical customes.

The Earle of Flanders hauing sent assistance vnto William the Conquerour, towards his enterprise of England, required to know of him what part or portion of the said Countrey, he should haue for his share, if hee obtained it. The Conquerour answered that before his departure, he would giue him that to vnderstand by writing, which delaying euen vnto the very time that he was ready to embarke, he then in faire parchment folded and sealed vp, sent him two verses in French, the effect whereof in English is this.

The Conquerour promiseth Flanders to Baldwin.

I haue vnto your part assign'd,
All what here you written find.

And that was iust nothing, for in all the parchment there was not any one word written, saue onely these verses: giuing hereby to vnderstand that hee meant not to make him a sharer with him in the kingdome of England.

This yeare Henry the Kings sonne was borne in England: his other sonnes, Robert, William, and Richard, were borne beyond the Seas in Normandie, before he conquered England.

Anno reg. 1069. Henry the borne. Lib. Dunel.

King William gaue to Robert surnamed Cumin, the Earledome of Northumberland, of whose comming thither, when the men of that Countrey heard, they made themselues ready to forsake their houses, and to shift for themselues abroad: but sudainly there fell such abundance of Snow and roughnesse of weather, that they could not in any wise flye, wherefore they tooke a deuice and concluded, either to flye the Realme, or else to dye all together, for the liberty of the Country. The which thing when the Bishop of Durham vnderstood, hee went out to meet the Earle, and exhorted him to turne backe againe: but hee suffering his souldiers to robbe and spoyle, would not heare any counsell of health, but forthwith entred Durham with seauen hundred men, spoyling like enemies through the houses of Durham euerie where what they liked for the time, which lasted not long, for on the next morning earely the men of Northumberland being gathered together, burst open the gates, and running vp and downe, slay all that they met in that Citty, that take part with the Earle, whereby all the streets were filled with blood and dead bodies: some there were that defended the entry of the house wherein the Earle was, and had thought to haue saued himselfe, but the other by fire endeauoured to burne the house, with all that were therein, wherehy the West tower of the Church was burnt, but through the wind that then blew out out of the East the Church escaped burning: notwithstanding the house yet burning as it began, some of them that were within were burnt: and other some whilest they burst out to saue themselues, were immediately slaine, so that the Earle himselfe was dispatched, and all his souldiers sauing one that hardly escaped being wounded. King William taking great displeasure with these doings of the Northumbers, directed a certain Duke with an army, to reuenge the slaughter of Earle Robert: but when they were come to Alnerton, and was in the next morning setting forward towards Durham, there arose such a darknesse of weather through thicknesse of Clouds, that they could vnneth see one another, so that they could not finde their way, whereupon they returned, and so it came to passe, God hauing pitty vpon them, that they heard of the departure of their enemies before they heard of their comming towards them.

About the same time, by the testimony of an old Chronicle in the Library at Richmond, King William gaue such a guift of Lands as followeth.

Richmond.

I William King, the third yeare of my raigne,
Giue to the Norman Hunter, to me that art both life and deere,
The Hop and the Hopton, and all the bounds vp and downe,
Vnder the earth to hell, aboue the earth to heauen,
From me and from mine, to thee and to thine,
As good and as faire, as euer they mine were,
To witnesse that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,
Before Iugge, Maud, and Margery, and my yongest Sonne Henry,
For one Bow and broad Arrow, when I come to hunt vpon Yarrow.

William gaue to Norman.

Somewhat before the feast of the nativity of our blessed Ladie, Harold and Canutus sonnes to Swanus king of Denmarke, Earle Esborne, Earle Turkellus, Christerne their Bishop, and many other, with 204. ships, comming forth of Denmarke, landed in the mouth of the River of Humber, where Cleo Edgar, Earle Waltheus, and Merleswyne, with many other, and the nauy which they had assembled came to them, of whose comming Aldred Archbishop of Yorke being very sorrowfull, made earnest intercession to Almighty God, that he might not see the vtter ruine and destruction of his Country, fell sicke, and ended his life in the yeare next following, as shall be shewed.

Sweyn King of Denmarke in England.

The eight day after the landing of the Danes, to wit, on the nineteenth day of September, the Normans that kept the Castle of Yorke, fearing least the houses that were nere to the Castle should be a furtherance to the enemies to fill vp the ditches, began to set fire on them, & to burne them vp: which fire increasing to exceedingly, inuaded all the city, and consumed the Monasterie of S. Peter, together with the City, but this act was greeuously reuenged on them very speedily, for before all the City was burnt, the Danish Nauy came, to wit, on the Monday, being the 21. of September, and breaking the Castles, the same day slew aboue 3000. Normans, sauing Will. Mallet and his wife, two of their children, & few other: which done, they returned to their ships with innumerable bootes. Which doing, when it was signified to the king, he forthwith assembled an army, and hasted with an angry mind towards Northumberland, not ceasing to wast that country all that winter, to kill men, and to do all the mischiefe that was possible. In the meane time, messengers being sent to the Danish Earle Esborne, king William promised to giue to him no small summe of money, and to permit his army freely to take victuals, by the Sea coste, with this condition onely, that winter being past, he should depart without battell. Esborne being in greedy of gain and siluer, not without great shame, yeelded to his requests, and departed without more claime of this kingdome for that time.

King William surnamed the Bastard with the Danes to depart without battell.

By reason that the Normans had wasted England in Northumberland, and in certain other places in the yeare before, now this yeare, and the next that followed, such a dearth increased through all England, especially through Northumberland and the Countries adiacent, ...ning, that men were faine to eat horse flesh, ... dogs, and mans flesh: for all the Land thor... betwixt Durham and Yorke, lay waste without inhabitants, and people to till the ground, for the space of 9. yeares, except onely the territorie of Saint Iohn of Beuerlake.

Famine sorely ... flesh ... of men.

When Egelsine Bishop of Durham heard of the comming of king William, he and the elders taking aduise together, fled to the Church of holy Iland: but in the meane season the kings army being scattered throughout all places whatsoeuer betwixt Tese and Tine, found nothing but empty houses euery where: and then was burnt the Church of Saint Paul at Yarrow.

Anno reg. 4. 1070.

The Church of Durham being bereft of all ecclesiasticall seruice was left like a desert, but Lent being at hand, when peace was made, the Bishop returned againe, and entred the Church the first of Aprill, where he found the Image of the Crucifix cast to the ground, and altogether spoyled of the ornaments. Though a counsell of William Fitz Osberd Earle of Hereford, & certaine other in the Lent season, K. William caused the Monasteries of all England to be searched, and the money which the richer sort of the English people, for the cruel spoyling which they saw in him had layd vp in the same Abbeyes, he caused to be brought into his treasury. Roger of Wendouer saith, he bereaued all the Monasteries and Abbeyes in England, of their gold and siluer, sparing neither Chalice nor Shrine, appropriating the said Monasteries and Abbeyes to himselfe: he brought vnder knights seruice, all those Bishoprickes and Abbeyes that held Baronies, which had beene free from all secular bondage, appointing them how many Souldiers they should finde him and his successors in in time of Warres.

Marianus Scotus. Archbishop of Canterbury is deposed.

A great counsell was holden at Winchester by commandement of the king, who also was present at the same, Pope Alexander consenting thereunto, sent by his Legates Ermenfred Bishop, and the Priests, John and Peter Cardinals of the sea Apostolike, who exhibited there his authoritie. In which counsell Stigand Archbishop of Canterbury was degraded for three causes, to wit, because he did possesse unjustly the Bishopricke of Winchester, together with his Archbishoprick, and because that whilest the Archbishop Robert was yet living, he had not onely taken upon him the Archbishoprick, but also in celebrating of divine service, for a time used the Pall, which remained at Canterbury, when he was expelled unjustly by violence out of England, and after received the Pall of Benedict, whom the Church of Rome did excommunicate, for that he had invaded the Apostolike sea by money. His brother Agelwine Bishop of the East Angles, and diuers Abbots, were there degraded by the Kings meanes, that other of his nation might be placed in their rooms, for the conformation of his kingdome, many, as well Bishops as Abbots, who for no evident cause were deprived of their honour, and by the king unto their lives end holden in prison.

When the Feast of Saint Iohn Baptist was at hand, Earle Esborne with his Navie which had wintered in Humber (according to appointment made) returned into Denmarke, but his brother Swain King of Denmarke banished him that Realme, for the money (which against his will, & the will of the Danes) he had received of king William: whereby it appeareth, that Swain king of Denmarke surrealed not his claime to the crown of England, as some have affirmed, namely in a Table, untruely intituled, The true portraiture of the countenances, and attires of the Kings of England, &c. collected by T. T. wherein his words be these, Wil. of Normandie, &c. twise the crowne upon him by election of the Estates, (the contrary whereof is true) then seking to stop titles, he imprisoned Edgar Etheling, the onely true heyre of the Saxons bloud, and by means of Ethelbert Archbishop of Hambozow for money procureth Swaine King of Denmarke to surrealse the claime of the Danes, hauing thus established his affaires, &c. which errot the said T. T. hath framed by misinterpreting of his Author Adam Bremensis, whose words be these: Inter Suen & Bastardum perpetua contentio de Anglia fuit, licet nostet pomiscx numerius Guilelmi persuasus inter reges pacs firmare volueris. Which is to be Englished thus: betweene Swene and the bastard, there was continuall contention, although our Bishop being perswaded with the gifts of William, would haue established peace betweene the Kings. Marke how little this Author serueth to his interpretation, and note to our Historie.

Earle Esborne returneth to Swain Denmarke.

The Danes make continuall claime to the Crowne of England many yeares, as by the History following may appeare.

Adam Bremensis.

K. William having placed a Canon of Bayon, named Thomas the elder, in the Archbishops sea of Yorke, doth now call for Lanfranke Abbot of Caen in Normandie, that was a Lumbard, borne in the City of Papia, a man skilfull in science, prudent in counsell and gouernment of things, and for religion and life most holy, hereby made Archbishop of Canterbury. This Lanfranke being consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury, he consecrated Thomas Archbishop of Yorke, but not before he had made profession of subiection to the said Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, which the said Thomas was ordered by the King to doe, and did before his consecration.

Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury being in such fauor with king William, that the same William thought not good to deny any thing that he requested, procured by his industrie that the said king left his euill custome of selling his prisoners, which he tooke in Ireland: which was a thing hardly granted to him, and to Wolstane bishop of Worcester, the gaines that the king had by the sale of those Irishmen was such.

The Earles, Edwine of Mercia, Morcare of Northumberland, Siward surnamed Bran, Egelwine bishop of Durham, with many knights, and soldiers, both of the Clergie and lay people, fearing that king William would put them in prison, secretly fled out of the Court, and for a time rebelled against him, till they perceiued ỹ thing they had taken in hand went not well with them and then Earle Edwine determining to goe to Malcolme King of Scots, was in the way thereward slaine through the treason of his owne people.

Edwine slaine.

Eglewine bishop of Durham, Earle Morcare, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward, a right valiant person, with many other went into woods and wild places of the Country, because they were not able to abide the force of K. William: and after they had done much harme in many places, at last, they came into the Ile of Ely by boat, and chose there a place in the Fens, they make Hereward their Captaine of the warre, where he did many warlike feats, so often ouercomming his enemies, so many times deluding them, that he deserued perpetuall commendations, for as long as he could, he sustained the ruines of his country decaying.

Hereward.

Whereof when as king William was aduertised, he gathered a great power, marched thitherward, and stopped their going out of the Ile on the East side thereof, and caused a bridge or causway of two miles in length to be made in ỹ West part. He also (saith Roger of Wendouer) builded a Castle from the ground vp, in a place called Wilsbech, whereupon they of the Ile perceiuing themselues so inclosed, they raysed a Fort of Castle of turffes and timber in the marshes, which by the inhabitants of that country, is called the Castle of Hereward: this Castle they tooke, fought against the assaulting of the Kings host, and fought with their enemies in my dayes together. From thence the King went to the castle of Cambridge, from whence as the necessitie of the time required, sent out diuers companies to beseige and trouble the next places unto the Ile, for the King himselfe was called unto other businesse, and enforced to repaire into Normandy, to speake with Philip King of France. In the meane time Hereward, & the nobles of England obtained by price, that which they could not doe by prayer, and wan the Scots to take their part against the Normans. And also the Danes fauouring them, did greatly desire to triumph ouer the Normans. Further, there were within the Realme great commotions on every part, as well by the Normans as other against ỹ king by perswasion of Earle Ralph de Walfar, calling Hereward into that faction, and others the Nobles of England, as Morcare, Ethelm, Walthenum, Siward, & Edgare. At which time Hereward leauing the Ile of Ely, committed to him for safegard, went towards the English, to whom a valiant company of young souldiers did ioyne themselues, which no man durst encounter.

Malcolme king of Scots with an innumerable multitude of Scots, passing through Cumberland, and turning himselfe aside towards the East, did cruelly forrage all Tesdale, & the places nigh adioyning: but when they came to a place called Hundredskeld, after they had there slaine certaine noble men of the English nation, the king of Scots sent home part of his army laden with spoyles. Then he set upon Holderneste and destroyed the same with a sodaine desolation: then raging through the ground of S. Cuthbert of Durham, he cruelly deprined all men of their goods, and many of their liues. At the same time also did he consume with fire, the Church of S. Peter at Weremouth, and diuers other Churches, with them that were thither fled to saue themselues. And whiles the said Malcolme rode about the riuer bankes, delighting his eyes with the cruell acts committed against the English people, it was told him that Edgar Etheling with his sisters of the bloud royall, & many other Noblemen, banished from their lawfull inheritance were arriued in that hauen: he came to them, & shaking hands with them, gaue them and all theirs, licence with his assured peace to dwell in his kingdome as long as they would.

Malcolme King of Scots.

Earle of Northumberland.

Besides these robberies of the Scots, Gospatrike of Northumberland, did assaile Cumberland, & made there great slaughter and burnings and after returned with great booty, to a strong fortresse at Babbanbrigh, where he with his fellowes inclosed themselues: for at that time Cumberland was under the jurisdiction of king Malcolme, who when he heard what was done by Gospatrike, he charged his souldiers to spare none of the English nation: whereupon, pitifull it was to behold, old men, and women, some were killed with swords, some pierced with speares the yong babes taken from the mothers paps, were cast by into the fyre, & falling downe again, were received on their speares, & then the speare staues striken into the ground in a bushment together: but the yong men and maidens, such as were thought meet to labour, were bound, and forced to be slaues. Malcolme beholding ỹ teares of these, to encrease his tyranny, commanded them to be scourged in their going forward.

At this time (saith Houeden) Scotland was so replenished with bondslaues, men and women of the English nation, that no village or cottage could be found without them.

The Castle of Ledes in Kent was builded by Crequeure, a noble man, a Norman.

The Castle of Oxford was builded by Robert de Olly the first, a notable man that came into England with K. William the Conquerour. Oxford Castle builded.

This yeare by the commandement of Pope Alexander, and consent of king William the Conquerour, in the presence of the said king, his Bishops, Prelates, and Nobilitie, the title of Primacie, the which Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury did claime ouer the Church of Yorke, and concerning the ordering of certain Bishops, whom men were uncertaine, unto which Archbishop they should especially belong, was graunted and tryed out: where, by the authoritie of old writings it was proued and declared, that the Church of Yorke ought to be subiect unto the Church of Canterbury, and ought faithfully to obey the same, in all matters pertaining unto Christian religion, as being Primate of all England. And the Archbishop of Yorke, and his successors to haue under their iurisdiction: the Bishoprickes of Durham, that is to say, Lindisferne, and from the great River of Humber unto the vttermost part of the borders of Scotland, and also whatsoeuer doth appertaine to the Parish of Yorke upon the side of the River: to that if the Archbishop of Canterbury do summon a councell in any place, the Archbishop of Yorke and all his suffragans Subiects, and Clarkes shall be there present at his commandement, and shall be obedient unto his Canons and orders, &c. at Windzore. 1072. R. Wendouer. W. Malmesb. A Synode wherein was pronued that the Archbishop of Yorke shoulde be subiect to the Archbishop of Canterbury King William having in his company Edrike surnamed Silvaticus, or Wild, marched towards Scotland with a Nauy by Sea, and with an armie of Horsemen by Land, to haue subdued Scotland, for that Malcolme had in the yere last before passed, so cruelly desolated the borders of his kingdome. King William sent into Scotland, and Malcolme king of Scots did homage unto him.

In the which journey, when King William came into Durham, he entred the Church with great deuotion for to pray, and afterwards, he inquiring of the life and conuersation of the Confessour Cuthbert, and also of the antiquity of that Bishopricke, he confirmed all the liberties of that same Church, &c.

This being done, King William went into Scotland, against whom King Malcolme came unto a place called Aberiathey, and became his man. And after King William deprined Gospatrike of his Earledome, laying unto his charge, that he had consulted with them that slew the Earle Robert Comen of Durham, and that he was among the enemies, when the Normans were slaine at Yorke: who being expulsed, Waltheus was extolled unto that Earledome, being due unto him both by Father, and mother, for he was the Sonne of Earle Siward by Elfled, the daughter of Aldred sometime Earle.

Ann. reg. 7. 1073. R. Wendouer. King William went into Normandy, which Dukedome was then rebellious against him. but with strong hand he subdued the City of Mayne, and the whole Countrey, especially by the helpe of Englishmen, whom he applyed in these affaires, they spoyled the Cities, Townes, Vineyards and Cornefields, whereby they greatly weakned and impouerished that Prouince.

Clito Edgar. Clito Edgar at this time came forth of Scotland, and passing through England, went into Normandie, and was there agreed with K. William.

The Monkes of Ely submit themselues to King William. About this time the Monkes of Ely, seeing the miseries of themselues, and of the whole Iland, determined to try the kings clemency, for there was such a dearth in the land, as the like had not bene seene, for all prouision being spent, many thousandes died through hunger, since it was now the seauenth yere since they had bene besieged, wherefore taking their journey to Warwike a famous towne, they came to the king with great reuerence, commending themselues and all that they had to his clemencie. Thurstane and his Monks standing before king William, beseeched him for the mercy of God, to turne his displeasure from their City, promising faithfully hereafter to obey him. The Abbot said, that if the king would restore vnto the Abbey their possessions, violently taken from them, he might haue sure entrance into the Ile, which the King granted, and commanded William de Warren, and Gilbert de Clare, that they should become pledges for the same. Whereupon the Abbot conferred with them about the regathering together of their possessions, who (going after to his owne) did first instruct Gilbert de Clare, and Earle Warren of the manner of the rebellion, willing them not to feare for the often repulse of the enemies, for they should haue his counsell and helpe, whereby the king might vnderstand that the power of the enemies was weakned.

Wherevpon the king began to triumph, as though he had already got the victory: he assembled therefore as great an army as he could both of Horsemen and Footmen, he toke his journey to Ely, he prepareth his engines, layeth siege to the place which was of most defence, and daily laboured to ouerthrow that which Canutus neither with wit, or strength, with pollicy, or sword could at any time subdue.

At length, though with difficulty wonderfull to be declared, he safely brought his army neare that any one thought he could haue done, which was euen to the waters of Ely, the Normans passed Coningslade, neither did it grieue ✠ King first to passe ouer many Riuers, although he was almost drowned at the point Gale: he ceased not for marshes or other neuer so dangerous, till the sounding voice of victory quickly drawe the enemies out of the Iland, but the Normans compassing the enemies, did in a moment slay a thousand of them, wherefore the king as soone as he had entred the Iland, went about the mores, marshes, and crooked waies, ✠ both with siege inclose the whole company of his enemies. These armed men are brought forth, first the Captaines, then the better sort of the other, whereof he imprisoneth some, and put out ✠ eyes cut off the hands and feet of other some, ✠ suffered the multitude of the common people to depart.

King William in perill of drowning at Stone Gate.

In this Ile he found abundance of beastes and cattell manifold to recompence his slaine horses and other damages. Edwine is taken, and with him many persons of name and power, who were bound in streight prison, but Morcare was escaped: forthwith the king sent a great company to keepe the gates of the Monasterie, to the end the Monkes with crosses and other ceremonies should not meet him and intreat for pardon at his hand, whereunto he must needs haue granted. Wherefore when he came to the Monasterie, he stod alone from the tombe of Saint Etheldred, and hurled a marke of gold vpon the Altar. Which done, and hauing placed a Garrison within the walls of the Monkes, he disposed of Cambridge, Huntington, ✠ Bedfordshires, committing them to such men as he had brought out of France: and likewise placing a strength of Frenchmen, in the Castle of Alreched, he went out of the Iland, the same way by which he entred into it: there was no diuine Seruice since that vnto the xviij. of October, the time was so troublesome. After the king was departed, the Church doores were fast locked: and Gilbert de Clare entring the Monasterie to see the monks places of offices, in the end came into the refectory, and finding the Monks at dinner, sayd to them, Oh wretches and slothfull persons, had you none other time to dine in, but whilest the King remained in your Church: With which word they all rising, ran to the Church: but when they found not the King there, they were greatly troubled: wherefore hauing no hope but in God, they required Gilbert de Clare, that by his meanes they might obtaine a firme Peace, which in the end taking vpon him to doe, he went to the king, and with great difficulty obtained the same: with condition, that when the Monkes came before him, they should by prayer or price pacifie his displeasure against them.

King William lay at Winchcomb.

This done, he brought the Monkes before the king to Winchcomb, where he then sojourned, who being with much a doe brought in fauour with the king by the said Gilbert, and other noblemen, promised 700. markes of siluer. For the preuenting whereof, the Monks were enforced to spoile and sell the iewels ✠ ornaments of their Church, and then repaire to Cambridge to pay that money to the kings officers: but one great being lacking of the said summe, by the deceit of such as did tell it, ✠ waight was not iust by so much. Whereof when the king had vnderstood, he was greatly offended with them, denying vnto them all manner of hope of any further peace. Whereupon they were driuen to make another composition of a thousand markes, for the which they were faine to spoile, and to sell whatsoeuer other kind of ornaments that were left, and yet notwithstanding, lacked that peace which they so much sought, and so dearely bought. Walter borne at Lorraine, was elected by the King,

King, and then consecrated Bishop of Durham.

King William the Conquerour with a great power of Englishmen went into Normandy, which rebelled, and subdued it, spoyling the Cities, Townes, Vineyards, &c.

Conspiracy against King William, by Radulph Earle of Norfolke and Suffolke.

Radulph whom lately before king William had made Earle of Norfolke and Suffolke, or, as some write, of the East Angles, now toke to wife (against the Kings commandement) the daughter of William Fitz Osbert, sister to Roger Earle of Hereford, and celebrating most royally the marriage feast, with a great multitude of Noble men at Exaingham in Cambridgeshire, conceiuing a pride of his marriage, for that his wife was the Kings kinswoman, suen vpon the marriage day, when the feast was solemnly kept, and the riotous superfluity of the Englishmen was entred into the Normans throates, the guests being drunken and full of wine, with a long circumstance of words, he opened his mind and purpose, whereunto the guests consented with a great shout. There was Roger Earle of Hereford, Radulphes wines brother: there was VValdeofus Earle of North-hampton and Huntington, and many other, who all conspired the kings death. But on the next morrow, when the heate of the wine was digested, and the minds of some of them come to better temper, the most part of them repented of that they had promised, and slipping away from the feast, VValdeofus as some as he could went to Lanfranke Archbyshop of Canterbury, and toke penance for his oath which he had receiued against his will, and through his aduise went to the king, then being in Normandy, and opening the matter vnto him, yeelded to his mercy. The other Nobles proceeding in their begun conspiracy, went to the Castles, and raised their people to open rebellion. But VVolstane Bishop of Worcester, with a great bande of men of warre resisted the Earle of Hereford, so that he might not (passing the Riuer of Seuerne) ioyne to Earle Radulph at the appointed place with his campe, in whose company was Aglewine Abbot of Euesham, with his people, hauing called to his ayde Vrse sheriffe of Worcester, and Walter de Lacie with their men, and other multitudes of common people.

Vrse Sheriffe of Worcester-shire. Walter Lacie.

But Odo Bishop of Bayon, and Godfrey Bishop of Constance assembling a mighty army all well of Englishmen as of Normans, came to encounter Earle Radulph beeing encamped at Cambridge, where Earle Radulph perceiuing that his enterprise wanted force, fearing the number of them that came against him, he secretly fled from thence to Norwitch, where committing the Castle to his wife and knights, he getteth himselfe to ship, and fled into little Britaine, whom his enemies pursuing, slew all those of his men that they might come to and after this they besiege the Castle, till that peace was granted, and licence to the Countesse and her people to depart the realme, and so she followed her husband.

These things being done, the King in the haruest returning forth of Normandy, put Earle Roger of Hereford in prison, wherein he remained all the dayes of his life: and all the Welthmen that had bene at the Marriage, he caused to haue their eyes put out, their hands cut off, hanged on gibbets, or to be banished at the least. Earle VValtheofus also was committed to prison, although he went to the King, and had obtained of him a promise of pardon.

Edgitha late Queene of England, wife to King Edward, called (of some) the Simple, or (of other) Confessor, daughter to Duke Godwine, and sister to Harold late king of England, departed this life at Winchester, whose corps, by the kings commandement was brought to Westminster, and there by her husband solemnly enterred: she had a Tombe of siluer and gold curiously wrought. This Queene Edgitha professed on her death bed, that notwithstanding she had bene many yeares wife vnto King Edward, yet now she dyed a pure virgine.

Ingulphus.

King VVilliam banished certaine rebels, others he dismembred, as by putting out their eyes, and chopping off their hands. The Earles VValtheofus, and Roger, by iudiciall sentence, he condemned vnto more strait prisons.

At this time (saith Ingulphus) Brand Herewardes vncle, Abbot of Peterborowe, being dead, succeeded Thorold a stranger, by the gift of King VVilliam, which thing Hereward taking in ill part, that a stranger should rule ouer his kinsed, he inuaded Peterborow, and chased away the Abbot. And though in the said Abbots defence, Iuo Talbois a most mighty Norman, and by the guift of king William made Lord of all Holland in Lincolneshire, Hereward toke the said Iuo in open battell, and set him free from a great summe of money. To this Iuo Talbois, king VVilliam had giuen to wife Lucie, the sister of the Earles Edwine and Morcare, with all the lands and reuenements that to the said Earles had appertained.

Hereward chased the Abbot of Peterborow. Iuo Hereward feeble Iuo Talbois and rans fomed him.

At this time moreouer, to increase the calamity, hapned the cruel beheading of earle VValtheofe or VValden: and although Lanfranke, Archbishop of Canterbury his Confessour, acclaimed him to be free from the conspiracie and faction, and that if it chanced him to dye in that cause, hee should for his innocencie be counted a Martyr, yet his most wicked wife, coueting to be married anew, did most hainously hasten the death of her husband. Certaine Normans also gaping after his Carledomes, namely of Hozthampton and Huntington, and Iuo Talbois earle of Angew, most greedy to make those lands and tenements his owne, by blood-shedding, this innocent and harmelesse man was beheaded without the Cittie of Winchester, vpon the last day of the moneth of May, and was there basely buried, in a place, where since was builded the Chappell of S. Giles: but fiftene dayes after by permission of the king, his body was conueyed vnto Crowland, and was there honourably buried. Mawd the daughter of Earle Walcheofes widow, after the decease of her husband, with her two Daughters, had the Lordship of Huntington giuen to her in the name of a dowrie, and there made their abode, vntill such time as the king was willing to marrie her to a knight borne in France, named Simon Sylueticus or Seinctiz. For hither came two brethren to the ayde of the king, and to serue him with fortie soldiers Horsemen, their names were Guarnerus le Riche, and Simonde Seinctiz, and their fathers name was Raulph le Riche, after whose death the eldest sonne, Guarnerus went backe into his native Countrey, and succeeded in his fathers possessions: but Simon the younger sonne remained here with the king, vnto whom the king gaue the Towne and Carledome of Hozthampton, and the Hundred of Farkeley, he builded the castle of Hozthampton, and also the Abbey of Saint And ewes there. The king would haue giuen vnto him Iudith the widow of Earle Walcheofus, but shee refused him, because that he halted on the one leg: in wrath whereof, king VVilliam bestowed vpon him the whole honour of Huntington, and so was hee called Earle of Hozthampton and of Huntington &c.

This yere mine oft alleaged Author Ingulphus, was by the kings guift made Abbot of Crowland, which Ingulphus, of himselfe, and his vocation to the Abbacie of Crowland, writeth thus: I Ingulphus, an humble seruant of God and Saint Guthlake, and of the Monastery of Crowland, borne in England, and of English parents, in the most beautifull citie of London, for to attaine to learning, I was first put to Westminster, afterward to Oxford to study. When I had profited in reading Aristotle aboue many mine equals in age, I studied also Tullies Rhetoricke: waxing elder, loathing the base estate of my parents daily moze and moze, I desired to leaue my father and mothers house, and so bee in kings and Princes pallaces, to be attyred in silkes and gozgious apparell. And behold, noble William, now our king of England, then Duke of Normandie, came to London, to talke with his cosin king Edward, then king of England, with a great traine attending vpon him, vnto whom I sone ioyned my selfe, shunking forward, to dispatch all businesse arising, I became in a little time knowne to Duke VVilliam, and was of him very well beloued, and with him I sayled into Normandie, there was I made his Secretary, I ruled the whole Court of the Duke at my pleasure, to the enuy of many.

At length it was noised, that many Archbishops and Bishops of the Empire, and many other Princes would goe to Jerusalem, I among other, as well souldiers as clarkes, with the licence of my Lord the Duke, prepared my selfe. Comming into Constantinople, wee did reuerence to the Emperour Alexes, &c. Departing from thence through Licia, we fell into the hands of Arabian robbers that tooke from vs much money: we came at the length to Jerusalem, where the Patriarke Sophronius receiued vs honourably, and brought vs to the Church of the holy Sepulcher, and so to other places. In the spring returning home by Rome, and so into Normandy, I hasted to the Abbey of Fontenill, where I receiued the habit of a Monke, meaning to purge and amend, as the grace of the holy Ghost inspired me, the offences of my youth, and ignozances, &c. At what time Duke VVilliam vnderstanding of the death of king Edward his cosin, expected a fauourable wind in the port of S. Walarike, to saple ouer into England, I presented vnto him the Abbots guift, to wit, twelue young men chosen out of Boylebacke and armed, with an hundred Marks towards his expences in that voyage, and I returned to the Monasterie. After certaine yeres VValketelus Abbot of Croyland was deposed of his office: King VVilliam sent to the Abbot of Fontanill for me, &c. To London I came to the king, their inuested of the Scaffe and Pastozall office of Croyland Monastery, and consecrated on the day of the Nativity of our Lord. On the day of the Conuersion of S. Paul, I first came to Croyland, and was installed, 1075.

The King passing ouer the Sea, went into little Britaine, and besieged there the Castle of Dolence belonging to Earle Ralph, but Philip King of France came with a great power vpon them, and toke all victuals from them, so that King William was forced to leaue his siege with the losse of many Souldiers and Hozses, with much other substance: and not long after King William made peace with them.

Walter Bishop of Durham, contrary to his Bishoplike dignity, intermeddled himselfe with secular and worldly matters, and bought of king VVilliam the Carledome of Hozthumberland, and then playing the part of a Sheriffe, sate in a secular and lay Court, determining of matters, extorting infinite Sums of money, as well of the Noblemen, as of the others of that same Province, &c.

The earth was hard frozen from the first day of Nouember, vntill the mid of Aprill.

King William the Conqueror gaue the Castle with the Towne of Pontfract, and the land lying thereabout, to Hilbert Lacie, a Noz- man, the which Castle, Towne, and lands before the Conquest belonged vnto one Richard Asnolde, who had issue Ailricke, who had Swayne, who had Adam, of whom came two daughters, one of the which two daughters was married vnto Gawfride Newell, and the other vnto Thomas Breugh, but neither of them had any part of the Towne oz lands about the Towne of Pontfract: Robert sonne to Hildebert Lacie, founded the Priorie of Pontfract.

About the same time Robert the kings sonne, vnto whom, when as he had conquered England he had giuen the Dukedome of Normandy in the presence of Philip King of France, because now his Father would not suffer him to possesse the Dukedome of Normandie, the said Robert went into France, and by the ayde of the said King Phillip, committed great robberies, and toke great preyes in Normandy, and burned Townes, and slew the people, doing no small vexation vnto his Father, so that King William the conqueror fighting a battaile against his Sonne Robert, before the Castle of Gerborte in France, was vnhozsed himselfe, and his sonne William was wounded, and many of his family there slaine. Wherefoze King William the Conqueror cursed his sonne Robert, the which curse he felt eminently before he dyed, foz there did nothing prosper with him.

Paul a Monke of Caue, is made Abbot of Saint Albones, who in short space by the counsell and ayde of Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, he builded very trimly a new Church and Cloyster there, and all offices, and adorned the same Church with many good Bookes, and rich ornaments.

This yere on Palme Sunday, about the first houre, the Ayre being cleere and faire, a great Starre appeared, and was seene of many neere vnto the Sunne.

This yere Malcolme king of Scots, on the fifteenth day of August, with an Army wasted Hozthumberland vnto the River of Tine, slew many and toke great preyes, and people of the Countrey, which they returning, conueyed into Scotland.

Also in the same yere the Cathedrall Church of Hereford was burned by Griffith the Prince of Wales, and Algar sonne vnto Leofrike Earle of Mercia.

Roger de Beleſme oz Montgomery, founded of an old Church in the Suburbes of the Towne of Scrobsbury an Abbey of blacke Monkes, dedicated vnto GOD, Saint Peter and Paul: he made Fulcharduis his Sonne first Abbot there. He also placed Monkes at Wenloke, in the Priorie sometime founded by Milbrough, after to Mildred, and by Leofrike Earle of Chester foz Nunnes.

Gundulphus bysbop of Rocheſter was surueyoz of the great worke of the Tower of London, which Tower was builded by the commandement of King William. And this Gundulfe founded the Abbey of Pawling in Kent foz Nunnes: he builded part of the Castle of Rochester, and founded the Hospitall of Saint Bartholomew without the East gate of that Cittie, which is in some Recozdes called Chetham, &c.

Walter bysbop of Durham, borne in Lorraine as is afozesaid, is slaine by the Northumbers, in a place called Gateshed, in reuenge of a Noble man named Leulsus, before slaine by meanes of the Bishops Chaplaine named Leofwinus. The said Leulfus in many parts of England inioyed many possessions by right of inheritance, but because the Normans euerie where practised their cruelty, he got himselfe with all his family to Durham, her had to wife Algitha, daughter to Earle Aldred, of whom he begate two sonnes Vtred and Morcare.

This Leulfus was so beloued of the bishop, that without his counsell, he would doe nothing of any great weight, foz the which cause the bishops Chaplaine Leofwinus greatly hated the said Leulfus, and therefoze on a time going out of the courthouse, oz mote hall called vnto him Gilbert, a man to whom the Bishop had committed the Carledome of Northumberland vnder him to be gouerned, he required him to reuenge his displeasure against the said Leulfus, and as sone as he could to put him to death, which he performed in this manner, gathering together his men of warre, one night went vnto the village where Leulfus dwelt, and there in his owne house, together with all his family, slew him, which thing being knowne, the Bishop loze vered in displeasure therewith, take his hood from his head, threw it to the ground, and said to Leofwine his Chaplaine, these things are done by thy meanes Leofwine, and therefoze I will that thou know foz certaine that thou hast killed me, and all my family with the sword of thy tongue. Hauing this said, he got him straight into the Castle, and forthwith sending Messengers through Northumberland, he caused to be declared to all men, that he was nothing priuie to the death of Leulfus, but was now desirous to banish his slayer Gilbert and all his fellowes in that action, and foz him selfe he was ready to purge himselfe according to the Ecclesiasticall lawes. This being signified the bishop and friends of him that was slaine, professing to be at peace together, appointed a day and place of meeting together, where they might establish a moze firme peace: now when the day came, they met at the place appointed, but the bishop refusing to talke with them abroad, abode in the Church thereby with his Clearcie and knights, and when the talke was began, once oz twice he sent out to them of his Councellors, to make an attonement, but they would not agree, because they beleued that Leulfus was slaine by the bishops consent, foz the night after the slaughter of Leulfus, not onely Leofwine did receiue Gilbert and his complices into his house familiarly, but also the Bishop did the like. Whereupon, all those that were found out of the bishops place they slew, very few excepted, that gate away by slight, which thing perceiued by the bishop, he to satisfie the fury of his enemies, commanded his cosin Gilbert (whose life was taught) to depart out of the Church, whom as he went, the men of armes followed with speare and sword, till they had slaine him and all their enemies, sparing onely two Englishmen.

Ilhmen that were seruants to the Bishop, they also slew Leofwine the Deane of Durham, and other of the Priests, as they could finde them out in the Church. When the Bishop perceiued that by no meanes their fury mought be pacified, except the head of the author were cut off, he belought Leofwine to goe forth, which when he could not get him to doe, he went himselfe to the Church doores, and besought them to grant him his life, which when they refused to doe, hee concering his head with the skirt of his garment, went forth and straightwaies with the enemies swoords he was dispatched out of his life: after this they bad Leofwine come forth, but he would not, whereupon they set the Church walles and rouffe on fire, which he continued awhile, but when he felt the bitter flames about him, and began to smart, hee leapt out, and being cut in peeces, suffered for his wickednesse.

This detestable slaughter of the Bishop was committed on the 14. day of May, when he had sate Bishop nine yeres, and two monethes, the Monkes of Yarrow fayled to the place, take the body of their Bishop into their Ship, which body they could hardly know for the number of wounds, being also spoyled of his garments, the body they carped to their Monasterie, which being translated from thence to Durham was there buryed, but with no such solemnitie as other Bishops had beene buryed, for his murderers runne vp and downe all the Citie, and assaulted the Castle, but could not preuaile: whereupon at length they dispersed themselues here and there, and were consumed with many calamities, wandring like runnagates, and banished people, for when King William had knowledge of these things, he sent his brother Odo Bishop of Bayon, and many Nobles of his realme with a great army, to destroy Northumberland, who whilest they sought to reuenge the death of the Bishop, brought all that land to desolation, many of the seely people that remained at home, they either commanded to be beheaded, or otherwayes to be dismembred, many of them being vniustly charged, were forced to ransome themselues with money.

The said Odo tooke certaine ornaments of the Church, among the which there was a Bishops staffe, marueilous for the matter and workmanship, for it was made of Sapphyre stone, who having set a garrison in the Castle, returned.

This yere was finished the Booke named Domes day, or Domus Dei, being a perfect surney of the whole Land, which booke remaineth in the kings Exchequer at Westminster, of which booke a making thereof, Ingulphus writeth thus.

King William for the taking of his whole land, tooke this order in all England, there was not an hyde of land, but he knew the value thereof and the possessor also, neither meire nor place there was, but it was valued in the kings role, the rents and profits, the possession and the possessors were made manifest and knowne vnto the King, according to the fidelitie of euery, which being chosen out of euery Countrey taxed or set sed their owne Territories, or made their owne rent role. These men welwillers and friends to our Monasterie, weighed not our Monasterie to the full price, nor to the true measure thereof, preuenting and pounding vpon zealous affection towards vs, for the kings taxation, and other burdens that after might befall.

This role is called the role of Winton, and of the Englishmen for the generalitie thereof, containing wholly all the tenements of the whole land, it is named Domes-day. Such a role and very like, did king Aelfred once set forth, in which he taxed all the land of England by Shires, Hundreds, and Mythings.

And this role, as is before noted, was called the role of Winton, because it was laid in Winchester to be kept. Which Citie was the head of the West Saxon kingdome, comming vnto him by inheritance: At that time among all the particular kingdomes of England most noble and famous. In this role of Winchester, so most of all called, because it was made after the example of the other, were taxed and set downe, the Carledomes, Hundreds, Mythings, Woods, Parkes, and all Farmes, in euery territorie, or precinct, how many carucates of land, how many plough lands, and acres, what pasturs and Fennes, or Parishes, what tenements and tenants were conteined, &c. Thus much Ingulphus.

The booke of Bermondsey, saith this Booke, was laid vp in the kings Treasurie (which was in the Church of Winchester, or Westminster) in a place called Domus Dei, or Gods house, and to the name of the booke, therefore called Domus Dei, and since shortly, Domes day.

The same yere, K. William sent his son Robert into Scotland against Malcolme; but when he was come to Egglesbirth, hauing in no point atchieued his enterprise, he returned againe, and builded the new Castle beyond the riuer of Tine.

After that five moneths were past, since the murdering of Walker Bishop of Durham, William Karilphe Abbot of S. Vincents was by king William chosen to be Bishop of Durham, the 9. of November, and on the third of January he was consecrated at Gloucester, by Thomas Archbishop of Yorke, the king being present, and all the Bishops of the realme, for he was an excellent man in wisedome, learning and vertue, and therefore welbeloued of all men.

Henry Earle Ferrers founded a Priorie within his Castle of Tutsbury.

The late new Church was founded and builded in Anno 1407. when the Normans were put out, and the Priors aliants suppressed.

VVilliam Archbishop of Roane, held a councell at Lisbone, king VVilliam being present with many other Princes and Bishops.

A great Earthquake, and roaring out of the earth was heard in the first of Aprill, about the third houre of the night.

Alwine Child, citizen of London, founder of the Monasterie of S. Saviour at Bermondsey in Southwarke besides London, in the County of Surrey, by licence of king VVilliam gaue vnto the Monkes de Charitate there, diuers rents in the citie of London. VVilliam Rufus afterward gaue them the manner of Bermondsey, and builded them a new Church.

Matild the Queene, daughter to Baldwine, Earle of Flanders, and wife to king VVilliam deceased. King William had many children by this Matild, whereby he prouoked him to loue her, certaine it is a liele variance was growne betweene them in their latter yeares, for his sonne Robert, whom men said his mother, out of the Kings coffers did maintaine with warlike power, but king William himselfe declared that the fauour of matrimoniall loue was not diminished by that, whereas she dyed 4. yeares before him, he did honour her with royall obsequies and Funerals, and did with teares mourne for her death many dayes after, and from that time forth (it was said) he abstained from all voluptuousnesse: The Queene was buried at Caine in Normandy in the Monasterie of Nuns which she had founded and dedicated to the holy Trinitie.

Richard the Kings sonne Duke of Beorn died in the new Forrest, and was buried at Winchester with this Epitaph. Hic iacet Ricardus Filius Wilhelmi senioris Beornie ducis.

This Richard King Williams second sonne was a goodly lad, and such a one as of his age did attempt great matters, in whom his noble Father had a very good opinion: but a bitter death did soone deuoure him in his young age, men said that the Deere in the new Forrest, by reason of a cloud or mist of infected ayre, got a disease of goging, and so spoyled him. This new Forrest is a place which king William the father of Richard, had layd waste, ouerthrowing townes, villages, and Churches, by the space of thirty miles and more, bringing the same into a chase for Deere, and horrible thing it was to see, that where before men did inhabit and dwell, and where God was honored: now Deere Goates, and such other kind of wild Beasts doe wantonly course about, and not so much as made to the vse of men. Wherefore it is declared for certaine, that in the same Forrest, William his sonne, and his Nephew Richard, the sonne of Robert Duke of Normandie, did by the seuere iudgment of God, finde their death, William with an arrow, that was shot in his breast, and Richard had his necke broken, or as some say, as hee rode through the wood on Posie-backe, he was hanged vp by the chaps vpon the bough of a tree.

King William in his life time shewed great fauour vnto his mother, who before his father was dead, had married a certaine man of meane substance, called Herlewinus of Canteruile, by him king VVilliam had brethren, one named Robert, whom he made Earle of Morton, a grosse and dull witted man: The other brother was called Odo, who when he was Duke, he promoted to the Bishoprieke of Bayon: & when he was King, he made him Earle of Kent, he being a man of subtill wit, was vnder the king Vice-lord of all England, after the death of William Fitz Osberne, insomuch that he being wonderfull exactie and subtill in heaping vp of treasure, and one of a marualious obstinacie, being absent from the Citizens of Rome, had almost bought the Papacy by stuffing the bagges of strangers with letters and money. And (by reason of the opinion, that all men had of him, that he should goe to Rome to be Pope) all matters of controuersie throughout the whole Realme were brought vnto him, which matter the king tooke very euill, and laid him in prison as shall be shewed in place conuenient, saying that he would not apprehend the Bishop of Bayon, but that he would apprehend the Earle of Kent: his seruants being constrained thereunto with threats, bewayed such plenty of gold, that the heape of yellow mettall did exceed the opulous of all men: moreouer many bags full of grounden gold were drawne out of Riuers which he had buried in certaine places.

VVilliam Bishop of Durham, by licence of the King and the Nobles of the Realme, went to Rome and obtained of Pope Gregory the seuenth, to bring the Monkes from Yarrow and Wermouth into the Cathedrall Church of Durham, for euer with Lands, Churches, ornaments &c. all which king VVilliam confirmed by his Charter.

A wicked sedition arose betweene the Monks and Thurstane the vnworthy Abbot of Glastenburie, which Thurstane king VVilliam had taken forth of the Monasterie of Caine in Normandie, and (being a man furnished with no wisedome) made him Abbot of Glastenburie. This man among other his fellowes, despising the song called Gregories Song, began to counsell the Monks to learne the Song of one VVilliam of Fescamps, and to sing it in the Church, which to doe when they refused, as they that had beene euer vsed not onely in this, but in other seruice of the Church, to follow the manner of the Romane Church, sudainly on a day with a company of armed men, (the Monkes not aware thereof) brake into the Chapter house, and the Monkes flying through excedine feare into the Church, euen to the high Altar, the men of warre pursuing with their darts and arrowes, shot, not sparing to hit the Crosses, Images and shrines, and ran one Monke through the body with a speare, as he embraced the Altar, and so slew him, another was slaine with an arrow, tying as it were bidden vnder the Altar, the other constrained of necessitie, defended themselues with Formes and candlesticks of the Church so that although they were sore wounded, they saue all the men of armes behind the quire, & so it fell out, that two being slaine, 14. were hurt of the Monkes, and some of the men of armes, were hurt also, this matter comming to iudgement, because it was found that the Abbot was all in the blame, the King removed him, and set him in his house againe in Normandie, many of the Monkes were bestowed in Bishops houses, but after the Conquerors decease, the Abbot got his Abbey againe, at his sonne VVilliam Rufus hands, buying it with 500. pound of siluer, & wandring through the possessions of the Church certaine yeares together from the Apostles, euen his life miserably, as he well deserued.

About this time many tempests raging in this world, certaine Southsayers at Rome declared, who should succeed vnto Hildebrand in the the Popedome, they affirmed after the decease of Gregorie, Odo to be Pope of Rome. Odo Byshop of Bayon, bearing this, (who with his brother) governed the Normans and Englishmen, little esteeming the power and riches of the West kingdome, valesse by right of the Popedome, might largely rule all the inhabitants of the earth, he sendeth to Rome, he buyeth a pallace, he secketh out the Senators, whom w great gifts giuen, he iopneth with them in amitie, and his pallace he adorned with much cost and superfluous trimming, he sendeth to Hugh Earle of Chester, and a great number of the chiefest knights, and heartily prayeth them to goe with him into Italy: and the prodigall man, vnto his prayers addeth great promises. They, for that the Normans were light, and desirous to see forraine Countries, straightwayes assented vnto the presumptuous Byshop, to whom the Princedome of Albion and Normandie sufficed not, and consented also to forsake their huge lands, which they possessed in the West Climate, and promised by their faith, to accompany the aforesayd Prelate beyond the River of Po. Prudent king William, when he heard of such great preparation, allowed not thereof, but thought it to be hurtfull to his kingdome, and many others, wherefore, he hastily sailed into England, and suddainly vnlooked for in the Ile of Wight, met with Odo the Bishop, now destroys with great pompe to saile into Normandy, and there the chiefest of his Realme being gathered together in the Kings hall, the King spake in this sort.

Vita W. Con.

King William returneth from Normandie to the Ile of Wight.

Excellent Peeres, hearken to my words diligently, and I beseech you giue vnto me your wholsome counsaile. Before I sayled ouer the Sea into Normandie, I commended the gouernment of England to my brother the Bishop of Bayon.

His Oration to his Nobles.

In Normandie many haue risen vp against me, and as I may say, vnward friends, and forraine foes haue inuaded me, Robert my sonne, and certaine younglings, whom I haue brought vp, and to whom I haue giuen armes, rebelled, and my kalfe Clients, and bordering enemies cleaued vnto them, but they profited nothing, God whose seruant I am, defending me: neyther yet obtained they any thing of mine, but yron in their wounds.

They of Angeow gathered together against me, whom with feare of preparation to warre I pacified, with those pallages I haue beene prouoked beyond the Sea, and there I haue stayed long, and laboriously haue giuen all my endeauour to publike commodities. In the meane time my brother hath greatly oppressed England and hath spoiled the Churches of their lands, and rents, hath made them naked of the ornaments giuen by our predecessors, and hath ledged my Knights, who ought to defend England against the Danes, Iutlhmen, and other enemies ouertroubleth me vnto me, and contemning me purposeth to traine them out beyond the Alpes, to forraine kingdomes, as ouer great dolour grieueth my heart, especially for the Church of God, which he hath afflicted.

Christian kings that haue raigned before me, haue loued the Church of God with honors and gifts of many kinds, they haue enriched it, wherfore now (as we beleeue) they rest reioycing with a happy retribution in a pleasant seate. Adelbert, and Edward, Saint Oswald, Adulph Aelfred, Edward the elder, and Edgar, and my cousin and most deare Lord Edward haue giuen riches vnto the holy Church, the Spouse of God, and my brother to whom I haue committed the gouernment of the whole Kingdome, violently plucketh away their gods, cruelly oppresseth the poore, with a vaine hope, stealeth away my Knights from me, and hath exasperated the whole Realme, by oppressing it with vnjust taxations. Consider you worthily what is to be done hereupon, and I beseech you insinuate it vnto me.

And when all they fearing to great a personage, doubted to pronounce sentence against him the valiant King said, hurtfull rashnesse is alwayes to be repressed, oftentimes heretofore hee straue against his Father, and then likewise stomached for certaine foilies, presently departed away to the King of France, &c. now the King committed his said brother Odo to prison, where he remained about the space of 4. yeres after, to wit, to the death of King VVilliam.

Odo Bishop of Bayon prisoner in prison. Anno 1085.

King William taketh of every hide of Land throughout England, five shillings, and then sayled ouer into the parts beyond the Seas.

Canute King of Denmarke, with a mighty Naule by the assistance of his Father in Law Robert Earle of Flaunders, was ready to haue come into England, whereupon King William hyring Souldiers out of all Fraunce, many thousands of Footmen and Archers, and taking some forth of Normandie, in the harnest time returned into England, and diuided his Souldiers throughout the Realme, charging the Bishops, Abbots, Earles, Barons, Sheriffes, and prepositors, to find them meat and drinke, but after, when he vnderstood that his enemies were impeached and let of their purpose, he sent backe part of his army, part he kept with him all winter, and in the feast of the Nativity he held his Court at Gloucester, where vnto three of his Chaplaines, he gaue three Bishoprickes, to Maurice the Bishopricke of London, to William that of Thetford, and to Robert the Bishoprickes of Chester.

Canute King of Denmark inuadeth England.

Bishops, Barons, Sheriffes, and Gentlemen keeping all diers.

Three of the Kings Chaplaines made Bishops.

King VVilliam caused all England to be described, to vnderstand what Land euery of his Barons did possesse, how many Knights fees, how many plough Lands, how many villans, how many beastes of cattell, yea how much readie monie euery man possessed within his Kingdome, from the greatest to the least, and how much rent euery mans possession might yeeld, thus the Land was replear with many mischieues, that came of this doing.

Anno 1086.

In the Whitson weeke King VVilliam honoured his sonne Henry at Westminster, where he then held his Court, with the order of knighthood, which order of knighthood, how the same was ministred I read not, but as writeth Ingulphus, In time of the Saxons before the conquest of the Normans, The Englishmans custome was, that he that should be consecrated to lawfull warfare, should the euening before the day of his consecration, to some Bishop, Abbot, Monke, or Priest, contrite and compunct, make confession of his sinnes, and absolued, should continue all night in the Church, and giue himselfe to prayers, deuotions, and afflictions: And on the morrow hearing the diuine seruice, should haue a sword put about his necke, and communicating at the same seruice, the holy mysteries of Christ, should thencefoorth continue a lawfull knight, which custome of consecrating a knight the Normans despised.

Shortly after King William commanded that Archbishops, Bythops, Abbots, Earles, Barons, Viscounts, with their power of men of armes, should meet him on the first day of September at Salisbury, whither when they were come, he caused the men of armes to sweare to him fealtie against all men.

The same yere Clito Edgar with licence obtained of the King, passed the sea with 200. men of armes, and went into Apulia, whose sister Christine entred into the Monasterie of Ramsey, and was made a Nun.

When the Normans had accomplished the will and pleasure of their Lord vpon the Englishmen, and that there was scantly any Noble man left of the English nation, to beare any rule ouer them, but was come to passe that it was a reproach to be called an Englishman: There spraug vp wicked tolls and customes, and the more people spake of equitie, the more wrong was done. Those that were appointed Justicers were the authors of all vnrighteousnesse, whosoeuer did take a Dere of Goate had his eyes put out, and no man durst speake against it, for the cruell King loued wild beasts, as though hee had beene Father of them, and by wicked counsel he brought to passe, that where men were wont to inhabit in townes and villages, and where God was wont to be honoured, there all kind of wild beasts did spoyt themselues, so that men said for certaine, that for the space of more then xx. miles, good profitable Corne ground was turned into a chase for wilde beasts: this was called the new Forrest in Hampshire, wherein be 9. walks, 9. Keepers, 2. Rangers, a bow bearer, and the Earle of Arundell is Lord Warden by inheritance. In building of Castles this king exceeded all his predecessors. Normandy came to him by inheritance, Cenomania he got by force of armes, he made Armorica or Brytaine obedient vnto him, in England he raigned alone. Scotland and Wales he subdued, he loued peace so well, that a yong Wench might without danger, carry a burden of gold through all places of England safe.

King William hauing giuen vnto Remigius a Monke of Fiskime, the Byshoppricke of Dorchester, he now misliking that the Bythops Seate stood in a small Cittie, whereas in the same Diocesse was the Citie of Lincolne, which seemed to be more meet for his Seat, he bought Lordships in the top of the Hill, and builded there a Church, and notwithstanding that the Archbishop of Yorke affirmed that place and Cittie to be part of his Diocesse, Remigius not regarding his words, proceeded & finished the worke which he had begun, and when he had finished the same, he adorned it with Clarks that were approued both in learning and manners: he was but small of stature, but stout of heart, browne of colour, but cleare and excellent in works: he was once accused of treason to the king, but a certaine seruant of his, by iudgment of fiery sword purged him, & returned him to the kings fauour.

Judgment by the fiery sword or fiery Iron.

There was a great water flod through abundance of raine, so that diuers hills being softened fell, and ouerwhelmed many villages. About the same time King Wil. had builded the Abbey of Battaile in Sussex, on the place where he ouercame Harold, in which place hee set Monkes, and dedicated the Church to the holy Trinitie, and to Saint Martin. He also founded Selby Abbey in Yorkeshire, and the Priory of S. Nicholas at Exceter, and the Abbey of Saint Stephen in the Citie of Caen in Normandy, where he was buried, he gaue priuiledges to S. Martins le Grand in London, which Church was founded before the Conquest by Ingelricus and Edwardus his brother, cousins to King Edward the Confessour) he also gaue to the Colledge all the Land and more without the Posterne called Criples gate of London, on either part of the Posterne, it is to say from the North corner of the Wall, as the Riuers of the welles there remaining depart the same Gate from the wall to the running water which entreth the Cittie, to wit, through the wall, and so through the Cittie, though vnder ground to the Riuer of Thames, and is called Walbrooke, al comming through and from the wall.) The description of king Williams Seale, with the names of the tenths, (among the which is R. Fitz Gilbert Prince, Willi. Willet Prince Arfastus the Kings Chancellour, &c.) I omit for breuitie.

Famine and Dearth of men, Marianus.

In the meane time a deuouring fire spread abroad ouer almost all the principall Cities of England, the Church of Saint Pauls in London was burnt, with the more part of the Cittie, which fire began at the entrie of the West Gate, and consumed to the East Gate. Maurice then Bythop of London, afterward began the foundation of the new Church of Saint Paul, a worke that men of that time iudged would neuer haue beene finished, it was to them so wonderfull, king William gaue toward the building of the East end of this Church, the choice stones of his Castle, standing neere to the banke of the riuer of Thamis, at the West end of the Cittie: he also gaue to God and Saint Paul, and to Maurice the Bishop and his successors, the Castle of Stortford with all the appurtenances, namely the land which Wil. Diacon, and Radulph his brother held of him, that they may possesse it for euer.

After Maurice, Richard his successor did also wonderfully increase the same Church, purchasing of his owne cost the large Crofts about it where were wont to dwell many lay people, which ground he began to compasse about with a strong wall of stone and gates.

King Henry the first gate to the said Richard Bishop of London, so much of the more or wall of the Castle on the Thames side, to the South, as should be needfull to make the Wall of the Church, and so much as should suffice to make a way to goe out the wall on the North side &c. It should seeme that this Richard inclosed but two sides of ſ said Church, as Comiterie of S. Paul, to wit, the South and the North sides, for king Edward the second granted, that the Churchyard should be inclosed with a Wall, for the murders, and robberies that were committed there. And when the Citizens of London claimed the East part of the Churchyard, to be the place of their assembly to the folkemote, and that the great People at that time there situate, was to the ende, that all the inhabitants of the Citie might heare. They claimed also the West side, that they might assemble themselues together with the Lord of Bayards Castle, for view of their Armour in defence of the Citie. This matter was in the Tower of London referred to Herusins de Stanton, and his fellow Justices Itinerants, but I finde not the Iudgment of that controuersie, wherefore it is like the Church prevailed, for the Wall euen to this time continueth although now on both sides vnder with dwelling houses.

Fot, he reigned in the parts of Britaine, which to this day (saith Windouer) is called Walwith, a most famous man in Warre, and in all maner of cruelitie, as in the acts of Brytaine is declared.

This yere King William remaining in Normandy, being at variance with Philip king of France, continued there a long while, whose patience the said Philip did (as men said) abuse with these or like words.

The King of England lyeth at Roane, and keepeth his Chamber as women doe when they be delivered of childe, and nourisheth his fat belly: With which talke King William being offended, said, when after my childebirth I go to Church, I will offer a thousand candles to him, swearing by Gods resurrection and his brightnesse, &c.

King Williams oath.

About the latter end of August King William in a great displeasure entred France, where he wasted and spoyled all as he passed.

King William wasted France

Last of all he fiered the Cittie of Spewre, and burnt it with our Ladie Church & two Anchors that were inclosed there, who perswaded themselues, they ought not to forsake their house and cane in such extremitie, whereat the king reioysing, chered his men to ad the fire and came himselfe so neere, that with the heate of his harnesse he got a disease, & to the increase of his sickenesse (it was said) his hosse leaping over a ditch did burst the inner part of his belly, with the paine whereof he was sore afflicted, and returned to Roane, where shortly after he ended his life.

King William fell sick and died.

This wise nobleman seeling himselfe grieuously diseased, deferred not to doe gods vnto himselfe in time to come, and also to many others wherefore he commanded all his treasure to be distributed vnto Churches, poore soldes, and ministers of GOD, and politikely assigned how much he would giue to euery one, commanded the same to be written out by notaries before him.

Gifts of king William to Abbeys & Churches.

Amongst the which gifts, I find that he gaue to the Church of Saint Stephen in Caine, and y Monkes there, two Mannors in Dorsetshire with their appendants, one Mannor in Devonshire, one other in Sffex, many hides of Land in Barkeshire, some in Norfolke, and a Mansion house in Weststreet of London, with many howses of Churches, but specially to be noted, he gaue his Crowne and ornaments to the same belonging, to the said Church, which he before had founded, for the redeeming of y which Crowne and kingly ornaments, King Henry the first, some to the said Conquerour, gaue to the said Church of Saint Stephen, the Mannor of Brideton in Dorsetshire. King William also sent great summes vnto the Cleargie of Pelvore that thereby the Churches which he had burned might be repaired.

Liberwine Wil. Conq. tour.

Of keeping faith and justice, of holding the Lawes of GOD, and peace of observing the priuiledges of the Churches, and Statutes of Fathers, he admonished all those that were present, and his sayings worthy to be remembred, mixed sometime with teares, he eloquently vttered in this sort.

Being laden with many and grieuous sinnes (O Christ) I tremble, and being readie to be taken by and by vnto the terrible examination of God. I am ignozant what I should doe, for I haue borne bzought vp in the feates of armes, euen from my childhood, I am greatly polluted with effusion of much bloud, I can by no meanes number the euils which I haue done, this 64. yeers, wherein I haue liued in this troublesome life, for the which I am now constrained without stay to render an accompt to the iust Judge.

Ed. ye son of William the Conquerour by his Q.

King William 64. yeers old.

When as my Father (of his owne free will going into banishment) committed vnto me the Dukedome of Normandy, I was but a tender boy, that is to wit, of eight yeres old, from which time euen vntill this present, I haue always sustained the weight of armour, and haue governed the same Dukedome almost 56. yeers, in great danger of enemies. Those whom I haue governed, haue often layd snares for me, and wickedly haue bzought vnto me dammages and great injuries.

Castell of St. William.

Turchetill my nourisher, and Osberne Herfakus sonne, the Dapifer or Sewer of Normandie, and Earle Gilbert the Father of the Countrey, with many other necessarie for the common wealth, they haue fraudulently slaine with both their Lzuges: Hertofore I haue tried the fidelity of my Countrey: oftentimes in the night for feare of my life I rose, I haue beene secretly carried by my Horse Castler out of the priuie chamber, and brought into little houses and hauing no signes of preheminence, least by those meanes that lodged my death I would be found: The Frenchmen if they had good and hard gouernement are of valure, they are most valiant, and in deadfull things inuincible, they excell all men, and for their strength, they conteine to ouercome all their enemies. Otherwise they teare in peeces and consume one another, for they count no bollions, they desire seditions, and are ready to all mischiefe, for them therefore be constrained with a strong censure of gouernment, and with the bridle of Discipline, constrained to walke by path of Justice, for that their pleasure, with the yoke they be permitted to goe, like a wild vntamed Ade, they and their palace shall be ouerwhelmed with penury and reprochefull confusion. And this I haue lately learned by many repeals, my neighbours and kinsmen that sought by all meanes to offend me against all right and men, with often conspiring, haue risen vp against me.

Guy Harold the Duke of Burgundy his sonne, by my aunt ridulph rendred me still to goe, to, I received him courteously comming out of a strange Countrey, and honored him as a brother, and gaue vnto him Vernone and Stonard, not a little part of Normandie, he hath derogated much from me both in his words and acts, detesting and declaring me to be a Bastard, to degenerate and to be vnworthy gouernment, and as an enemy hath defamed me, what need I say more, he hath falsified his faith vnto me, he hath rebelled against me, and my Peeres, Ranulph of Raven, and Haimo Dentched, and Nigell of Constantine, and many other more he hath withdrawne from me, and hath constrained them by his wicked perswasions to be perjured persons with him, diminished thereloze of his homage and fidelitie which he owed vnto me, he went about to take all Normandie from me.

Thus therefore being yet without a beard, I was constrained to take vp armes against him, and at the plaine at Valesdune to fight against my kinsman and owne seruant.

Then God assisting me, betweene Caine and Argiers I ouercame my enemies, who by Gods appointment being ouerthrowne, I freely possessed my Fathers right.

That done I besieged a Fort of Bavon, and therein included Guy sore wounded, & fled from the battaile, nor I suffered him to depart with them, vntill I had expelled him as a common enemie out of Normandy, and obtained all his strong holds. Not long after this another grieuous aduersity came vnto me, for my vncles Malgerius Archbishop of Roane, and William his brother, to whom I had freely given Arches and the Carledome of Calegu, condemned me a bastard and called Henry the King, and Eagelram Carle of Ponthe against me. Presently after I had heard of their enuyes in Constance I entred into the Bayne, many Cowards ioyned me, and sent before me to Arches a few souldiers which were more fermenter to fight, and I followed after, not with a great armie, and ouerpassed the strong Fort, but before I could come into the Countries betweene the two Riuers Jordan and Gerone, my souldiers had preuented Carle Engelram hasting to enter the Castle, and had slaine him manfully fighting, (for he was a most sharpe souldier) and had put to flight all his companies.

Those of the Castle I bidded with an hard beseiging, and forced the periured Carle to exile, neyther yet permitted I him in all this life to returne to that which he had lost. And also the forward Prelate that was neyther benigne to God, nor trustie vnto me, I deposed by decree of the Pope from his Bysshops seate, and placed for him Maurice the venerable Clearke whom God gaue vnto me from the Cittie of Pergame in Italy. Henry delighted with his kingly power, and hot with warlike boldnesse, and greatly pricked forwards with the derogations of mine enemies oftentimes hath endeauoured to tread me vnder as one vnarmed, and by many meanes to feare me, and to appoint vnto me vnlawfull faces. Often with a huge armie he hath entred my Land, but he neuer reioyced of the prey of my spoyles hee often entred my Lands, but he neuer merrie, nor without shame returned home to his owne, many strong men he brought hither with him, whom for that by me swozd and my Souldiers (woe woyth the griefe,) they were slaine, hee neuer carried backe againe, Therefore King Henry ouermuch inflamed against me, diuided his huge hoste into two parts of Fraunce, that he might oppresse our Lands with a double hurting in with violence, for he himselfe brought an army of eight hundred Formen, into Chpdocene Diocesse, that they might destroy all euen vnto the River of Some, and the other company he committed vnto Odo his brother, and to Raynold of Clarimount, and to two Consuls, Ralfe of Mountdesire, and Widen of Montfice, that by the shallow places they might some enter into Normandie, and inuade Deani Calcesi, and the whole Towne of Roane, and should vterly destroy with the swozd, fire, and robbing, euen to the Sea.

This therefore I vnderstanding, on the other side I went forwards, not sluggishly, against the Kings tents, and repoled my selfe and my Souldiers, by the shore of Some, and where soeuer he endeauoured to destroy my Land with weapons and swozd, I prepared a repzoch but Robert Carle of Auceniis, and Robert Mortimer, with other most expert Souldiers, I sent against Odo, and his Legions, who when almost at Calvus, which is called the dead Sea, they met with the Frenchmen, the companies on both parts being prouided, a terrible battle was fought, and on both parts great effusion of bloud for euery where there were most valiant fighters, & euen vnto death ignozant to flie, here were the Frenchmen for desire of gaining, there strike the Normans with a feruent hope of straining, and defending themselues and their meeting houses, as the last God helpeth, the Normans vanquished and the French men fled away. And this battaile they had beyond Some in Winter, before Yeul, the eight yeare after the battaile at Valesdoune.

Then Wido Earle of Pontine was taken, and Odo with Raynold, and others that were lastie to quicke scelle of Foe, were driuen away. Raulphe also the Earle had likewise beene taken vnlesse Roger the Prince of my warre had supported him, for lately he had done homage vnto him.

Therefore in such necessitie he requited him with a faire competent seruice, when he restored him their dayes in the Castle, and after permitted him to goe safe home to his owne, for this offence I cast Roger out of Normandie, but a little after being reconciled vnto him, I restored him the rest of his honours, yet the Castle of Mortemere, wherein he kept mine enemie, by right, as I suppose, I take from him, but I gaue it to William de Warren, his kinsman and lawfull vassall.

Wido Earle of Bayon I held in prison so long as it pleased me, and after two yeeres I received againe homage of him, with such honour, that from thenceforth he should alwaies be faithfull vnto me, and should euery yeare giue vnto me Souldiers seruice, wherefoeuer I commanded with an hundred Souldiers.

This done I gaue him reloardes, and so honoured him away in peace. After this fight ended, by and by as I certainly had tryed the rumours, I sent by Raulphe of Diceu those things that had chanced on the farther side of Some vnto the King of France, which thing he hearing, straightwayes rose vp, and with his Nobles speedily fled, and neuer after did lie one night in my Land, and then rose from my chiefdome with vnnumerable pressures on euery side I haue beene tossed, but by the grace of God, I haue beene honourably deliuered from them all.

Therefore I was made hatefull to all my neighbours, but God assisting me, in whom alwaies I put my trust, I was ouercome of none.

This oftentimes haue the Britaines, and they of Angeow, and Cenomania grieuously tryed.

Godfrey Martell Earle of Angeow, and Conan Prince of the Britaines, & Robert Frise, Prince of Puterell, haue layed waite to intrap me, by many subtill inventions, but God keeping me, they were neuer satisfied of their desire.

A Royall Diademe that neuer any of my predecessors did beare, I haue gotten, which onely heauenly grace, not right of inheritance hath giuen to me. What labors, and perilous conflicts I haue sustained beyond the Seas against those of Orcester, Chester, and the Northumbers, the Scots, the Gaules, Norwegians, and Danes, and against other aduersaries that indeauoured to spoile me of the Realme of England, it were hard to declare. In all which plot of ground which come vnto me: And although manly gentlenesse vpon such triumphes reioyceth, yet inwardly a carefull feare pricketh and byteth me, when I consider that in all these, cruell ruthes hath raged. Wherefore I humbly beseech you O Priests, and ministers of Christ, that you will commend me to the Almighty God, with your Prayers, that he will forgiue me my sinnes, wherewith I am greatly prelled, and by his bespeakeable mercy, will make me safe amongst his.

My treasures I command to be giuen to the poore and to Churches, that those things that haue beene heaped by by wicked deeds, may be disposed to holy vses of the Saints, for you doe remember how swartly I haue loued you, and how strongly amongst all emulation defended you.

The Church of God, that is to wit, our mother, I neuer violated, but in euery place where reason required did willingly honour, I haue not sold Ecclesiasticall dignities, simonie alwayes detesting, I haue reiected in election of Pastors, I euer searched out the merit of life, and his learning of wisedome, and so neere as I could committed the gouernment of the Church to the most worthy.

And this may be faithfully proued in Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, this in Anselme Abbot of Becco, this in Gerebert of Fontanell, and in Duran Trearne, and many other Doctors of my kingdome, whose famous praises (as I suppose) sounding in the vttermost cozners of the earth may be tryed.

King William commendeth Lanfranke for seuen misdemeanors.

Such fellowes I chuse to talke with, in the fellowship of these I found truth and wisedome, and therefore reioycing, I wished to enioy their counsels. Nine Abbeyes of Monkes, and one of Nunnes, which by my fathers were founded in Normandy, I helping by the assistance of God haue encreased, and with augmentations of many things, which I haue giuen them they are gloriously magnified.

Moreouer in the time of my gouernment seuentene Monasteries of Monkes, and fiue of holy Nunnes are builded, where graet service vnto God, and much almes to the poore is daily bestowed for the loue of the chiefest King. With such Camps Normandy is feated, and in these forts let the ponglings learne to fight against the Diuell, and dices of the flesh. Of these truely either I by Gods inspiration haue beene builder and founder, or else a feruent helper, and well willing intender.

King William remembreth his sinne William.

All things also which my Noble men in lands or rents, haue giuen to God and his Saints for their spirituall health in Normandy and England I haue courteously granted, and the Charters of the gifts, I haue freely confirmed with Princely authority against all emulations and troubles.

These studies I haue followed from my first yeeres, these I leaue vnto my heires to be kept in all times. In this, my children, follow me continually that here and for euer before God and men, you may be honoured.

This chiefly, O you (my very bowels) I warne you, that you continually cleaue vnto the company of god and wise men, and be obedient to their gouernment in all things if you will long long gloriously prosper. For is the doctrine of godly wisedome, to discerne good from euill, to keepe iustice at all times, and with all force to shunne wickednesse, to saue and helpe the sicke and poore, to suppresse and vanquish the proud and vniust, and to bridle them from troubling of the simple, to frequent deuoutly the holy Church: and aboue all things to loue the worshipping of the diuinity, and to be obedient without any wearinesse day or night, in aduersity and prosperitie vnto the law of God.

The Dukedome of Normandy before I fought against Harold in the vale Senlac, I granted vnto my Son Robert, for that he is my first begotten, and hath now receiued homage almost of all the Barons of this country: & honor granted cannot be taken away againe, but without doubt I know that truely it will be a miserable region that shall be subiect to his dominion or gouernment: for he is a proude & foolish knaue, and to be long punished with cruell fortune.

King William not willing Williams inheritance by conquest.

I do constitute none heire of the realme of England, but commend it vnto the euerlasting creator whose I am, & in whose hands be all things, for I possessed not such an honor by right of inheritance, but by the instinct of God, & with much effusion of mans blood I woke it, and the periured Harold being slaine, or his fauourers driuen away, I made it subiect to my dominion.

The naturall sonnes of the Realme I hated more then right required, the Noble men and vulgar sort I cruelly pored, many vniustly I disherited, innumerable, especially in the towne of Yorke, with hunger and sword, I brought to death, for the which the Countreymen beyond Humber take in against me the armie of the King of Swenueland, and slew Robert of Comin, with a thousand souldiers within Duresme, and other of my Nobles and most approued young Schollers in diuers places. Wherefore moued with an immoderate rage, like a wood lyon I hasted vnto the Northerne Englishmen, their houses, their corne and all thier prouision and houshould stuffe I commanded to be burned, and great droues of beasts, and flockes of sheepe euery where to be killed: therefore I punished with the sword of such horrible hunger the multitude of both sex, and so many thousands both of young and old of the most beautifull Countrey (Oh woe worth the griefe) I cruelly killed. The offices therefore of this Realme, that with so many sinnes I haue obtained, I dare not giue to any but to God, least after my death, they be made yet worse by my occasion. William my Sonne, who alwayes from his first yeeres hath sticked vnto me, and according to his power hath willingly obeyed me in all things, I wish in the Spirit of God long to liue, in health, and if it be Gods will, happily to flourish in the throne of the kingdome. These and many such like words William spake and an amazednesse inuaded the Leaders by, that politikly measured things to come.

King William gaue to his sonne Henry.

After that Henry the younger son heard nothing to be giuen vnto him of the kingly treasure, lamenting with teares, he said vnto the king: And what (father) doe you giue vnto me? To whom the king said, Fiue thousand pounds of siluer out of my treasure I giue vnto thee. To this Henry said, What shall I do with that treasure, if I shall not haue a dwelling place of habitation? Whereunto his father answered, Bee of a patient mind my son, and comfort thy selfe in God quietly suffer that thy elder brother goe before thee. Robert shall haue Normandy, and William England, thou in thy time shalt haue all the honour that I haue gotten, and shalt excell thy brethren in riches and power. These words thus spoken, the king fearing least in such a wide Realme sodaine trouble should arise, wrote a Letter vnto Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury, and being signed with his owne seale, gaue it vnto William Rufus his son, commanding him presently to saile ouer the Sea into England, and that done, he killed and blessed him, and speedily directed him to take the Crowne, who in short time came to the poore called Whitsland, and there he heard his father to be dead, Henry also hasted diligently to receiue the nominated summe of money, and to call necessary fellowes, in whom he might trust.

Words of K. William to his sonne Henry.

King Williams sons left him and sought to helpe themselues to his possessions.

In the meane time the Phisitions, & the kings seruants that kept the languishing Prince, and the Nobles that came to visite him, began to speake vnto him for the prisoners that he kept in hold, and humbly besought him to haue compassion vpon them, and to release them. To whom he said, Morcare the noble English Earle, I haue long kept in prison and that vniustly, but it was for feare, left by him, if he were at liberty the Realme of England should be troubled. Roger also of Bitole, for that he very stubbornely raged against me, and prouoked Ralph of Guadar his sisters son, and many others against me, I haue streightly kept in prison, and swoune, that in my life he should not come forth. So many haue I cast in prison deseruing it, though their owne peruersitie, and sundry other mo, for feare of sedition to come, for this is the rule of Righteousnesse, as the diuine Law by Moses giuen vnto the gouernors of the world, requireth, that the wicked be oppressed, left they destroy the innocent. But now being at the point of death, as I desire to be saued & absolued by Gods mercie from my sinnes, so I peticularly command all prison doores to be opened, and all prisoners except my brother, the Bishop of Bayon, to be releasted, and for the loue of God to be freely dismissed, that he may haue mercy on me. Notwithstanding I haue decreed that they depart out of prison with this condition, that first for more security they giue their oath to the officers of the common wealth, that they will by all meanes keepe peace in England and Normandy, and according to their power manfully resist all aduersaries of the same.

All prisoners to be releasted excepthis brother Odo.

And when Robert Earle of Poyton heard his brother to be commanded by the kings sentence to perpetuall prison, he greatly sorrowed: for Herliwinus of Canterwill tooke vnto wife Herliwine duke Roberts Concubine, of whom he begate two sons, Odo & Robert. And Duke William, who afterwards was king, enriched his Father in law with many great honours in Nor-thandy and England, and for by with great poſſeſſions his ſonnes, Rainulph whom he had begotten of another wife, and Odo and Robert, his brethren by the mother: for after that he had for ſmall offences expelled out of Normandy William firnamed Werelenge Earle of Morton ſon to the Earle Magenus, he gaue the Earledome of Morton vnto his brother Robert Herliwinus ſonne.

Hugh alſo Biſhop of Bayon ſonne of Ralfe Conſule, being dead, he granted the foreſaid Prelates dignity to his brother Odo, whom afterwards in England hee made ruler of y Earledome of Kent. To conclude, him, for his exceſſiue crueltie (as before is plainely related) king William tooke in the Ile of Wight, & kept foure yeeres in priſon, neyther yet at his death for his inſolence would releaſe him. Wherefore the foreſaid Earle of Morton greatly ſorrowed, and for his brother both by himſelfe, & by his friends humbly intreated, and with prayers wearied the languiſhing king. And when many had earneſtly deſired him for the Biſhop of Bayon, the king wearied with the requeſts of ſo many, ſaid: I maruell that prudently you ſhew not, whom, or what a man he is, for whom you intreat, doe you not aske for ſuch a man, as lately hath beene in appearance, a contemner of religion, and a crafty ſtirrer of ſedition? haue not I corrected him now theſe foure yeres? a Biſhop who ought to haue beene a moſt iuſt gouernour of the Engliſhmen, and was indeed the worſt oppreſſor of the people, a Monke, and a deſtroyer of Abbeyes. In deliuering a ſeditious perſon, you doe euill, and deſire a great hurt vnto your ſelfe, it is plainely ſeene, that my brother Odo is light, and ambitious, following the deſires of the fleſh, and vnmeaſurable crueltie, and he will neuer be brought from bawdrie, and hurtfull vanities. And this I haue in many things reped, therefore I haue impriſoned, not a Biſhop, but a tyrant, and without doubt the deſtruction of many thouſands. Theſe things I ſpeake, not of hate as an enemy, but as a father of the Countrey, I prouide for the Chriſtian people, for if hee behaues himſelfe chaſtly and modeſtly, as of very right becommeth a Prieſt and miniſter of God, a greater ioy would bee at my heart then I can declare. Euery one pronouncing the amendment of the Biſhop. The king ſaid againe, Will I, will I, your petition muſt bee granted, for that I being dead, ſodainely a vehement mutation ſhall be of all things. Againſt my will I grant, that my brother bee deliuered out of priſon: but know you, that by him, death, or a great impediment ſhall bee brought to many. From Balbricke alſo the ſon of Nicholas, for that he foliſhly left my ſeruice, and without my licence went into Spaine, I take all his lands for a puniſhment, but now, for the loue of God, I reſtore them to him againe. A better young Souldier in armes then he is, I ſuppoſe is not to be found, but he is prodigall and light, and wanderreth to diuers places.

King William or Odo Biſhop of Bayon.

Thus king William, although grauen with enormous paines of the inward parts of his bodie, yet effectually enioyed his wit and liuely ſpeech, and vnto all demanders gaue prompt and profitable counſell of matters of the Realme.

To conclude, the 10th of September on a Thurſday, the Sunne now clearely ſpreading his beames throughout the round world, the king raiſed vp, heard the ſound of a great bell in the Metropolitane Church, and aſking wherefore it ſounded, his ſeruants anſwered, Sir, it ringeth now to praiſe of our bleſſed Ladie. Then the king with great deuotion lift vp his eyes vnto heauen, and holding abroad his hands ſaid: I commend my ſelfe to our bleſſed Ladie Mary the mother of God, that ſhe by her holy prayers may reconcile me to her moſt deare Sonne our Lord Ieſus Chriſt. And theſe words ſpoken, he preſently paſſed vp the ghoſt, on the ninth day of September, when he had raigned 20. yeres 8. moneths, and 16. daies, at the age of threeſcore and foure yeres. The chiefe Phyſitions, and others that were preſent with them that had kept the king all the night without groaning or calling, now ſeeing him vpon a ſudaine to haue preſently departed, were greatly aſtoniſhed, and made almoſt mad. Furthermore the riotter ſort of them ſtraight, taking their Horſe, departed away, and haſted home to defend their owne. The inferiour ſort, or citizens alſo, ſeeing their Maiſter in ſuch ſort to haue departed, ſnatched away the armour, veſſell, apparell, linnen, and all the Kings houſhold-ſtuffe, leauing the Kings dead body almoſt bare in the floor of his houſe, fled away. Behold, I pray you what worldly fidelitie is, euery one as a kite ſnatched what he could of his ſtuffe, and preſently fled away with their prey. Impietie therefore (Iuſtice falling downe) impudently commeth forth, and exceedingly raueinous pillage, vpon the reuenger of raueinous pilers.

The fame of the kings death flew abroad, with ſwift wings, and wide and broad brought ioy or feare to the hearts of the hearers. For the death of King William the very ſelfe ſame day that he died at Roane, was vnto his kinsmen in Rome and Calabria alſo ſhewed, as afterwards by them in Normandy it was truly related. Truely the euill ſpirit greatly reioyced, when he ſaw the ſeruants that vehemently gaped to ſnatch and take away all by death of the Iudge to be free. O worldly pompe how contemptible art thou, becauſe thou art euer vaine and ſlippery? Rightly thou mayſt be compared to a bubble in the water, that in a moment ſo ſpeedily ſcarceſt by thy ſelfe, and ſudainly thou ſhalt be brought into nothing. Behold the mighty Prince, vpon whom aboue a hundred thouſand Souldiers willingly waited, and whom many Courtiers with trembling feared, now is in his owne houſe by his owne ſeruants ſhamefully ſpoyled, and from the prime, vnto the third houre, left vpon the bare ground. For the Citizens of Roane hearing of the death of the Prince were greatly feared, and almoſt all like drunken men, were ſo troubled, as if they had ſeene a multitude of enemies to bee neare vnto vnto the Citie, euerie one departed from the place where he was, and aſked counſaile of his wife, or his companions that he meete, what were beſt to doe. Euery one either carried or decred to carrie their gods from one place to another, and with feare hid them, leaſt they ſhould be found. At the laſt the religious men, Prieſts, and Monkes, gathering their powers and ſenſes together, ordayned a proceſſion, and decently went forward vnto Saint Geruaſius Church, and according vnto the cuſtome of holy Chriſtians commended the ſoule of the King to God.

Then William the Archbiſhop commanded that his body ſhould be carried to Caine, and there in the Church of Saint Stephen the firſt Martyre, which he had builded ſhould be buried. But his brethren and kinſmen were now gone from him, and all his ſeruants had wickedly left him as a barbarous perſon, wherefore there was not one of the Kings knights to be found that would take care for the exequies of his body.

Then Harluinus a certaine Countrey knight, being pricked with his owne good nature, manfully, for the loue of God, and honour of his Countrey, tooke vpon him carefully to ſee the Kings Funerall ſolemnized. Wherefore the aſſeſſers with apparelments, and carriers of the dead bodie, and a Wagon hee hyred at his owne proper coſts, they carried the dead bodie of the king to the hanes of Soine, and putting it in a Ship, by Sea and by Land brought it vnto Caine. Then the Lord Guilebert Abbot with the Conuent of Monkes, reuerently came forth to meet the corps: to whom, weeping, and praying, cleaued the whole multitude of the Clergy and laity: but preſently peruerſe fortune powred out vpon all together a great terrour, for freight wapes a terrible fire burſt out of a certaine houſe, and caſt by huge flames, and hurtfully inuaded a great part of the Towne of Caine. All the Clarkes therefore with the lay people run to repreſſe the fire, onely the Monkes endeo the office begun, and ſtaning, brought the Kings bodie to the Abbey Church.

To conclude, to burp this great Duke and Father of the Country, were gathered together all the Biſhops and Abbots of Normandy, of the which was William Archbiſhop of Roane, and many other Biſhops and Abbots which were long to name.

All they came together at the ſolemne Funerall of the famous King, and burped him in the Peesbyteryie, betweene the quiere and the Altar. The Maſſe ended, when the Coffin was now ſet in the earth, but the body yet remained on the Bere: The great Guilebert Biſhop of Ebroicen, went vp into the pulpit, and eloquently pronounced a long Sermon of the magnificence of the dead King, that he valiantly had enlarged the bounds of Normandy, and had extolled his Country more then all his predeceſſours, peace and iuſtice he kept throughout all his dominions. Theeues and Robbers he manfully chaſtiſed, with the rule of Right counſelle, and the ſecular Prieſts, Monkes, and vnarmed people he ſtrongly fenced with the ſword of vertue. The Sermon ended, and for pittie many weeping and proteſting his words to be true, he required the people with this addition, for that no man mortall can liue in this life without ſinne, in the loue of GOD we pray you all for the dead Prince, that you will make interceſſion for him vnto Almighty God, and if he haue offended any of you, charitably to forgiue him.

Then Anſelme Fitz Arthur riſing from the company, with an high voice vttered ſuch a plaint. This ground whereon you ſtand, was the floor of my Fathers houſe, the which that man for whom you do make interceſſion, when as yet he was Duke of Normandy, violently tooke from my Father, and all right denyed, vnlawfully founded this houſe. This ground therefore I challenge, and openly reclaime and in Gods behalfe I forbid that the bodie of the taker away by violence be couered in the earth, neyther yet ſhall he be buried in my inheritance.

After that the Biſhops and other Noble men heard this, and vnderſtood by his friends who teſtified him to haue ſaid true, they ſent for the man, and all violence ſet apart, mollified him with gentle prayers, and made peace with him: for, for the place of his burial, they preſently gaue him threeſcore ſhillings, and for the reſt of the ground which he claimed, they payed him an equiualent price, and ſo in a ſmall time, for the ſaluation of their ſpeciall friend whom they loued, they made an agreement, and (by the conſent of Henry his ſonne) 100. pound of ſiluer was giuen. Further, when the bodie ſhould be put in the Wombe or Coffin, and was violently preſſed, that the ſame, through the folly of the rough Paſons, was ſhort, and ſtreight, his fat belly (not bowelled) cracked, and an intollerable ſtinke filled the ſtanders about, and the reſt of the commonalty, ſo that the ſmoake of frankencenſe, and other gummes and ſpices, copiouſly aſcending from the ſenſers preuailed not to exclude the woſt ſmell: wherefore the Prieſts haſted to ſtuffe the burtall, preſently to feare to get them to their celles. And thus haue I truely ſhewed the tall of the Duke, and not a vaine Comedy to make men laugh: which alſo ſufficeth to prooue, that the bodie of King William could not be found vncorrupt more then foure hundred yeares after the ſame was buried (as ſome haue fabuled) neyther yet his bodie to be of eight foot length: for then, ſuch as wote of his life, rafigue, and deſcription would ſo haue noted, who all agree in one, that he was a man of meane ſtature, big bellied, &c. And laſt of all, for a full confuting of the ſayd Fable, when his reſtleſſe bones, which ſo hardly had obtained entombing (as ye haue heard) did afterward as vnluckily againe loſe it in the yeare of Chriſt, 1562. to wit, when Chaſtilli-on, counduting the remnant of thoſe that eſcaped at the battell of Dreax, tooke the Cittie of Caine, certaine ſauage ſoldiers, as well Engliſhmen as others accompanied with foure Captaines, did beate downe, and vtterly deface the Noble

Noble tombe and monument of that renowned Conqueror, and victorious king, pulling out all his bones, which some of them spitefully threw away, (when they could not finde the treasure they falsely surmised had beene layed vp there) and others, to wit the English snatched euery one to haue some peece of them, not making any wonder of them, as they would haue done, if the same had exceeded the length and bignesse of mens bones of latter yeares, whereas indeed, there was no such thing noted in them, as I haue beene certainly informed by English men of good credit, who were present eye witnesses at the spoile of ỹ monument & bones, and brought some part of them into this realme. Theuit maketh mention of this matter, in his vniuersall Cosmographie writing of Caine.

Issue of Will. Conquerour.

Now to speake of the issue of this noble Conquerour, whereof I haue before partly touched: He had by Matild his wife daughter to Baldwin Earle of Flanders, Robert surnamed Curthos, as some write, but as saith Cornelius Martin, and Peter Balthazar, in their bookes of the Earles of Holland, Countesse, to wit in English, thoze thigh, who after his Father, was Duke of Normandie. Richard that dyed yong in the new Forrest, as he was hunting in the place where his Father had ouerthrowne Churches, and Townes to make harbour for beastes, he was buried at Winchester, on whose monument he was written Duke of Bologne. William surnamed La Rouse, oz the Red, who succeeded in the Kingdome of England. And Henry vnto whom hee gaue 5000. pound of siluer out of his treasurie (as ỹe haue heard before.) He had daughters, Cicilie Abbesse of Caue, Constance married to Allan Earle of Bzitaine, Adela wife to Stephen Earle of Bloyse, Margaret promised to Harold King of England. And Aclinor betrothed to Alfonso King of Gallia.

Cornelius, Martin. Peter Balthazar.

William the Red fetched from Winchester the treasure, which all the yeares of his Fathers Raigne had beene gathered, and gaue the gold to the Monasteries, and to the parish Churches, euery one fiue shillings of siluer, and to euery borough Towne he gaue an hundred pounds to be dealt to the poze. He also adorned a memoriall of his Father with a great heape of siluer, and gold and precious stones.

King William restaureth gold. King William gaue money to the poore.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King WILLIAM RVFVS.

WILLIAM le Rouse oz Red the third sonne of VVilliam the Conqueror, began his raigne the ninth day of September, in the yeare of our Lozd, 1087. and was crowned at Westminster by Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterburie, the first day of October. He was of person a square man, red coloured, his haire somewhat yellow, his forehead foure square like a window, his eyes not one like the other, not of any great stature though somewhat big bellied, he was variable, inconstant, couetous and cruell, hee burthened his people with vnreasonable taxes, pilled the rich, and oppressed the poze, and what he thus got, he prodigally spent in great banquetting and sumptuous apparell, for he would neither eate, drinke oz weare any thing, but that it cost immeasurably deare. Asfoz example, it was in those dayes written (and foz vs now to be noted) that in a morning his Chamberlaine bringing him a new paire of hosen, he demanding what they cost, and the Chamberlaine answering three shillings, the King being wroth, said, Away beggar that thou art, are those meet hose foz a King to weare, bring me a paire of a marke, oz thou shalt soze repent it: then his Chamberlaine brought another paire that were much worse then the first, foz a better paire could not be got) and said they cost a marke, wherewith K. William was well pleased. Thus farre haue I noted the saying of king VVilliam, because it importeth the simplicitie of apparell in those dayes vsed, so farre different from the excesse of this present time.

Odo Bishop of Bayon, and Earle of Kent, with his brother Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Herefozd, and almost all the nobles of England, raised warre against King VVilliam, and would haue had Robert his eldest brother to be King: but King William by faire words pacifying some of the principall conspirators, besieged the residue in the Castle of Rochester, (which Odo Earle of Kent had lately repayred) and with much labour lastly ouercame them.

Lanfranke Archbishop of Canterbury deceased. He renewed the great Church of Canterbury, restoring vnto Saunoys to the same. He repaired the Walls of that Cittie, builded two Hospitals, the one at Saint Iohn, the other at Barbalsdowne. He restored the Church of Rochester from 4. secular Clarkes, to 50. Monkes. He alwayes attended his booke, and trauailed to correct ỹ corruption of Writers. He was a great benefactour to the Abbey of S. Albans, giuing towards the reparations thereof 1000. Markes, and also got Redborne to be restored thereunto. Moreouer by his testament he gaue to ỹ Church a hundred pounds of siluer, besides ornaments.

When Lanfranke was dead, King William kept in his owne hands the Churches and Monasteries of England, after their Pastors were dead, making great spoyle, and letting them out to farme to such as would giue most for them.

This King William so long as Lanfranke liued, seemed to abhorre all kind of vice, so that he was accounted a mirroz of Kings: But now when Lanfranke was dead, he first shewed himselfe for a while tractable, as it were, betwixt vice and vertue, and after, to wit, toward his latter dayes, all endeauoz of vertue waxing cold, the heat of vices increased in him, he set his mind to exacting: and one Ranulph a Clarke (oz Secretarie) a man of base kindred, by his faire tongue and subtill wit, being come to promotion, did pyche forward his couetous heart. This Ranulph was a Poller of the rich, and an abbor of the poze, a counsellozof other mens inheritances, an inciuill lawyer, the king would oft laugh at him, and say he was a man alone, which could compasse his matters so well to please his master, he being the Authoz: Churches were set to sale, so some as the Incumbent was dead: foz straight way this Ranulph was sent to take inuentoxy of all that was found, and the same to be consecrate to the Kings vse, and inquirie was then made foz one meet to be set in the place of the Bishop, Abbot, oz other deceased, not foz their worthinesse, but foz their money that would giue most, who at the length should haue that promotion naked and bare, notwithstanding they payed deare foz it. There was no man rich but Collectors of money, no Clarks but men of Law, not of Conscience, no Priests but Farmours. What crime soeuer any man had committed, so soone as he did appeale foz the kings aduantage, by accusing other, he was heard, yea the rope was taken from their necks. The Courtiers deuoured the substance of the husbandmen their tenants: Then the laying out of haire, and the superfluitie of garments was found, the tenderuesse of the body, and wrestling with women, nice going with dissolute behauiour was in vze, there followed the Court a number of effeminate persons, and great companies of ruffians, whereby the same Court was not a place of majestie, but a brothel-house of vnlawfull things, such as ought to be abolished.

This was a token of great insolencie in the King, that when the Iewes at London came to him, and brought him presents, he encouraged them to fight against the Christians, swearing by Lukes face, that if they did ouercome, hee would become one of their sect.

On the 11. of August, about 3. of the clocke in the afternoone, a great Earth-quake made all England afraide, with a terrible wonder, so ỹ all buildings (old as it were) leape vpwards and immediately set themselues in their old place: after the which there followed great scarcitie of fruit, and late haruest of Corne, so that ỹ same was scarcely tuned at S. Andrewes tide.

Robert de Olly the second, founded the Priorie of Olney besides Orford.

King William being desirous to take Normandie from his eldest brother Robert, and to bring it vnder his dominion, he first bought the Castle of S. Valery of one Walter, and the Castle of Albemarle of Odo, and put into them men of armes to waste Normandy. Which thing being knowne to Duke Robert, he sendeth Messengers vnto his Soueraigne Philip King of France, requiring him to come and ayde him in Normandie, who indeed shortly after brought a great power, and besieged one of the forenamed Castles, wherein King William had placed a number of men of armes. At which siege when King William vnderstood, he sent ouer no small portion of money vnto King Philip, requiring him to withdrawe his siege, who receiuing the money returned home.

King William subdueth his brother Robert.

Now to returne to king William: he in this meane time making warre against his brother Robert Duke of Normandie, tooke the Castles of Valerulfe, and Aibemarle, the reuolting his souldiers into his brothers Country, he began to spoile and robbe. But through the diligence of friends, agreement was made betweene them, vpon condition, that Robert his brother should giue vp to the king his right, the Castles that he had gotten within the Countie of Eu, the Castles of Falaigne, the Abbey of S. Michaels Mount, and Peterborough, &c. And those Castles which were reuolted from the duke to the countie of Eaune, with the Castles which stood against him in Normandy, the king should enioine them, and restore them to the Duke, and all the lands in England pertaining to the Normans, which for their loyaltie to the Duke they had lost, he should restore to the Normans. Also he should giue to the Duke so much Land in England as was conteined betweene them. Moreouer, it was agreed, that if the Duke died without true male, the king should bee his heyre: and in the case if the king died without lawfull male, the Duke should be his heyre. Which couenants were confirmed by the oath of 12. Barons on the kings part, and as many on the Dukes part.

Henry inuadeth his elder brother.

In the meane time Henry younger brother to the king and Duke, with a power of men of armes, entred S. Michaels Mount, and wasted the kings lands, taking spoylers, & robbing other. Whereofore the king and duke with an army besieged Mount S. Michael, all the Lent season oft times fighting with their brother Henry, where they left both men and horses, but preuailed little. The king on a time coming out of his pauilion, and seeing the enemies a far off riding in a brauerie, he alone rode against them, and set vpon them, thinking that no man durst be so bold as to withstand him: but straight way his horse was slaine vnder him, & himselfe driuen to the ore foot: and when the knight that had ouerthrowne him, tooke his sword in his hand to haue slaine him, he cryed out, Hold thy hand knaue I am the king of England. The whole company of that Garrison, knowing the voyce, straightwaies they reuerently take him vp from the ground, and bringht him another horse: and he looking for no stirrop, leaping vp on the Horseback, and with an angry countenance beholding all that stood about him, say: Who was it that ouerthrew me? Who the knight which had done the deed, said: I not thinking you had beene the King, but a knight, did ouerthrow you. With the which answere the King being pleased, swore by Lukes face thou shalt be my knight, and thou shalt be written in my white Booke, with the reward of a worthy knight.

Malcolme King of Scots, with a great armie inuaded Northumberland, meaning if he had sped well to proceed further, but hee was disappointed in his first attempt, notwithstanding he returned with great prayes. Whereof when King William vnderstood, he returned into England with his brother Robert, & shortly after with no small Nauy and Army of horsemen and footmen, he went into Scotland to inuade king Malcolme, but before he could come thither, almost all his Nauy was drowned, and many of his horsemen perished through hunger and cold. King Malcolme met with king William, which when Duke Robert beheld, he called to him Clito Edgar, whom king William had expulled out of Normandy: vpon truste of whose helpe, he made peace betwixt the two Kings with condition, &c. Duke Robert also pacified the kings wrath against Clito Edgar.

Anno Reg.

On the 19. of October, a vehement stroke of lightning, shaking the steeple of the Abbey at Winchelscombe, made a great hole in the stone, worke thereof, neere to the top, rent one of the beames in the Church, and cast downe to the ground the head of the Crucifix with great violence, and shake the right leg of the same Crucifix, the Image of our Lady also, that stood by the Crosse, being shaken with the blow, fell to the ground. Also a great smoake afterwards with a marueilous filthy smell, filled all the Church, which continued long after: although the Monks with holy water, and incenses, went about the houses of the Monasterie, singing Psalmes, &c.

Temples & Churches burnt by lightning.

Winchelscombe.

And on the 17. day of November, a mightie tempest of wind out of ỹ Southwest, beat down in London fire hundred and fire henles, and shaked the Churches, especially the Church of Saint Mary Bow in Cheape, where the Wind brake in with such a vehement force, that two men were therewith slaine in the Church, and the rose being raised with the beames thereof were carryed in the ayre a great while, and at ỹ last fire of the said beames were driuen with their fall to fast into the ground, that there appeared of some of them the seauenth, and of some the eight part, to wit, but some some aboue the ground: which beames 92 rafters, were seauen and twenty, 92 eight and twentie some long, which was a wonderfull thing to se them so pierce the ground (not pained then with stone) and there to stand in such order, as the workemen had placed them on the Church, vntil such time as they were cut euen by the ground.

Tempests & Winds at London.

Bow Church burnt by lightning.

The Tower of London was also broken, &c. When King William had repayred such castles as the Scots had vnpayred, and builded the new Castle vpon Tine, he returning south of Northumberland, came through Mercia into Westchester, and kept the Duke with him till Christmas, but he would not performe any promise made with him, which the Duke taking grieuously passed ouer into Normandy with Clito Edgar the 23. of December.

Castle in Cumb. 1091.

Osmond Bishop of Salisbury founded the Cathedrall Church of old Salisbury, and on the morrow after the dedication thereof, the steeple was fired by lightning.

Bp Salisbury. Steeple.

This yeare deceased Wido the 42. Abbot of S. Augustines by Canterbury. After whose burriall, the Monks of Saint Augustines went to King William to obtaine licence to chose a new Abbot, which request was not onely denyed them by the King, but hee also charged them vpon a great paine, not to elect any, saying, that hee would hold in his hands, all the Spirituall liuings in the whole realme, and would dispose of them at his pleasure: to the Monks of S. Austines returned fruitfraire of all hope hauing. Now it happened at the same time, there was in that Monasterie a certaine monke, in religion young, but graue in discretion, a Norman borne, and King VVilliams kinsman, by name called Hugh de Floriaco. This Hugh hauing beene a valiant souldier, had long serued king VVilliam the elder, and the said King VVilliam Rufus, as well in Normandy, as in England. Hugh, as yet by protection a souldier, on a certaine time comming to Canterbury with King VVilliam Rufus, vpon deuotion did visit S. Augustines Church, where by Gods speciall grace rauished with the loue of God, and delighting in the chast life of the Monkes, hee would not goe out of the limits of the Monasterie before he had procured to be made a monk and brother of the said Monastery. Which being granted, the said Hugh went into Normandie, distributed his goods vnto his kinsmen, and to the poore, because hee had no wife nor childe, and returned vnto the Monasterie, and put on the Monkish habit, and so remained a Monke.

1091. Bp Salisbury. Steeple.

A souldier becommeth a monke, and then Bow of Saint Augustines.

The Abbot VVido being dead, (as it is said) at the last it was decreed that two circumpect Monkes, together with the said Hugh, who had carefe continued one yeare of probation, should bee sent to the king to procure his fauour by prayer or price, that he would grant them licence to elect an Abbot. When these presented themselues vnto the Kings sight, and saw his cosin, who in time before had serued him in the bzauery of a souldier, to be now clothed in habit of a Monke, hee was so displayed in minde, that gushing out with teares hee sayd, I doe grant you this cousin of mine to be your Abbot, and at your petition I doe giue him the gouernment of the Abbey of Saint Augustine, neyther doe I permit you to chose any other, whom, vnlesse you doe presently receiue, I will shortly burne your Abbey to ashes. Then the Monkes seing no remedie, submitted themselues to the Kings will in the premisses. But the foresaid Hugh long time refused the honour, saying, that he was as well vnworthy, as insufficient, because hee was a man in a manner vnlettered, and one that had very little skill, as well in religion, as in Ecclesiasticall ordinances, but the King and the Monkes forced him to accept the honour offered, neyther did the King suffer him to depart from the Court before hee were consecrated Abbot, which was done in the Kings Chappell at Thestminster, by Maurice Bishop of London. This Abbot did many laudable acts to the great commodity of the church. King William moued wars against the Welshmen, but preuailed not, for he lost many of his best knights, and much cattell, as well at this time, as at other.

John Bishop of Welles, a Norman borne, by consent of King VVilliam for a great summe of money translated his Bishoppes Sea to Bathe.

This yeare a noble man of the Normans blood named Picot, vicecomes or Sheriffe, at the request of Hugolin his wife, founded a Church to the honour of God and S. Giles, neere vnto the castle of Cambridge, but afterward, to wit, In Anno 1102. the Chanons were removed to Barnwell, by Paine Peuerell. The Towne of Cambridge take name of a faire large bridge, made ouer the riuer Grant there running, and so named Granbridge (corruptly Cambridge) it increased by meanes of this bridge, which was the ruine of Grantcester, sometimes a famous citie, situate little more then a mile from Granbridge. The castle was builded the first yeare of William Conquerour, as may appeare by the description in Doomes day Booke in the Exchequer, which hath thus. The bozough of Granbridge defended it selfe for one hundred yeare in the time of Edward the King. In this bozough haue beene, and yet are 10. wardes: in the first ward are 54. mansions, of them 2. be wasted: In this first ward Allan hath 5. burgesses that pay nothing, the earle Morton hath 3. mansions of the land of Lindichel: and there be 3. burgesses, which in the time of Edward the K. paid 5. shillings and 8. pence halfe peny, at this day they pay nothing: Rolfe of Bant hath 3. burgesses that pay nothing. Roger seruant to Bishop Remigius hath 3. burgesses that pay nothing. Erchingor hath 1. burges that payeth nothing: this ward was accounted in the dayes of King Ed. for 2. wards, but for the castle 27. houses were thrown downe. In the second ward were 48. mansions in the time of king Ed. whereof 2. be wasted, of them 13. yeld nothing, the other 32. pay all customes, Earle Allan hath of them 5. burgesses that yeld nothing, and 9 remaine in the hands of the Englishmen. In the third ward were 41. mansions, of them 11. be wasted, the other thirty pay all customes. In the fourth ward were 45. mansions, of them 24. be wasted, the other 21. pay all customes. In the fift ward were 50. mansions, one of them is wasted, all the rest pay the customes. In the seuenth ward were 37. Mansions, 3. of those 37. Frenchmen haue, and pay nothing. In the 8. ward were 37. mansions, sions, a Priest holdeth one and payeth nothing, 3. are wasted. In the ninth ward were 32. mansions. In the tenth ward were 29. mansions, 7. of them are wasted, but yet they defend themselves. The customes payable for this towne were 7. pounds by yere. And for Langable 7. pounds, and 2. ores and 2. pence. The burgesses in the time of King Edward sent the Sheriffe their cares thrice in the yere: now they are demanded nine times. They found neither Boats nor Wagons in the time of K. Edward, which they doe now by custome set upon them. They claime of the Earle Picot a common pasture, which hee hath taken from them. The same Picote hath made there three Milles, which taketh away the Pasture, and destroyeth many houses, and one Mill of the Abbot of Ely, and another of the Earle Allan, the Milles yeld 9. pounds the yere. The same Earle Picote hath of the heriot of the Lagemans seaven pounds, and one Palfrey, and one Knights armour. Alurike Godricson when hee was Sheriffe, had of one of them twentie shillings for a heriot. Thus much Doomes day for Granthridge, whereof more shall be said in place convenient.

Abbey of Chester.

Hugh Lupus Earle of Chester, sent into Normandie for Anselme, by his Counsell to build an Abbey of S. Werbridge at Chester.

King William lying sicke at Gloucester, and thinking he should haue dyed, his Barons put into his head, his promise to God and the world that he would amend his life. And forthwith he gaue unto Anselme Abbot of Becco, the Archbishoppicke of Canterbury: and to Robert Bloet his Chancellor, the Bishoppicke of Lincolne. But when the King had recouered his health, he repented him that he had not sold those Bishoppricks for a great peice of money.

Anno. Reg. 6 1093. Lewes in Sussex.

William VVaren first Earle of Surrey, and Gundred his wife, finished the Abbey of Lewes in Sussex.

Carlile Citie and Castle builded.

King VVilliam builded againe the Citie of Carlile, which was destroyed by the Danes 200. yeares before: he also builded a Castle there, and out of the South parts of England sent men to inhabite.

This yere was a great Famine: and after, so great a mortalitie, that the quicke were scant able to burie the dead.

King VVilliam made great Warres in Normandie against his brother Robert, through the which both England and Normandy were sore oppressed with exactions.

The Citty of Gloucester spoyled by Welshmen. An. reg. 7. 1094.

The Welshmen spoyled the Citty of Gloucester, with a part of Shzetwsbury, and won the Ile of Anglesey to their subjection.

The Bishoppricke of Thetford was translated to Norwich, by Herbert being Bishop there, sometime Abbot of Ramsey.

King VVilliam sent his brother Henry into Northumberland with a great power, because Robert Mowbray Earle of that countrey refused to come to the Kings Court: the country was spoyled, the Earle was taken, and many were dispersed, some had their eyes put out, &c.

King William with a power entred Wales, but not being able to follow the Welshmen among the hils, he builded two castles in the borders, and returned.

King William builded two Castles in Wales.

Great preparation was made by the Christians to goe against the Infidels at Jerusalem: Peter the hermite being their first leader, and after Godfrey of Lorraine, called Godfrey of Bolloigne.

An. reg. 1095.

In a councell holden at Salisbury, William de Owe was accused to the king of treason, who whiles hee pronoked his accuser to fight with him in combate, by the Kings commandement his eyes were plucked out, and his stones cut off. Many innocent men were also accused, of which number was VVilliam de Aluerie, a man of godly personage, Godfather to the king, his Aunces sonne, and his sewar, yet the king commanded him to be hanged: which VVilliam making his confession to Osmond Bishop of Salisbury, was first whipped throughout by all the Churches of the citie, who dealing his garments to the poze, went naked to hanging, blowping his flesh with often kneeling upon the stones: and at the place of execution, hee satisfied the Bishop and people, saying, So GOD helpe my soule, and deliuer it from euill, as I am guiltelesse of the thing that I am accused of: and after the Bishop had commended him to God, he was hanged.

Councell of Salisbury. Cruelty of Wil. Rufus.

Robert duke of Normandie take his iourney towards Jerusalem, and laid the Dukedome of Normandie to gage to his brother king VVilliam for 6666. pounds of siluer. Paulus Æmilius saieth 13600. pound.

An. reg. 1096. Marianus. Normandy pawned.

The 22. of September, a blazing starre was seene, and for the space of 15. dayes after, the greatest part whereof pointed toward the east, and the lesser toward the west. There were also starres seene, which did, as it were, shoot out dartes one at another.

Blazing starre.

The Dukes Godfrey, Beamond, and Robert besieged the Citie of Nice with fiue thousand Horsemen, and ten thousand Footemen, and take the same, with the wife of Soliman, and his Sonnes. They also take the Citie of Antioch.

The Church of the holy Trinity in Norwich was founded by Herbertus, being first Bishop there.

An. 10 1097.

King VVilliam returned out of Normandy into England, and after Easter with an army of Horsemen and Footemen, went the second time into Wales, that he might kill all the male kind there, but hee could vnaeth kill or take one of them, notwithstanding of his owne people hee lost diuers, and also many Horses.

King William went against the Welshmen.

After this king VVilliam sent Clito Edgar into Scotland with an army, that he might make his cousin Edgar the Sonne of king Malcolme king, and expulse Donwalde, which had inuaded the kingdome.

Clito Edgar sent against the Scots.

About the feast of Saint Andrew, K. VVilliam went into Normandy, and shortly after, to wit, in the moneths of December and January deceased deceased the Abbots of Saint Edmundsbury, of Abindune, of Peterborow, of the new Monastery at Winchester, and VVulthenus Bishop of Winchester.

This yere King VVilliam builded Westminster Hall.

King William making great wars in Normandie, subdued to his dominion the Citie of Mants, and a great part of that Prouince: but in the meane time with tares, exactions, and tributes, he did not onely poule, but shaue and flay the Englishmen.

Hugh Earle of Chester, and Hugh Earle of Shzewsbury, assayled the Ile of Anglesey with an Army, and slew many Welshmen, whom they tooke in it, and some they dismembred by cutting off their hands and stones, and putting out their eyes: and a certaine Priest called Kenredus, a man of great yeares, of whom the Welshmen tooke their councell, for all matters that they tooke in hand, they drew him out of the Church, pulled out one of his eyes, and cut out his tongue.

The same time Magnus King of Norway, the sonne of Olaus, the sonne of Harold Harnager, when he had subdued to his dominion the Iles of Orkeney and of Man, with a few ships he arriued in the Ile of Anglesey, but when he would haue come a Land with his vessels, Hugh Earle of Shzewsbury with many armed men of warre on the Sea shoze met him, and as it was then reported, by a shaft he was stricken: he ended his life, and his brother Robert de Bellame succeeded in his Earledome.

The Princes of the Pilgrimes with their armies take their iourney towards Jerusalem, besieged it, and take it on the tenth of July, placing there a King, and a Patriarke, and afterward fought with the Soudan of Egypt, (who besieged them in Jerusalem) and ouercame him.

King VVilliam being returned out of Normandy into England, kept his Feast of Whitsontide very royally at Westminster, in the new Hall, which he had lately caused there to be builded, the length whereof was 270. foote, and 74. foote in breath: and when he heard men say that the Hall was too big, and too great, he answered and said, This Hall was not big enough by the one halfe, and is but a Bed-Chamber, in comparison of that I minde to make. A diligent searcher might yet finde out the foundation of the Hall, which he had purposed to build, stretching from the River of Thames, euen unto the common high way. As writeth H. Huntingdon, he challenged the inheritance of Prelates, he pilled and shaued the people, with tribute, especially to spend about the Tower of London, and the great Hall at Westminster.

King William hauing transferred into his treasurie three hundreth pounds by yere sozth of the Bishoppricke of Durham, and fiue Poneths being part of the fourth yeare, from the death of VVilliam Bishop of Durham, he gaue the Bishoppricke to Ranulph, who for certaine excellent parts about the King was named the Kings Chaplaine, but some haue written that he gaue the King a thousand pound for that Bishoppricke. This Ranulph was first familiar with Maurice Bishop of London, but falling at variance because the Deanary was taken away from him, he went to the King in hope of a higher place, in which point his hope was not deceiued, for being admitted, and hauing a good wit and ready tongue, in short time he obtained to be preferred afoze all other estates of England, who being called to bee Procurator, or Chancellor of the whole Realme, did many times behaue himselfe so proudly, abusing his authozitie, that he little esteemed to offend many, who laboured with continuall accusations to cloud the cleare mind of the King toward him, whereof when they failed with vaine labour, they imagined how to haue killed him. For which cause, one Gerald, armed with audacitie and deceit of other, taking a boat with a few persons, met with the Chaplaine Ranulph at London, humbly requesting him that he would make speed unto his maister Mauritius, Bishop of London, lying very sicke at his house upon the Riuer of Thames, who being almost ready to depart the world, greatly desired to speake with him. In affirming the truth whereof, he had brought a boat for him from his Maister, wherein hee might more speedily bee carried.

The Kings Chancellor.

The Kings Chancellor in great danger of death on the Sea.

Ranulph suspecting nothing, entred the boat with a few of his company, which boat Gerald with a straight course, directed in the middle of the streame unto the Sea: and when the Chaplaine demanded why they rowed so long, and did not turne to the shoze, they fained that the Port was further off, where they should haue conuenient place to land.

In the meane time the Chaplaine perceiuing a great ship to lie at Anchoz in the midst of the flood, which, as it seemed, awaited for his comming, did presently suspect the deuise of their deceit. And being transported unto the suspected Ship, in the which was harboured a great number of armed men, perceiuing no hope to escape, he call the King which he ware on his finger into the sea: and his Secretary did throw his Seale into the middest of the flood, least though those Seales the state of things might be disturbed, by counterfeit Procelles and Writs set forth by the deceiuing enemy. After this his men are set ouer, being first bound with an oath not to disclose any thing of the stealing away of their Master.

The Kings Chancellor cast the Great and Priuie Seales into the Sea.

Now the Ship leauing the Riuer, with hoised Sailes entred the deepe Sea, directing their course towards the South, and Ranulph sitting in the foze part of the Ship. There arose a contention among the Shipmen for the manner of his death: and two are chosen forth, either to heaue him into the Sea, or to knocke out his braines, who should for reward obtaine those garments wherewith he was cloathed: of which persons, when the one would haue his coate or vpper most garment, and the other would also possesse the same, this contention protracted time of his death. At length their suddainly arose a fierce wind from the South, which troubled the Sea from the very bottome, and the Heauens were couered with darkenesse. Which tempest so tossed the Boat hither and thyther, that they could neither goe forward, nor returne backe againe to Land. And when the Sayle and Cables were broken, the Ship was not onely carried on the water, but the also carried in her the water, nothing being more certaine then death to them all, which they looked for, onely such was the course of the Sea, that the Ship was returning to the place from whence she came, and yet the waues beating her back the murderers a new determine the death of the Chaplaine, least he escaping should reuenge such iniurie.

But one which was next to Gerald in the ship abhorring this wickednesse, and being neere to the Chaplaine, with sorrowfull repetition said, Dufalas Ranulph, thou shalt now be murdered, but if thou wilt pardon me this wicked conspiracie, I will stand by thee to thy defence, as a companion of thy life or death. Whereunto he (as he was alwayes bold spirited) with great noise calling vpon him, said: What dost thou thynke Gerald? What dost thou request of vs? Thou art my man, thou owest faith to me, call backe thy mind from the wicked deed thou intendest, demand what thou wilt, for I am he that can giue more then thou canst demand. Then Gerald not so much allured by words, as feared with the authoritie of the man, did consent, and bringing him out of the Ship, now beaten to the shore, did procure him honourable furniture, at his owne house. But not trusting the former promises, he procured his owne safety by banishment into perpetuall exile. Ranulph therefore calling Knights together, is brought to London with many armed men, and a great noyse of people, to the astonishment of all men, supposing him to haue beene slaine, he as then was iudainly reuiued and set againe as executor of the Kings affaires, and reconciled the Bishoppicke of Durham, being consecrated in the Church of S. Paul in London.

The Kings Chancellour escapeth death and is made B. of Durh.

King Williams courage and his words.

Anno. 13. Hector Boetius. Great water flouds.

Godwins Sands.

1100. Simon Bishop of Salisbury deceased.

King William returning out of Normandy, kept his Christmasse at Gloucester.

The Monastery of Gloucester which Abbot Serle had builded from the foundation was now dedicated. W. Malmesb. Dunclarge red to repair.

This yere many strange things came to passe the diuell did visibly appeare to men, and sometime spake vnto them.

Wonderous, in the Towne of Finchhamsted in Barkshire neere vnto Abindune, a spring did continually by the space of fifteene dayes flow plentifully with bloud, (or the likenesse thereof) so that it did colour and infect the next water vnto it. Of which things, when men told the King thereof, he laughed them to scorne, and gaue no credit to them, neyther yet to his owne dreames, nor the visions that other men told him of. A Spring the like to bloud.

King William on the morrow after Lammas day, hunting in the new Forrest in Hampshire, in a place called Chorcyngham, where since a Chappell was builded, sir Walter Tirell shooting at a Deere, vnawares hit the King in the breast, that he fell downe starke dead, and neuer spake word. His men (especially that knight) got them away, but some came backe againe, and layd his body vpon a Colliers Cart, which one sole beast did draw vnto the Citty of Winchester, where he was buried on the morrow after his death, at whose burtiall, men could not weepe for ioy. King William slaine.

This King was taken out of the world in the midst of his vnrighteousnesse, who being wicked to his owne people, and to strangers, was most wicked to himselfe. The Countries about him he prouoked with warres, and England was so miserably oppressed vnder him, that it could not recouer, for he and his traine spoiled and subuerted all things.

He died in the yere of Christ 1100. and in the 13. yeare of his raigne, on the second day of August, when he had raigned 12. yeares, eleuen moneths, lacking eight dayes, and was buried at Winchester, in the Cathedrall Church of Sonasterie of Saint Swithen, vnder a plaine flat marble stone before the lectorne in the quere, but long since his bones were translated in a Coffer, and laid with King Knuts bones. He gaue vnto the Monkes called de charitate in Southwarke, the great new Church of S. Saviour in Bermondsey, which he had caused to be builded for them, and also his Mannor of Bermondsey it selfe, with all the pertinances, and confirmed vnto them all whatsoeuer Alwin Child their first founder, Robert Bishop of Lincolne (who also gaue to them the Towne of Charleton) or other had giuen vnto them. William Rufus troubled the Saints about him with wars, and quelled his owne people.

He also of an old Monastery of Monkes in the City of Yorke, founded an Hospitall, and dedicated it to Saint Peter, for the sustentation and finding of the poore, as well men as women, which Hospitall was since greatly augmented by King Stephen, and by him dedicated to Saint Leonard. Lib. Bermo.

HENRY

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King HENRY BEAVCLARKE.

HENRY, the yongest sonne of William Conquerour borne in England, at a place called Selby in Lincolneshire, brother to William Rufus, and the first of that name, for his learning called Beauclerke, brought vp in the study of the liberall arts at Cambridge, chiefly (through the trauaile of Henry Newborow Earle of Warwicke, (who appeased all debates at that time to the contrary) obtained the dominion ouer this Realme of England and began his raigne the second of August, in the yere of our Lord 1100. and was crowned at Westminster on the fift day of August, by Maurice Bishop of London, because at that time Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury, was by persecution of William Rufus exiled. Malmesb. Rudborne. Matth. Paris. Matth. Westm. Polyd. Virg.

This Henry was a noble Prince, strong, and mighty of body, high of stature, and amiable of countenance, blacke haires, and that somewhat long about the eye-browes, faire eyes, broad breasted, well in flesh, full of merrie conceites. He was excellent in wit, eloquent in speech, and fortunate in battaile, and for these 3. he had 3. notable vices, Couetousnesse, Cruelty and Lechery.

He maried Mawd the daughter of Malcolme and Margaret, King and Queene of Scots, of whom he begate William and a daughter named Mawd. At the beginning of his Raigne, he restored the state of the Clergy, allwaged the grieuous payments, reduced againe Saint Edwards Lawes and amended them. He put out of his Court all nice and wanton persons.

Measures reformed.

He reformed the old vntrue measures, and made a measure by the length of his owne arme which was then called Vlna, an Elle, and now the same is called a yard, or a metwand, &c.

Fire of Aire and Water restored.

Her restored to his Subiects the vse of lights in the nights, which lights and also fire, had bene forbidden by his father to be vsed, after the ringing of a Bell, at 8. of the clocke at night.

Edgar King of Scots, did homage to this Henry.

Priory of S. John of Hierusalem.

This yere Iordan Briset Baron, the sonne of Raufe, the son of Brian Briset, founded the house of S. John of Hierusalem, neere vnto London, by Smithfield.

Clerken well.

The same Iordan gaue 14. acres of ground lying in the field next adioyning vnto Clerkenwell, to build thereupon a house of Nuns, where in he with Muriel his wife, were both buryed in the Chapter house.

Robert Shorthose, Duke of Normandy, the kings eldest brother, which was now returned from Jerusalem, made warre vpon his brother Henry for the Crowne of England, who assembled a strong army, and landed at Portesmouth, but by mediation a peace was made on condition, that Henry should pay 3000. Marks yerely to Duke Robert: and if the one dyed without issue, the longer liuer should inherit. Winchester was brent the 17. of May, and Glocester was brent the 20. of May.

Robert Fitzham, who came with the Conquerour out of Normandy, with Sibell his wife, after to Robert Belasme Earle of Shrewsbury, founded anew the Church of Teukesbury, with the offices thereto belonging, and enriched it with large possessions, and was there buried. Theuke sbury builded.

Robert de Belasme, Earle of Shrewsbury, eldest Sonne to Roger Mountgomerie, strengthened the Towne and Castle of Shrewsbury, so did he the Castles of Bridgenorth, Tichile, and Arundell, with victuals and armed men against King Henry: but the King being warned thereof, he gathereth his power, & besiegeth Bridgenorth, which Towne was yelded vnto him. And this being knowne to them of Arundell, they forthwith submitted themselues, with condition, that their Lord Robert de Belasme, might be permitted freely to passe into Normandy. Also they of Shrewsbury sent the keyes of their Castle, and pledges of their obeysance, and then Robert with his brother Ernulfus & Roger of Portiers obiured this land for euer. 1102. Earle of Shrewsbury rebelled. Ann. reg. 3.

This yere the Priory and Hospitall of S. Bartholomew in Smithfield was begun to be builded by Rahere (a man of singular and pleasant wit, and therefore of many called the Kings Jester and minstrell) in a place which before had bene a marsh ground, a common laistall of all odure and filth, and the place where felons and other transgressors were executed. This Rahere ioyned vnto him a certaine old man named Alfune, that had (not long before) builded the parish Church of S. Giles, nigh a gate of the City of London, then called Creeples gate: this man he died as a counsellor and companion in his building of the Church and Hospitall, and the one of them, to wit, Rahere, became the first Prior of that Priory, & the other, to wit, Alfune, became Hospitaller or Proctor for the poore, and went himselfe daily to y chambles, & other markets, where he begged the charity of denout people for their reliefe, promising to the liberall giuers (alleadging testimonies of holy Scripture) reward at the hands of God. Donmow the Ele.

Iuga Baynard, Lady of little Donmow, caused Maurice Bishop of London, to dedicate ẏ church of Donmow which she had founded, and the same day she gaue to it halfe a hide of Land. This Lady Iuga was late wife to Baynard, that first builded Baynards Castle in London.

William Earle of Morton disherited.

W. Malmesb.

William Earle of Morton, was disherited of all his lands in England, and all his Castles made euen with the ground, and the Countrey sore bewed with the Kings oractions.

Now the flames of warre being translated into Normandy, prouailed there, being kindled by the assemblies of traytors, as with fire which catcheth in all things that is about it. Normandy is a patient sufferer of mischiefes, though it be no large region: it both tolerate sedition very long, and by reskoring of peace arileth into a fertile state of subsistance, letting out the bridle-maker into France with free passage. Contrariwise, England doth not suffer Rebels long. Robert de Belasme Earle of Shrewsbury, comming into Normandy, having confederates of his wickednes, among whom was W. Morton, the sonne of Robert the Kings vncle, who from his childhood euer enuied the glory of Henry, for not content with 2. Earledomes of Morton in Normandy, and Cornewall in England, he required the Earledome of Kent, which his vncle Odo held, being so presumptuous, that he would say, he would not put on his vppermost garment, except he might obtaine of his brother his desired possessions. But the king delaying him with subtile answers, did not onely deny him that which he demanded, but began to challenge from him such things, as he said, he held vnlawfully, whereupon the said William being disherited of all his lands in England, in a rage got him into Normandy, where besides the daine assaults hee made against the kings Castles, he raged against Richard Earle of Chester, the sonne of Hugh, inuading, taking, and spoyling, such things as appertained vnto him, who was then but a child in yeares, and in the Kings wardship.

There appeared about the Sunne 4. Circles, and a blazing starre.

An Reg. 5. 1105. King Henry sayled into Normandy.

King Henry rayled a great army, and passed the Sea into Normandy, against his brother Robert, and got the Towne and Castle of Caen and brent Bayon, with the Church of S. Mary, by the helpe of the President of Angeow, & many Castles more he wan, whereupon the Priories of Normandy submitted themselues vnto K. Henry.

The Flemings hauing a great part of their Country ouerflowned, came into England, and obtained a place to inhabite in, nigh the River of Twede, but afterward they were removed thence, and sent into West Wales.

Endo Dapifer of Sewer to king Henry, founded the Monasterie of S. Iohn in Colchester of regular Chanons of S. Austines rule, commonly called blacke Chanons, and this house was the first that euer was erected in England of y order. K. Henry hauing set things in an order in Normandy, he sayled & returned into England, ẏ he might increase his strength, and returne again.

An. reg. S. Iohns Colchester.

Robert Duke of Normandy, came to his brother at Northampton, and friendly required him to beare brotherly lone toward him, but King Henry seking his conscience accusing him, for obtaining the kingdome by defrauding of his elder brother, fearing men more then God, first he reconciled the Nobles of the Realme with large promises, thinking afterwards to make amends for his great wrongs, by founding of an Abbey which he purposed to build.

1106. An. reg.

The Duke returning into Normandy, the King followed with a great power, where betweene them were many sore battailes fought, but at the last the valiant and most stout man Robert was taken, and William Earle of Morton, Robert de Belasme, William Crispine, and other, to the number of 400. men of armes, but Robert de Belasme escaped, when he saw that many of his men were taken.

This yere appeared a blazing starre, from 3. of the clock till nine, and on the Paunday Thursday was seene two full Mones, one in the East, and another in the West.

The first Chanons entred into the Church of our Lady in Southwarke called S. Mary Ouery, founded by William Pountlarge knight, and William Dancys Normans, William Gifford Bishop of Winchester, assisting them in that worke. Algodus was first Priot there.

S. Mary Ouery.

When King Henry had set in order Normandy according to his pleasure, he returning into England, brought with him his brother Robert, and William of Morton, and put them in perpetuall prison: from whence shortly after Duke Robert deuising his keepers, sought to escape, but he was taken as he fled, sitting on his horse in a deepe mire and tough clay where he stucke fast: and by his brothers commandement, had his eyes put out, and kept Traitor till his dying day, which was about 26. yeers after, when he pined away for sorrow and griefe of mind.

1107. An. reg. K. Henry put out the eyes of his elder brother Robert.

It appeareth by the priuate historie of Dunstable, that in the ioyning of the 2. high waies of Watling and Ikening, there were great woods which were felled by King Henry, to represse the enills that were there committed by one Dunne a most famous Theefe of that time, of whom the place was called Dunstable, the said king therefore built there a Bozow, by the which he also erected a pallace for himselfe, making the Burgesses there as free, as any other Burgesses of ẏ Realme were, to the which Towne the K. granted both Faire and Market.

successors there serving God, the towne of Dunstable, and 4. cultures of land about the towne, with great priuiledges, as appeareth by his Letters Patents, this Priory was valued at the generall suppression to dispend by the yeare, 344. li. 14. s. 2. d. ob.

Also this yeare King Henry began to build the new Castle with the Chappell and Towne of Windsore. on the hill, one mile from the old Towne of Windlesore.

This yeare Maurice Bishop of London, Robert Fitzhamon, Roger Bigot, founder of the Monastery of Monkes at Thetford, Richard de Reduers Counsellors to the King, Milo Crispen, and many other Noblemen of England, deceased, Richard de Bewmes was elected Bishop of London, and was consecrated by Anselme at Pageham, Gundulphus Bishop of Rochester deceased, after whom succeeded Radulphus.

Gerard Archbishop of Yorke deceased at Southwell, when he had sate Archbishop seuen yeares and almost 6. months, and was buried at Yorke. Thomas the ponger, the Kings Chaplaine, ẏ nouell of Bewer take succeeded.

This yere ẏ Priory of the holy Trinitie, within Aldgate of London, was founded by Matild the Queene, in the Parishes of Mary Magdalen, S. Michael, S. Catherine, and the holy Trinitie, all which are now but one Parish of Christs Church: in old time called holy Rode Parish: the gaue to the same Priory the port of Aldgate, with the soke thereunto belonging, which was of her demaines, and is now called Aldgate ward.

King Henry with sundry expeditions brought vnder him the Welshmen, and to pull downe their stoutnes, he sent all the Flemings that inhabited England thither which Flemings of late were come hither, when a great part of Flanders was drowned, and also in time of his father, by alliance of his mother, insomuch, that though their great multitude, they seemed grieuous to the Realme, wherefore he sent them all with their substance and kindred, into Rose in Penbrokeshyre, a Country in Wales, as into a smile, that he might cleanse the Realme of such noysome people, and also suppresse the wilfulnesse of the enemy: and not long after he made expedition thither, compelling the Welshmen to giue him for pledges the sonnes of the Nobilitie with some money, and much cattell, and returned.

Henry Emperour of Rome, sent Messengers into England, requiring to haue Mawd ẏ Kings daughter giuen him in marriage, which was granted, by the king, who then toke 3. shillings of euery hide of Land through England.

The 21. of April, Anselme Archbishop of Canterbury deceased, and on the next morrow after being on thursday, was buried at Canterbury, when he had sate Archbishop 12. yeres, being of the age of 76. yeares. he bestowed on Christs Church in Canterbury much money, as well in building, as in ornaments, he wrote many bookes vpon the holy Scriptures, he was twice expelled the Realme, at the first for 3. yeares, and wanted the whole profits of his Bishoprick. The second banishment was almost 4. yeres long, and lined onely 2. yeares after the second restoring. After whose decease, King Henry assumeth the custome of his father and brother, and inuadeth as well the possessions of the Archbishop of Canterbury then void, as of all, and any that fell void. And putteth extreamly in practise, the decrees of the Synode at London, touching Priests wiues, exacting of them great summes of money, and at the last without respect, alloweth imposition in that respect vpon euery Church, which diuers therein not guilty, did euill like and much curse. The Archbishoprick was void after ẏ death of Anselme, 5. yeres and fiue dayes, the king receiuing the reuenues as from the beginning. He made saleable all spirituall promotions, selling to his Chaplaine Ragnolph, the Bishoprick of Durham for a thousand pounds, and Herbert Losinga the Bishoprick of Thetford, &c.

Bishoprickes and other spirituall promotions sold for money.

An. reg. 10

Richard the tenth and last Abbot of Ely deceased, and was buried among his predecessors at Ely. This Richard being a man of a great wit perceiuing that the ancient priuiledges of his house were daply violated by sundry great personages, especially, by the Bishop of Lincolne, who challenged Episcopall iurisdiction ouer the house, notwithstanding ẏ the same was clearely exempt therefrom by their ancient priuiledges, went to the king, and dealt with him in such sort, that he obtained his regall consent, to change the Abbey into a Bishopricke: vnto the which place was named for the first Bishop one Harueus, then Bishop of Bangor. And because there was yet no Prouince assigned, where this new bishop should haue iurisdiction, the king sent for the bishop of Lincolne Robert, and of him obtained, that the country then called Granthzioge might be his Prouince, and gaue vnto the bishop of Lincolne, the mannor of Spaldwike in recompence of the iurisdiction which he before had ouer the County of Granthzioge, and so Harueis was placed in the Bysshopricke.

Bridges and a high way made ouer the Moore at Lea at Stratford.

This Matilde, when she saw the way to be dangerous for them y trauailed by the Old ford ouer the riuer of Lue (for the her selfe had beene wel washed in the water) caused 2. stone bridges to be builded, in a place one mile distant from the Old ford. Of the which, one was situated ouer Lue at the head of the towne of Stratford, now called Bow, because the bridge was Arched like vnto a Bow, a rare piece of worke, for before the time the like had neuer beene seene in England. The other ouer the little broke commonly called Channelsbridge. She made the kings high way of grauell betweene the two Bridges. Moreouer, she gaue Manors, and a mil, commonly called Wiggon mil to the abbesse of Barking for the reparing of the bridges and high waye. But afterward Gilbert de Mountfichet builded the Abbey of Stratford in the marishes, the Abbot whereof by giuing a piece of money, purchased to himselfe the Manors and Mill aforesaid, and couenanted to repaire the bridges and way. Till at length, he laid the charge vpon one Godfrey Prat, allowing him certaine loaues of bread daile, that hee should repaire the Bridges and way. Who being holpen by the ayde of trauailers, did not onely performe the charge, but also was a gainer to himselfe: which thing the Abbot perceiuing, he withholdeth from him part of the bread promised. Whereupon, Godfrey demandeth a tole of the wayfaring men, and to them that denied, he stopped the way, till at length, wearied with toyle, hee neglecteth his charge, whereof came the decay and ruine of the stone bridges and way. Now concerning these 3. stonde bridges of Lue, of the which, 2. be builded of stone, they be proper to 3. miles: whereof, one the Maister of S. Thomas of Acres in London made, the other the Maisters of the bridgehouse of London, two of them which belong to Esser, the Abbot of Stratford is bound to repaire. The third the bridgemasters of London, for the land was exchased the 37. of Henry the third.

1118. First Pope Calixtus.

An.reg.19 Knights of the Temple.

About this time, certaine Noble men of the Horsemen being religiously bent, bound themselues in the hands of the Patriarke of Hierusalem, to serue Christ after the manner of regular Chanons, in chastity, and obedience, and to renounce their own proper will for euer. Of which order, the first was the honourable man Hugh Paganus, and Gawfride de Saint Andemare: and where at the first, they had no certaine habitation, Baldwine king of Hierusalem granted them a dwelling place in his pallace by the temple, and the Chanons of the same Temple gaue them the frete thereby to build their houses of office in, and the Patriarch, the King, the Nobles, and Prelates gaue them certaine reuenues out of their Lordships. Their first profession was for safegard of the Pilgrimes, to keepe the waies, against the lying in wait of theues. About 10. yeres after, they had a rule appointed them, and a white habit by Pope Honorius, at that time, where they had beene nine in number, they began to increase into great numbers.

Afterward in the time of Pope Eugenius, they had crosses of red cloath sewed on their vppermost garments, to be known from others thereby: and in those time, because they had their first mansion hard by the temple of our Lord in Hierusalem, they were called knights of the temple.

An.reg.20 Peace with France.

King Henry made peace with Fulco the earle of Angeine, taking his daughter to bee wife to his sonne William, whom he had now made inheritour of all his kingdomes. After that, by the aduice of all his Lords, he made peace with the king of France, and with the earle of Flanders: in the which peace, his Sonne William tooke Normandy into his possession, to hold the same of the king of France.

1120. Earthquake.

This yere was a great Earthquake in many places of England, on the eight and twentie day of September, about the third houre of the day.

Ano. reg.21

King Henry in the euening of the 24. day of Nouember, minding to returne into England, loosed from land at Barbefleet, and the winde brought him prosperously to his kingdome.

But William his Sonne, somewhat more then 17. yéres of age, who through his fathers kingdomes, lacked nothing but the name of a king, commanded another ship to bee prepared for him, all the young Sonnes of the Nobility flocking thither for the company of him, as their play-fére: and the saylers also tipled with too much wine, in lustines bragged that they would quickly leaue the other behind, that went out before them. So in the darkenesse of the night, the youth lacking wisedome, and ouercharged with drinke, discharged the ship from the land: she sailed swift as an arrow, & cutting through the daunting floods, by the negligence of the drunken saylers, dashed vpon a rocke aboue water, not farre from land. The poore soules role with great cry, bestirred them with their pyned Oares, long labouring to get the ship from the rocke: but fortune was against them, bringing their paines to no purpose: so the ods of the ship, leaning against the rocke, cracked, and the broken sterne hung downe: now it did cast some into the Sea, and the water comming in, drowned other, when with casting out a boate, the kings sonne was taken in, and might haue beene saued by returning to land, had not his base sister the Countesse of Perche, wayling with death in the great ship, craued her brothers helpe. He moued with pitie, commanded the boate to be rowed to the ship, that he might take in his sister, and straight way the Boate did take, being overladen with the great compasse that teared in, and so drowned them all, onely one cloisterman escaped, which swimming all night upon the mast, betwen all the chance of the tragedie in the morning. There was never ship in miserable to England, nor so famous abroad. There was drowned with William, Richard the kings other sonne that hee begate before his kingdome, of one of his subiects. Richard Earle of Chester, and his brother Otwele the kings sons Otto, the Countesse of Perche, the kings daughter named Marie, and his niece the Countesse of Chester, sister to Theobald, William Bigot, Geffrey Riddle, Walter de Curcie, Geffrey Archdeacon of Hereford, and also many the best knights, and Chaplaines that were in the Court, and noble mens sons fit to be knights, to the number of 160. persons, they came together to Prince the kings sonne for sport, to doe him any service they could: but they made the miser by the more, that they could not bee easily found, for searchers being placed all along upon the sea coasts, found scantly one of them. For the bodies were gone to be fed to the Porkers of the Sea.

King Henry married Adaliza, daughter to Godfrey Duke of Louan, at Cly on the third day of January, who was consecrated and crowned at London in the feast of Whitsontide.

1121. King Henry prepareth a great army against the Welshmen, and came to Powesland: which when the Lords of the land, Meredith Apblichin, and the 3. sons of Cadogan, Encon, Maduc, and Morgan saw, they sent to Griffith ap Conan prince of Northwales for succour: which he denied them, for that he had made peace with the king.

Thus they having no hope of ayde from him, purposed to defend themselues within their owne land after the best manner they could, setting men to defend the straits, whereby their enemies must needs passe. And as it chanced, the king himselfe with a small number, came into one of those defended places, for his whole army had gone a further way about, because of their carriages.

Ann. reg. 12. At whose comming, the men which kept the straits, skirmished with the kings men, and having the vantage of the ground, slew some, and wounded many, amongst the which, the king himselfe was smitten with an Arrowe on the brest, wherewith he being wonderfully abashed, sent to parley with them that kept the passage, and at length being agreed with them for 1000. head of cattell, returned into England.

King Henry having kept his Christmas at Dunstable, went from thence to Barkhamstead, having in his company his Chancellor named Randolph, hee had beene sicke the space of twenty yeares, and yet notwithstanding was prompt to all euill, delighting in oppressing innocents: and as he brought the king home, minding to haue lodged with him, in the very top of the hill that the kings castle stood on, he fell from his horse, and ended his life, in great misery, 5. yeares after. And Robert Blothe Bishop of Lincolne, in the moneth of January, whilest at Woodstock he sate on his horseback talking with the king, he began to shrinke downe speechlesse, and being brought to his lodging, died sodainely. 1123. Abbes Obit.

The city of Lincolne for the most part was consumed with fire, which raged in such violent and furious manner, that it deuoured sundry men, and women, and did so much harme before that no man was able to report it vnto other, this happened on the 18. day of June. The Citties Lincolne burnt. Geo. Prenbs.

William de Corboyle Priour of S. Osithe in Essex, was by the king appointed to bee Archbishop of Canterbury, and was consecrated there on the 16. day of February. The Bishoprickes of Bathe was giuen to Godfrey the Queenes chaplaine. And Alexander Archdeacon of Salisbury, was made Bishop of Lincolne.

King Henry sayled ouer the Seas into Normandy, at which time, Robert Earle of Millaine alias Pelent went from the king: Wherefore the king besieged his castle called Pount Andomer, and the same time he builded a great broad and high wall about the tower of Roane: he repaired the castle of Caine, he also fortified and made inuincible the castles of Arches, Gisors, Falace, Argentine, Dontront, Orine, Anbzos, Nanroy, Iuca, and the towne of Vernon. Money makers throughout all England, being taken with false money, had their right hands cut off, and also their priuie members. After this, by changing of the money, all things became most deare, insomuch as a right sore famine arised, and afflicted the multitude of the people euen to death. Money makers punished. 1125

Henry the Emperour died, and was buried at Spire, with his grandfather, Lotharius the 98. Emperour succeeded. Roger Wend.

Iohn Cremensis Priest cardinall by the kings licence came into England, and for the time of his abode here, lodged in the Bishops Pallace, and in Abbeyes, not without great gifts and rewards taking of them, he keeping a solemne Synode or Councell at London, when he had exercised most seuerely intreated of Priests Concubines, saying, that it was much wickednesse, to rise from an harlots side, to consecrate the body of Christ: And he himselfe the same day had consecrated the body of Christ: After the which in the euening, he was detected of whoredome, the matter was so plaine, that it could not be denyed, and thus he turned his great honour, into the greatest shame that might be. An. reg. 26. Cardinall: sayng a Masse after his arriuall. Priests Concubines.

Henry the Emperour being dead, Mawd the Empresse returned to her father king Henry, & dwelt with the Queene in her Chamber, because she was suspected of her husbands death. For she went away by night, and chose to line in pouerty. 1126 Mawd the Empresse returned into England.

King Henry held his Court with great magnificence in his Castle of Windsore, and there assembled all the Nobility of his Realme, where when the Archbishop of Yorke would haue crowned the King equally with the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the iudgement of all men he was repulsed. The bearer of his Crosse, together with the Crosse, was thrown out of the Kings Chappell: for it was affirmed that no Petropolitan out of his owne Pdounce might haue any Crosse before him. The Feast being ended, the King with all the States of the Realme together came to London, and there at the Kings commaudement, William the Archbishop, and the Legate of the Romish Church, and all other Bishops of the English Nation, with the Nobility, take an oath to defend against all men the kingdome to his daughter, if she survived her Father, except that before his decease he begate some sonne to succeed him. An. reg. 27. Bishop of Yorke with the Crosse cast out of the Kings Chappell. Mawd the Empresse.

The King also granted to the Church of Canterbury, and to William and his successors, the custody and Constableship of the Castle of Rochester for euer.

The Archbishop of Canterbury assembled a councell of Bishops, Abbots, and other Prelats at Westminster, where they determined many causes concerning Ecclesiasticall businesse: and the King with his councell confirmed them. 1128.

King Henry of England, being beyond the Sea in Normandy, had great warres against William Earle of Flanders that was his Nephew.

King Henry with a warlike Army inuaded France, because Lewes king of France did vexe and William Earle of Flanders, the Kings nephew, and lodging at Vesperune, the space of eight dayes, as safe as he had beene in his owne Realme. He kept the King of France, from giuing helpe to the sayd Earle of Flanders.

Then came a certaine Duke out of Germany, who was named Theodoricke, with a warlike power into Flanders, though the procurement of King Henry to take his part, and ioyne with him: but Earle William with a small company, through his inuincible manhood, with his bloody sword did cleane and breake their great battaile, and caused them to flie: but when this William besieged the Castle of Angew, or Alburt, (as other haue) against king Henry, so that it should haue beene perished vnto him, through one wound in his hand, hee dyed, but not without immortall Fame. An. reg. 29.

Randolph bishop of Durham deceased, he rayled the wals of the body of the Church of Durham, vnto the rose, he translated the bodie of Saint Cuthbert into that new Church, he compassed the Cittie of Durham with a wall, he continued diuers bankes along the riuer of Wier, and built a great stone bridge vpon the same riuer with arches. He also built a Castle vpon a Rape till called Nozham, vpon the River of Twide, to resist the enemies. He built the Hospital of Repar, and the bridge of Framwelgate. After the death of this Ranulph, the Bishoprickes of Durham was committed to two Barons, Iohn de Mandeuile, and Geffrey Excombard the elder, to the vse and profit of the king, for the space of fiue yeares and eleuen moneths. Tower of Nozham builded and the Hospitall of Repar. 1129. Lib. Dunelm.

King Henry returned out of Normandy into England.

And in the first of August, the king began a great councell at London, in the which councell by authoritie of the Pope, the Feast of the conception of our Ladie was confirmed, the which councell of the Cleargie, (through the simplicitie of the Archbishop of Canterbury) were by the king deceiued, for they granted the King to haue the execution of Iustice concerning the fecarie of Priests, for their keping of Concubines, which the Bishops afterward repented too late, but they could not helpe it. For the King take infinite summes of money of Priests, and suffered them to doe what they would.

About this time men forgetting their byrth, transformed themselues by the length of their haires into the habit of women kinde. One of the knights of the Realme, a man very proud of his long haire, at the length stricken in conscience, it seemed vnto him in his sleepe, that one did choake him with the haires of his head (for all men were shauen of their faces.) Wherefore, being awakened, he caused forthwith the superfluitie of his haires to be cut off. Which example take place throughout all England for the time, and almost all the Knights were contented to haue their haires cut off. But one yere was scarcely past, when all that thought themselues Courtiers, fell into the former vice, and Men contend with women in long haire.

so contended with women in their long haires, that when they were decayed, they knit about their heads certaine reles, and couerings being ignorant, or forgetting the Apostles saying. Let it be a reproach vnto a man, if he endeauour to haue his haires grow long. Ann. reg. 30

Oliey by Oxford.

This yere Robert de Oiley the second, and Edith his wife, founded the Priorie of Oliey by Oxford.

1130.

The seauenth of May the Cittie of Rochester, in presence of the K. was sore defaced with fire.

King Henry gaue his daughter Matild the Empresse, to Geffrey Plantagenet Earle of Angeuine, to be his wife. Ann. reg. 31.

King Henry in the moneth of August passed the sea into Normandy, where he remained for a time.

This yere King Henry returned into England. And Matild the Empresse also, the same yere, and calling a great assembly of noble men at Northampton, the former oath was renewed by them that had received it before.

A great marraine of cattell went ouer all England, so that the like had not bene seene in many yeres.

King Henry sore troubled ofte times in his sleepe, declared the same vnto Grimbalde his Phisition, the effect whereof was, that some time it semed to him, that he saw a great multitude of husbandmen with their rusticall toles stand about him, threatning him, for wrongs done by him against them: Sometimes he semed to see his knights and souldiers in armor, threatning him. Sometimes the Bishops, Abbots and Clergie, with their pastorall staues threatning him: Which sight so feared him in his sleepe, that ofte times he rose naked out of his bed, take weapon in hand, and sought to kill them, but could not find. Grimbalde his phisition being a notable wise man expounded his dreames by true coniecture, and willed him to reforme himselfe with almes and prayer, as Nabuchodonosor did by the counsell of Daniel. King Henry sore troubled in his sleepe.

In the moneth of June, when King Henry was entred his ship to returne into England with his traine, the sea was sore troubled, so that the ship was in manner ouerwhelmed with the floudes, and the winde was contrary vnto him, so that seeing death at hand, he vowed that the tribute called Dane gilt, should not for seauen yeres be exacted. He also vowed to repent him of his former life, to reconcile himselfe, and euer after to obserue iustice. King Henry in danger of drowning on the Sea. Ann. reg. 32

The eight of October, a Comet appeared, and was seene fiue dayes together.

1132. Bishoppick at Carlile.

King Henry made a Bishoppricke at Carlile, and made Athulphe, Priour of S. Oswald his confessor, bishop there, he placed there Chanons regular and indowed it with many honours.

Henry the second borne.

Mawd the Empresse did beare a sonne to Geffrey Plantagenet, Earle of Angeu her husband and named him Henry, which when the King her father knew, he called his Nobles together at Oxford, where he kept his feast of Easter, in his new hall with great royalty: He there ordained, that the sayd her heires should succeed him in his kingdome.

The 14. day of May, a great fire beginning at Gilberts house in West Cheape of London, consumed a great part of the same Cittie, from thence Eastward to Aldgate, with the priory of Chanons of the holy Trinity there, and many houses of office thereto belonging, and Westward to Ludgate, consuming the great Church of Saint Paul, &c. Ann. reg. London Saint Paules burnt.

Hospitall of S. Cros.

Henry Bloyse Bishop of Winchester, new builded the Hospitall of Saint Crosse, neere vnto Winchester, which Hospitall had of old time bene inpoyled by the Danes.

The second day of August there was great darknesse in England, the Sunne became like the Mone in the third quarter. And the same day many Starres appeared.

1133. Great Gale.

The 4. day of August early in the morning, in many parts of England an earthquake was felt, so that it was thought that the earth would haue sunke vnder the fete of men, with such a terrible sound as was horrible to heare. The king at that time of the eclipse, passed ouer the sea into Normandy: but neuer returned againe alliue into England.

Ann. reg.

In the moneth of November, the City of Worcester as oft times before, was burned and sore defaced by fire. Worcester made at diuerse times in part or in whole.

Geffery the kings chancellor was made Bishop of Durham, and Hamie the first Bishop of Ely being dead, Nigelus the kings Treasurer was made Bishop there.

Matild the Empresse brought forth a sonne named Geffery.

1134. Robert Curt. queer Duke. Ann. reg.

This yere, when our Lord Iesus, who willeth not the death of a sinner, had giuen vnto Duke Robert of Normandy a sufficient space of repentance, wherein to humble himselfe, that is to wit, almost 30. yeres, which time he liued in blindnesse of eyes, also in strait prison in the Castle of Cardiffe, he dyed and was buried at Glocester.

Godfrey Bishop of Bath deceased on the 16. of August. After whom succeeded Robert a Fleming by kind, but borne in Normandy. 1135.

Ann. reg. Dorchester Henry, Matthew Par.

King Henry remaining in Normandy, vpon a day did eate Lampraies, whereof he tooke a surfeit and deceased the first day of December, An. 1135. when he had raigned 35. yeres 4. monethes: his bowels, braines and eyes, were buried at Roane, the rest of his body was powdered with salt, and wrapped in Bulles hides, because of the stincke, which payloned them that stood about him. The Physition which being hyred with a great reward to cleane his head to take out the braine, with the stincke thereof died, so that he inioyed not the reward that was couenanted. Thus among a great many that king Henry slew, this Physition was the last. In Reg. I. Malmes. Huntingt. Roual. Doro. Rodigma.

King Henry was buried at Reading, which he had founded. He also founded the Priorie of Dunstable, he conuerted a rich Colledge of Prebends in the Towne of Cirencester, into an Abbey of Chanons regular: he also builded there an Hospitall of Saint Iohn: and new builded the Castle of Windsor vpon the hill, with a Colledge there, one mile from the old towne of Windlesor. King Edward the third builded Colledge of Windsor fou. Dod. Iohn Leyla.

builded much of this Castle, increased the number of Chanons in the Colledge, adding to the 8. Chanons, a Deane, and 15. Chanons more, and foure and twenty poore impotent knights, and other Ministers, as apparently by his Charter doth the two and twentieth of his raigne, he founded there the order of the Garter. King Edward the fourth tooke from the Colledges of Eton, and Cambridge founded by King Henry the first, almost a thousand pound by yere, and gaue to Windlesore. Hee also builded the faire new Church now vsed, sane onely the top and roofing, which was since finished by the Lord Reinold Bray, and other Knights of the Garter. In place of the old Colledge church, King Henry the seauenth builded a Chappell, where he meant to haue bene buryed: but altering his minde, left the same vnfinished, and builded his Chappell at Westminster, he made the faire causey way betweene Windsor and London. King Henry the 8. made the outer Gate-house, which is called the Exchequer of the Honour where hath bin and yet continueth a moneth Court, kept by the Clarke of the Honor and Castle, for the pleas of the Forrest and Honors. In which, amongst other things, is to be seene the yerely account, of the charges, of the planting of the Vines, that in the time of K. Richard the 2. grew in great plenty within 5 litle Parke, as also of the making of the wine it selfe, whereof some part was spent in the kings house, and some part sold to his profit, the tythes whereof were payed to the Abbot of Waltham, then Parson both of the old and new Windlesore.

King Edward the first began to bring water to the Castle: Queene Mary brought it thither in conduits, the house was before serued by wels: She also for her part, added the lodgings for the almes knights, and placed there to the number of Twelue, for there had not bene any of many yeres to fore, to wit, in the memory of men then liuing, whereby it was supposed, neuer any to haue bene there. But true it is, I haue read in the Tower of London, a Patent, granted by Edward the fourth, in the two and twentieth yere of his raigne, to one Thomas Crabbe Esquire, to be admitted one of the almes knights at Windlesore. Queene Elizabeth hath also much inlarged with buildings the said Castle. All which, whether you regard the wholsomenesse of the ayre, and beauty of the soyle, or the beauty, strength, and situation of the place, or the pleasant pastime arising out of the Forrest, chase, and fayre leaue Parkes that waite vpon it, or the good neighbourhood of the rich River of Thames that runneth by it, I haue thought it good to set downe thus much.

This Henry the first also builded the Mannor of Woodstocke, with the Parke, which he walled with stone seuen miles compasse, destroying for the same, diuers Villages, Churches, & chappels. This is the first Parke that euer was in England: he placed there, besides great store of Deare, diuers strange beasts to be kept and nourished, such as were brought or sent to him from farre Countries, as Lyons, Leopards, Linces, Porpentines, &c. By his example, Hare Earle of Warwicke, made his parke at Madgenoke, neere vnto Warwick, since called the old parke. He had issue by Matild his first wife, a Son named VVilliam, that was drowned in the Sea, and a daughter named Matild, whom with her Son he appointed to inherite the Crowne and Realme. He had also issue by his Concubines, a sonne named Richard, and a daughter named Mary, which were both drowned with their Brother William. THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King STEPHEN.

STEPHEN, Earle of Boyton, and of Bologne, Son to the Earle of Blois, and Adele, William Conquerours daughter, and nephew to K. Henry the 1. claimed the kingdome in the moneth of December. Anno 1135. He comming into England, was repulsed by them of Douer, shut out by them of Canterbury, but receiued of the Londoners, and Peeres of the land, admitted King, and crowned at Westminster on S. Stephens day, by William Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Bishop of Winchester, and Roger Bishop of Salisburie.

This was a Noble man and hardy, of passing comely fauour and parsonage, he excelled in martiall policie, gentlenesse and liberalitie toward all men, especially in the beginning: and although he had continuall warre, yet did he neuer burden his Commons with exactions: but iustly, and contrary to his Oath made to Mawd the Empresse, daughter to King Henry, he tooke on him the Crowne of England.

A fire kindled in the house of one Ailward neere vnto London-stone, consumed Eastward to Aldgate, and Westward to S. Erkenwalds shrine in Pauls Church. The Annales of Bermondsey say, That London-bridge was also at time burned: which might well be, for then and long before, there was a Bridge of timber, as before I haue touched. And further, to confirme the same, I finde in the Annales of Bermondsey, that in Anno Christi, 1122. the 22. yere of King Henry the first, Thomas Arderne gaue to the Monkes of Bermondsey, the Church of S. George in Southwarke, &c. with fiue shillings rent by the yere, out of the lands of London-bridge. 1136. Lib. Trinit. Lib. Bermond. London with the Bridge burnt.

Flemings

Flemmings entred into Deuonshire, and besieged the Castle of Exceter a long time, which Baldwine de Reduers held against them, but at length when they within the Castle wanted necessary things to liue by, they compounded.

Baldwine with his wife and Children are disherited and expulsed the Land. From hence king Stephen went to the Ile of Wight, and tooke it from the said Baldwine de Reduers.

Battell against the Welchmen.

A battell was fought at Gober, betwixt Normans and Welchmen, where a hundred and fiftéene persons on both sides were slaine, whose bodies lay in the fields, and were horribly torne and deuoured of Wolues.

After this were made great eruptions by the Welchmen, who destroyed Churches, Townes, Castles, corne, cattell, slew Men, Women, and Children, rich and poore, or sold them in forreine Countries.

In October a fore battell was fought at Cardigan, in the which, such slaughter of men was made, that the men (except which were ledde away captiue,) were of Women taken and ledde away, that there remained to the tenth a thousand, their Husbands with their small children partly drowned, partly brent, partly slaine, so that the Bridge being broken ouer the River of Tiuide, there was a bridge made of mens bodies and horses drowned.

Anno reg. 2. 1137.

In March king Stephen passed the Sea to subdue Normandie where he take many Cities and strong Castles, and made peace with the King of France.

The third of June, Saint Andrewes in Rochester was brent, with all the Citie, and the Bishops and Monkes stalles in the Church. And on the fourth day of June St. Peters the Archbishops Sea in Yorke, S. Maries without the walls, and an Hospitall which the Archbishop Thurstone had builded, with 19. other Churches, also the Trinity Church in the suburbes of the same City, within a small time after were brent. Also St. Peters Church at Bathe, and all the citie, the 27. day of June was brent. And the same moneth the city of Leogere was consumed with fire.

Yoodigma. Rochester burnt.

Richard Diuine.

St. Peters in Yorke burnt.

Ann. reg. 3.

England began to fall into greates troubles, which caused king Stephen to returne out of Normandie before he had finished his businesse there, so that he came ouer into England in the moneth of December.

1138.

King Stephen besieged Bedford and wonne it, then he went with a strong power into Northumberland, where he stayed not long, but went to Gloucester, where the Citizens received him with great reioycing. Miles Earle of Hereford the Kings Constable, brought him into the Kings pallace there, where all the citizens were to him sworne. From whence he went to Hereford, because that hee heard the Castle was holden against him: And on Whitsonday he sate crowned in the Church of Hereford. When they that kept the Castle saw the Kings power to increase, they yelded themselues. The king tooke also the Castle of Webbelege, which Geffrey Talbot had held against him.

King Stephen besieged Bedford.

The same day that the King departed out of Hereford, all beyond the River of Wie was brent by the sayd Geffrey.

The King returned to Oxford, where he tooke Roger the Bishop of Sarum, with the Bishop of Lincolne, and his sonne Roger: the bishop of Ely escaping, went to the Castle of Ites, and kept it against the king: but at length it was deliuered.

The same time Robert Earle of Gloucester renounced his allegeiance to King Stephen, fortified Bristow and other Castles. Also Miles the Kings constable reuolted.

Whereforee the King beliaged the Castle of Bristow, but at length being wearied, hee returned to other of the Earles castles, and seeing his enemies still increasing, hee called out of Flaunders men of warre with William de Ypres their Leader, whose counsell he chiefly followed.

Anno reg. 5.

The same yere Roger Bishop of Salisburie, a great builder of Castles and houses, departed this life. There was found in his coffers forty thousand markes of siluer, besides much gold, and diuers Iewels that came to the Kings hand, so that hee had gathered great treasure, but wist not for whom.

Iocelins, a Knight of Lincolnshire, hauing to his Sonne one Gilbert, whom for some imperfection of his limbs, hee thought vnmeet for the world, made him a Priest, gaue him a Benefice in a towne of his owne in Lincolneshire, called Semperingham. This man was author of a Religious order, which were called Gilbertines, and began in the raigne of King Stephen, hee inclosed within one House both Men and Women, but seuered them by such high walles, that the one neither saw, nor heard the other. This order in his life-time increased to tenne Houses, containing in all to the number of 700. Brethren, and 1500. Sisters.

The Nobles sent for Mawd the Empresse, promising her the possession of the Realme, according to their Oath made to her. In the meane time Dauid King of Scots, promising to recouer the Crowne of England for the Empresse Mawd his Niece, in most cruell wise inuaded Northumberland, where by Thurstone Archbishop of Yorke, the Standert being set vp at Aluerton, the Scots had an ouerthrow at Conton, more then foure miles Northwest from Alnerton, and were slaine aboue ten thousand, on the 22. day of August.

David King of Scots inuades Northumberland.

In the moneth of July, Robert Earle of Gloucester returned into England with his Sister the Empresse, and a great army, which arriued at Portsmouth. The Empresse was received into Arundel castle, by Adelize late wife to K. Henry, as then wife to William Earle of Arundel.

Earle Robert went to Wallingford, and thence to Glocester, and raised thole Countries.

The King held his siege before Marleborough but aduertised of the Empresse arriuall, hasted towards Arundell, where being by faire speech pacified, hee commanded his Brother bishop of Winchester to bring the Empresse vnto Bristow, and hee himselfe followed Earle Robert with his armie. The Empresse stayed at Bristow till October, and then went to Glouc. ster, her comming thither being knowne, Miles the high Constable, and many other Nobles tooke part part with her against king Stephen.

The King besieged Wallingford Castle, but profited not, and therefore raising a Tower of wood before it, stuffed it with men of Warre, and went to win the Castle of Malmesburie.

The Army of Earle Robert, won the Citie of Worcester, brent the most part of it, and laden with the spoile, departed thence.

The Sheriffe of that Citie, in reuenge hereof, destroyed the towne of Sudley, and with the spoile there returned to Worcester.

After this the king with a great Army, came from Oxford to Worcester, where he gaue the honour of high Constableship (being taken from Miles of Gloucester) vnto William, the sonne of Walter Beauchamp, Sheriffe of Worcester, and then returned to Oxford, and so to Salisburie.

Anno reg. 5.

The King went to Reading, and after with his Armie towards Elie, but the Bishop fled to Gloucester, to Earle Robert, and the king wan the Castle of Ely, and spoyled Nigellus the Bishop (who was fled to the Empresse) of all that to him appertained, and then returned.

Robert Earle of Gloucester, with a great power inuaded the Towne of Nottingham and spoiled it: the Townesmen were taken, slaine, or brent in the Churches wherunto they fled. One of them more rich then the others, was taken and led to his owne house by his takers, to shew them where his treasure lay: he bringing them into a low Sellar, whilest they were busie to breake open locks and coffers, he conueyed himselfe away, and shutting the doore after him; set fire on the house: and so the Thieues to the number of thirtie, were brent, and by reason of this fire, all the Towne was set on fire, and brent.

Nottingham brent.

1141.

King Stephen besieged Lincolne against Ranulph Earle of Chester, but Robert Earle of Gloucester, came with a great power, and rescued the same, chased the Kings army, and tooke him prisoner on Candlemas day, first he was had to Gloucester, and after to Bristow, and there committed to prison, and put in irons.

King Stephen discomfited before Lincolne.

The Empresse reioycing at this her good hap, departed from Gloucester, and came to Cicester, with Bishops, Barons, and other in great number, from thence thee went to Winchester, where met her Lords Spirituall and Temporall in great number, the Cittie with the Tower and Crowne of the Realme, was deliuered into her hands.

The Bishop of Winchester, that was King Stephens brother, accused all that stood against the Empresse, and blessed those that take her part. From thence she departed to Wilton, where the Archbishop of Canterbury came and saluted her. When Easter was past, she went to Reading, where she was received with all the honour that might be: thence she went to Oxford where the Castle was deliuered vnto her by Robert de Olly: then went she to S. Albons, and was received with all honor. Here the Citizens of London came and yelded their Citie to her, whereupon she went to London, and so to Westminster, where she being received with procession, remained certaine dayes, taking order for the state of the Realme, and there she gaue the Bishoprike of London to Robert de Sigello, a Monke of Reading.

King Stephens wife, and many Peeres of the Realme, made suite to the Empresse to haue the king restored to liberty, and not to the Kingdome promising to perswade with him to become a Monke, but she would not heare. The Bishop of Winchester requested her to giue vnto Eustace his nephew, king Stephens sonne, his Fathers Earledome, but it would not be. The Citizens of London required her to restore K. Edwards lawes but she being puffed vp with pride, would not grant their request, whereupon they conspyred to take her prisoner: but she aduertised hereof, fled with shame, leauing behind her all her furniture of houshold and apparell.

Henry Bishop of Winchester, talking which way to deliuer his brother, perswaded the Londoners to aide him. The Empresse got her to Oxford and from thence to Glouceter, and thence with her assured friend Miles, againe to Oxford, and because she trusted most in him, she to doe him honour, gaue him the Earledome of Hereford. And now hauing got a great army, about Lammas went againe to Winchester, and lodged on the Castle there. The Bishop abashed of her sudaine comming, departed out at one gate, as she came in at the other. He getting a great Army, with the helpe of the Londoners besieged the Cittie, and the second of August committed the Citty to the fire, with the which, the Minstrie, and houses of office, with more then twenty Churches (some waite sotty) and a great part of the Citty, with the Monastery of S. Grimbald, and the houses thereto belonging, were brought to ashes.

Mylo alias Miles Earle of Hereford.

Winchester brent.

About the exaltation of the Crosse, the Empresse being wearied of long siege, got her to horseback with her brother Reginald, Earle of Cornewall, and many other. Earle Robert followed with a great number of Lords and knights but the Bishops meta setting on them, slew and take a great number.

The Empresse fled to the Castle of Luteger-shall, heauy and almost dead for feare: from thence she was brought to the Castle of Ites, and from thence to Gloucester, bound in a horse-litter like a dead carcasse.

The Empresse fled.

Earle of Gloucester taken.

Earle Robert being pursued, was taken at Stobbridge with Earle Warren, and many other and presented to the Queene, as then new entred into Winchester.

Earle Robert was deliuered to William de Ypres, who put him in prison in the Castle of Rochester.

Earle of Hereford fled.

Miles Earle of Hereford hardly escaped, and came to Glocester almost naked.

The Bishops men brent the Monastery of Nunnes at Marwell, &c. the bookes and ornaments of the Nunnes were taken and borne away, and men slaine euen before the Altar. These things thus done, the Bishops wrath was somewhat appeased but his couetousnesse encreased, so that being prompted thereto by the Prior of the new Monasterie in Winchester lately brent he take off the Croſſe that was burnt fine hundred pounds of ſiluer, and thirty marks in gold, three Crownes, with as many ſcales of fine Arabike gold, ſet with precious ſtones: all this he laid vp in his owne treaſurie.

King Stephen and Robert Earle of Glocester deliuer. ed by exchange. Alfredus Beu.

King Stephen and Earle Robert being ſtraitely kept, at length through mediation of friends, a peace was concluded, that they ſhould be deliuered, the King to his kingdome, and the Earle to his liberty.

Geffrey Mandeuile fortified the Tower of London: and Robert Biſhop of London was taken at Fulham by Geffrey Mandeuile.

Geffrey Biſhop of Durham deceaſed, when he had ſate Biſhop of Durham 13. yeares, he builded the Caſtle of Alnerton, which he gaue to his nephew William, whom he ioyned in marriage with the Earles neece of Albemarle.

An. reg. 7. 1142.

The King and Earle being ſet at libertie, did not onely renue but multiply their malice: the King repaired his power and expences, the Earle went ouer the Sea to Geffrey Earle of Anjow, whom hee found occupied in Warres againſt certaine of his ſubiects of Anjow, ſo that he could not come into England with him: whereupon he taking Henry, eldeſt ſonne to Geffrey Earle of Anjow, and Mawd the Empreſſe, with certaine choſen men of armes, returned into England.

The Empreſſe beſieged.

King Stephen hearing that Earle Robert was gone out of the Realme, and the Empreſſe to lye at Oxford, with a great power came and beſieged her two moneths ſpace.

Warham Caſtle beſieged. The Empreſſe flye h. Gerualius.

Earle Robert with Henry ſonne to the Empreſſe, and other his complices landed at Wareham, where he beſieged the Caſtle, which was defended by Hubert de Lucie, who at length yeelded the ſame. In the meane time, the Empreſſe ſeeing that ſhe was void of all helpe, with a womaniſh ſubtilty deuiſed the kings ſcout-watch, cloathing her ſelfe and her company, fiue in number, all in white, and vpon a night went ouer the Thames on foote, which was then hard frozen, and white with ſnow: that night ſhee went to Wallingford, and the Caſtle of Oxford was yelded to the King. After the winning of Wareham Caſtle, Robert went to viſit his ſiſter the Empreſſe, who was not a little ioyfull to ſee him and her young ſon Henrie. which Henrie remained at Briſtow for the ſpace of foure yeres and there was brought vp in learning.

An. Reg. 8. 1143.

King Stephen after the robbing of many Churches, burning and robbing of Townes and Villages by the hands of the Fleming ſouldiers, he and his brother Henrie Biſhop of Wincheſter builded a Caſtle of the Deuyſe at Wilton, to repreſſe the incurſions of them of Saliſbury. Earle Robert the firſt of Iuly, fell ſudainely vpon them

The King with the Biſhop fled with ſhame, the Earles men tooke the kings people, and ſackt his plate & other things: there were taken of the kingsmen very many, and among other, Wil. Wartell ſewer to king Stephen, who was ſent to Wallingford, there to be kept priſoner. Wiliam de S. Barbara was made Biſhop of Durham.

An. reg. 9. Miles Earle of Hereford dyed and his eldeſt ſonne Roger ſucceeded him.

William of Pyres, founded Boxley Abbey in Kent. Boxley.

King Stephen tooke Geffrey Mandeuile Earle of Eſſex, at Saint Albones: which Geffrey could not be ſet at liberty till hee had deliuered the Tower of London, with the Caſtles of Walden and Pleſey. When the Earle was thus ſpoyled of his holds, hee tooke the Church of Ramſey, and fortified it, as he beſieged the Caſtle of Burwell, he was ſmitten in the head with a dart, whereof he dyed. Robert Marmion was alſo ſlaine at Couentry, and Rendulphus Earle Mandeuiles ſonne, that held Ramſey Church as a foreſſe, after his Fathers death, was taken and baniſhed. 1144. Gerual. Dor.

King Stephen beſieged Wallingford, but could not preuaile. The Earle of Cheſter was reconciled to the king, and was at this ſiege with him, but ſhortly after, when he came to the Court, the king lying at Northamptan, he was taken and kept priſoner, till he had rendred the Caſtle of Lincolne and other forteſſes, whereupon he was the kings enemie euer after. An. reg. 12. 1147. Wallingford beſieged.

Geffrey Earle of Anjow, and now Duke of Normandie, ſent foure Noblemen with furniture of warriours to Robert Earle of Glouceſter, requeſting him to ſend ouer his ſonne Henry, and if need required, he would ſend him backe againe with all ſpeed. The Earle agreeing to his requeſt, brought the young Henry to Wareham, where he take ſhipping towards his Father, of whom he was ioyfully receiued, there he abode two yeares, and foure Moneths. In the meane time Earle Robert deceaſed, and was buried at Briſtow, in the quire of the Church of S. Iames which he had founded. An. reg. 13. 1146. Robert Earle of Glouceſter deceaſed.

King Stephen entred Lincolne and there wore his Crowne, after whoſe departure from thence the Earle of Cheſter came to recouer the Town, but could not bring his purpoſe to paſſe, the Citizens ſhewed ſuch defence. The Empreſſe being wearied with the diſcord of the Engliſh Nation, went ouer into Normandy chooſing rather to ſit vnder the defence of her husband in Peace, then to ſuffer ſo many diſpleaſures in England. King Stephen baniſhed Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the Archbiſhop interdicted all the Land that was ſubiect to the kings Dominion, till Peace betweene them was made. *An. reg. 14. 1147. In the Moneth of May, Henrie the Empreſſe ſonne, with a great company of choſen men of Armes and other, came into England, vnto whom forthwith many Caſtles and ſtrong holds were deliuered, and he made a new roine, which 1149. Rog. Hoved.

which was called the Dukes roine, and not one Roſe, but alſo all the potentates of the Realme, as well Biſhops, as Earles and Barons, had each one his owne Roſe: but afterward the Duke did inhibit the moſt part of theſe roines. The Duke taking with him Randulph Earle of Cheſter, Roger Earle of Hereford, and diuers other he went to Dauid King of Scots, of whom hee was ioyfully receiued, and made knight. When king Stephen heard that Dauid king of Scots, with his ſtrength, and Henry ſon to the Empreſſe with his welleene Lords were together at Carlile, he came to Yorke with a great army for feare they ſhould attempt any thing againſt that Citie, and ſo lay there the moneth of Auguſt. At length the one party as well as the other departed: but Euſtacius the Kings ſonne being made knight, exerciſed many cruelties in the Lands of the Earles, that tooke part with Henry the Empreſſe ſonne.

King Stephen beſieged the Caſtle of Worceſter, which he could not win the laſt yeare, and when he ſaw now alſo that hee could not obtaine his purpoſe, he builded two Caſtles before the ſame, ſtuffing them with Garriſons, and went from thence, but by counſell of Robert Earle of Leiceſter, the Kings Caſtles were ouerthrowne and the Caſtle beſieged, deliuered from danger. An. reg. 17

An. reg. 17 1152.

Henrie Duke of Normandie, tooke to wife Elianor, ſole daughter and heire to William duke of Aquitaine, thee was firſt married to Lewes the ſeuenth of France, by whom ſhe had two daughters, whereof, Mary the eldeſt, was married to Henry the large Earle of Champaigne: Ales the ſecond, to Theobald, Earle of Bloys, Lewes king of France, was diuorced from Elianor, and yet was not content with this ſecond marriage, becauſe he was loath, that any other ſhould beget Sonnes by her, whereby his daughters might be diſherited.

King Stephen called a Parliament at London, declaring to Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the other Biſhops, how hee would vtterly diſherit Henry Duke of Normandie and confirme his owne ſonne Euſtace to bee his ſucceſſor by crowning him king: but the Pope had ſent a commandement to the Archbiſhop prohibiting him to crowne king Stephens ſonne, becauſe his Father had vſurped the kingdome, contrary to his Oath. Which thing (as was thought) was brought to paſſe by the ſubtile policy of Thomas Becket, a Chaplaine borne in London.

King Stephen and his ſonne being not a little offended therewith, cauſed the Biſhops with their Primate to bee cloſed vp in an houſe, threatning with terrors to extort of them, that which with prayers nor price they could not obtaine. The Archbiſhop ſtiffely ſtanding in his purpoſe, ſome of the Biſhops through feare went from him, at length the Archbiſhop by a marualous hap eſcaping, got ouer the Thames, and ſo to Douer: and thence tranſported ouer the ſeas, eſcaped the threats of the king and his ſonne and depriued his ſonne of his conceiued honour. *Archbiſhop ſtiffely ſtanding in his purpoſe. Henry Duke of Normandie, furniſhed with an Army, came into England, and at his firſt comming wan the Caſtle and Towne of Malmeſburie, from thenceforth Robert the noble Earle of Leiceſter, began to take the Duties part, and to furniſh him with things neceſſary, 30. Caſtles or mo. (though his counſell, with them that kept them) ſubmitted themſelues to the Duke. At length it was decreed, that the King ſhould talke with the Duke, touching Peace to be had: and ſo they met in a place where the Thames was moſt narrow, the one ſtanding on the one ſide, and the other on the other. After long talke they returned, the Duke to his men and the King to his, and ſo laying downe weapon, euery man departed in peace. The Tower of London, and the Caſtle of Windſor, were deliuered to Richard de Lucie to be ſafely kept. 1153 Malmeſburie Caſtle and Towne won by Henry Duke of Normandy.

Euſtace the kings ſonne was angrie with his Father, for agreeing to this peace, and therefore in a rage departed from the Court towards Cambridge, to deſtroy that Country. Comming to S. Edmundsbury, hee was there honourably receiued and feaſted, but when he could not haue ſuch money as he demanded, to beſtow among his men of warre, he went away in a rage ſpoyling the Towne in the fields belonging to the Abbey, and carried it into his Caſtles thereby: but as he ſate him downe to dinner, he fell mad vpon receiuing the firſt moſſell, and miſerably dyed, and was buried at Feuerſham. *Polycronicon, Iohn Sariſb. The Duke beſieged Stamford Caſtle, and wan it, and then hee went to Nottingham and wanne that. The King in the meane time beſieged Ipſwich, and wanne it. At length Stamford, Nottingham, and Ipſwich beſieged. Ex chara regia lengthy through the great labour of the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the other Bishops, the King commanded the Nobles to meet at Winchester, where the Duke being received with great joy, the King in sight of all men, adopted him his sonne, confirmed to him the principalitie of all England. The Duke received him in place of a father, granting to him all the dayes of his life to enjoy the name and seat of the Kings preheminence.

An. reg. 19. King Stephen departed this life. 1154.

William Archbishop of Yorke, about the Feast of Pentecost, died at Yorke of poyson, as some supposed, and was buried at his Cathedrall Church of Saint Peter.

Duke Henrie in the Octaues of the Epiphany came together with the King to Oxford, where the Earles and Barons by the Kings commandement sweare fealty to Duke Henrie, sauing the Kings honour so long as he liued. This assurance being made, they departed a sunder, but shortly after they met againe at Dunstable, there to intreat of the state and peace of the Kingdome.

Shortly after Duke Henrie with King Stephen, and certaine Lords of England came to Canterbury, and from thence to Douer, where they had communication with Theodrike Earle of Flanders, and the Countesse the Dukes Aunt. When the King and the Duke had dismissed the Earle of Flanders, and were returning towards Canterbury, the slaughter of the Duke was prepared by a conspiracy of the Flemings, which enuied both the Duke and Peace: but behold suddainly the Kings yonger sonne William priuy with the Conspirators, on Barham Downe fell off his horse, and breaking his leg, he gathered all the company about him in sorrow. The Duke in the meane time vnderstanding the appointed treasons, got him to Canterbury, and escaped his enemies hands: from thence by Rochester and London, he came to the sea, and passed ouer into Normandie.

Hugo de Puteaco, Treasurer of Yorke and Archdeacon of Winchester, was made Bishop of Durham.

In October the King met the Earle of Flanders againe at Douer and talked with him.

After the Earle was dismissed, the King was taken with suddaine paine of the Iliake passion, and with an old disease of running of the Reynes, and there in the house of the Monkes died the fiue and twentieth of October, when he had raigned eighteene yeares, ten moneths, and odde dayes. He founded the Abbeyes of Coythall in Essex, of Furnesse in Lancashire, and Fenersham in Kent, where his bodie, was buried for the time, but since the suppression of that house, for the lead that inclosed his bodie, the same bodie was thrown into the next water. He founded an house for Nunnes at Carew, and an house of Nuns at Bigham, foure miles from Graueseud. He also founded an Hospitall by the West gate of Yorke, whereunto hee gaue all the Mores that had beene vsed to be gathered betwixt the Riuer of Trent and Scotland, for finding of the Kings hounds, which was foure and twenty leagues of euery plow-land by yere, he appointed the Deane and Chanons of Saint Peters Church in Yorke, to gather them to the reliefe of the said Hospitall, and caused Nigell Maior of Yorke to deliuer that place by the West wall, for to receiue the poore and lame, &c. Matild his wife founded the Hospitall of Saint Katherine by the Tower of London, in a portion of Land, which pertained to the Priory of the holy Trinitie in London, but then purchased by the Hall, by exchange of fiue pounds the yeare Land out of the Kings Manors of Stanes. He had issue first a bastard sonne named William Earle of Warren, then Mathew Earle of Beame, Mary, first Abbesse, and then a Countesse, and Eustace that dyed before his father, as also Baldwine his sonne, and Matild his daughter, wife to the Earle of Pillent, which two last named were buried in the Priorie of the holy Trinitie in London. He had also a sonne named Gernasius de Bloys, he was Abbot of Westminster xx. yeares, and was there buried, with this Epitaph.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King HENRY the II.

An. reg. 1.

HENRY the second, sonne of Geffrey Plantagenet and Mawd the Empresse, at the age of twentie three yeares, began his Raigne ouer this Realme of England the 25. day of October, in the yere of our Lord, 1154. he was crowned at Westminster the seuenteene day of December, by Theobald Archbishop of Canterbury: he was somewhat red of face, short of body, and therewith fat: of speech reasonable, well learned, noble in Chiualrie, and fortunate in battaile, wise in counsell, one that loued peace, liberall to strangers, but hard to his familiars: vnstedfast of promise, giuen to pleasure, and a wedlocke breaker: by his manhood and policie the crowne of England was much augmented, with the annexing of Scotland, Ireland, the Iles of Orcades, Wyttaine, Poytiers, Guyen, and other Prouinces of France.

Thomas Becket Archdeacon of Canterbury, was made the Kings Chancellor, and was now in such fauour, that he was accounted the Kings gouernor, for he was chiefly directed by him in all things.

Per

He held his Christmas at Bermond, where hauing conference with his Nobles, for the rule of the kingdome, he promised to banish all strangers. Whereupon William of Ypres, and all the Flemings that had flocked into England, fearing the indignation of the new King, departed the Land. And the Castles that had beene builded to pull the rich, and spoile the poore, were by the Kings commandement, and counsell of his Chancellour throwne downe. The King visiting the City of Yorke, in that Country received diuers Castles into his hands, namely amongst other he tooke the Castle of Scarborow, from William Earle of Albemarle.

A Councell was holden at Wallingford, where the Nobles were sworne to the King and his issue.

King Henry went ouer into Normandy, to whom when he was at Roane, came Tortous Earle of Flanders with his wife the Kings aunt that he might reconcile vnto him Geffrey his brother, which was then come thither also for that purpose: but Geffrey not accepting the portions offered by the King, they departed without any agreement, Geffrey expulling Hoele out of Britaine, tooke the Citie of Nauntz, by yeelding of the Citizens. And King Henry afterward with long siege tooke the Castles of Mirabile, and Chinon, which Geffrey his brother had held, whereupon there was a peace concluded betwixt them, that the king should giue to Geffrey, euery yeare a thousand pound of English money, and two thousand pound of Angeow; and thereupon the third Castle called Loudune was yeelded to the King, and so was the dissention appeased, and K. Henry obtained homage, and pledges of all Aquitaine, and Gascoine, and prepared to returne towards England.

This yere Quéene Elianor brought forth a daughter named Matild. And the same yere died William the kings eldest sonne, and was buried at Reading.

An. reg. 3.

King Henry coined new money, which onely was currant in this Realme, and all other coines were forbidden.

Conon Earle of Richmond comming out of England into Britaine, tooke the Citie of Redonens, expelling Eudo, which Conon afterward was received as Duke ouer almost all Britaine.

King Henry hauing ouercome his brother Geffrey returned into England, and then with an army went against the Welshmen, where he tolled their wards, fortified the Castle of Rudland, and recouered many strong holds. Poe recouered the Castle of Basingwerke, &c. but he lost many of his men, for Henry of Essex that bare the Kings standert, as he was allailed amongst his enemies, let fall the standert to the ground, which incouraged the Welshmen in such sort, that the King being sore distressed, had much adoe to saue himselfe, and was faine to flie: of whole part, Eustace fitz John, and Robert Curcis, two worthy knights, with diuers other Noblemen and Gentlemen were slaine. After that Owen encamped and entrenched himselfe at Brantpine, and skirmished with the Kings men daily. And in the meane while that the king was fortifying the Castle of Rudland, his nauy which was guided by Madocap Meriduh Prince of Polwesse, anchored in Yan of Anglesey, and there is spoyled two Churches, and part of the Ile, but as they returned, were all slaine. In the meane time there was a Peace concluded betwixt the King and the Prince.

A new coyne was made in England. King Henry tooke escuage of the Englishmen, the summe whereof grew to 12400. pounds of siluer. Of other Countries subject to him he gathered also an infinite exaction, and then passed toward Tholouse with an huge Army, and besieged that Citie from Midsommer till Hollontide. There were with him Malcolme King of Scots, and a certaine King of Wales, and all the Earles and Barons of England, Normandie, Aquitaine, Anjow, and Gascoigne: but Lewis the French King so defended that Citie, that the Kings purpose was frustrate, and the siege raised: and after great good peace and concord betwixt them made, a great discord shortly after followed.

In this meane time the king although hee were much troubled with affaires, yet was not he vnmindfull of Ireland. For directing his Messengers to Rome, with his Letters of aduise, gotten at the councell of Cashell, he also obtained by their suite of Pope Adrian (an Englishman by birth) a priuiledge both to haue the dominion of the Iesh people, and also to instruct them in the ordinances of faith and Ecclesiasticall rites, after the order of the Church of England. Which priuiledge being sent ouer into Ireland, by Nicholas of Wallingford, then Prior of Maimesburie, and afterward Abbot, and also by William Fitz Adelme, Immediatly there was a Synode of Bishops assembled at Waterford, where in it was read in publike audience, with generall consent of all, by Iohn Bishop of Salisbury, afterward Bishop of Chartiers, who was sent to Rome for that purpose, and by him the foresaid Pope Adrian sent a Ring of Gold to the King of England, in token of the vnctitute, which was incontinently laid vp with the priuiledge in the Arches of Winchester. Wherefore, I thought it not superfluous to set downe here the tenure of that priuiledge, but first a word or two of Pope Adrian, because I haue said, he was an English man, his name was Nicholas Breake-speare borne at Langley in the County of Hereford, sonne to Robert a yonger brother of the house of Breake-speares, which Robert after the death of his wife, professed himselfe a Monke of Saint Albones, leauing his sonne to prouide for himselfe. This young man passed into France, was thorne a Monke, and after chosen Abbot, went to Rome, was consecrated Bishop of Alba, made Cardinall, sent Legate to the Northwales, where he reduced the Nation from Paganisme to Christianitie, and after returned to Rome, when Anastasius was dead, he was chosen Pope, by the name of Adrian the fourth, and now followeth the priuiledge.

This ordinance of Pope Adrian the fourth, to K. Henry the second to enter Ireland, out of an ancient written booke intituled, Topographia Hiberniæ &c. by Giraldus Cambrensis, and dedicated to the said King Henry the second.

Adrian Bishop, seruant of the seruants of God, to his dere sonne, the most excellent King of England, health and Apostolike Benediction, your highnesse resolution, in the laudable, and fruitfull spreading abroad your glorious name on earth, and in obtaining the reward of eternall felicitie in Heauen, while you determine like a Catholike Prince to enlarge the bounds and limits of the Church, to declare to the vnlearned and rude people, the truth of the Christian faith, and to race out of the Lords ground the plants of wickednesse; and towards the performance thereof, you require the counsell and fauour of the Apostolike seate: In which action, with how much the more graue counsell and deepe consideration you doe proceed, so much the more fortunate succeede thereon (God assisting you) we nothing doubt you shall haue, for that alwayes they are wont to attaine to a good and happie end, which take their beginning from the scale of faith, and loue of true religion. For Ireland, and all other Ilands, to the which Christ the sonne of Iustice hath giuen light, and which haue receiued the instructions of the Christian faith, there is no doubt but they doe appertaine and belong to the right of Saint Peter and the holy Church: wherefore how much the more plentifully wee doe seate in them the faithfull plant, and graft the bud acceptable to God, so much the more doe we see that shall be more strictly required of vs in our inward thoughts: You haue signified to vs (most deere sonne in Christ) that you will enter into the Ile of Ireland to subdue that people vnto lawes, and that there you will interrupt the plants of vices, and that you will pay a yeerely pension of one penny for euery house there to S. Peter, and that you will preserue the rights of the Churches there, whole and inuiolated. And we following with a great fauour your godly and laudable desire, doe gratefully accept, and willingly consent that you doe enter into that Iland, to enlarge the bounds of the Church, to restraine the course of wickednesse, to correct manners, to plant vertue, and augment the Christian Religion, and that you doe put in execution those things that shall appertaine to the honour of God and saluation of that Land, and the people there shall receiue you honourably, and as their Lord shall reuerence you, the Churches right remaining sound, and no way infringed, and alwayes reserving to S. Peter, and the holy Church the yeerely pension of euery house there. If therefore you bring that to passe, which in your minde you haue conceiued, indeauour to informe that nation in good manners, and cause as well by your selfe as by others, to instruct such as you perceiue capeable in this faith, in this word, and in this life, that the Church there may be adorned, the religion of the Christian faith may be there planted, and may there rest, and that those things that pertaine to the honour of God and saluation of soules bee so ordered and disposed of, that of God you may receiue the full measure of euerlasting reward, and in earth obtaine a glorious name for euer.

This that followeth is ioyned to the former Epistle of Pope Adrian the fourth, being an English man, written to King Henry the second.

There came into England 30. Germanes, as well men as women, who called themselues Publicans: their head and ruler named Gerardo, was somewhat learned, the residue very rude. They denied matrimonie, and the sacraments of Baptisme, and the Lords supper, with other Articles. They being apprehended, the King caused a councell to be called at Oxford, where the said Gerard answered for all his fellowes, who being pressed with Scripture, answered concerning their faith, as they had beene taught, and would not dispute thereof. After they could by no meanes bee brought from their errours, the bishops gaue sentence against them and the King commanded that they should bee marked with an hot yron in the forehead, and whipped, and that no man should succour them with house-rome or otherwise: they tooke their punishment gladly, their Captaine going before them, singing, Blessed are yee when men hate you: they were marked in the forehead, and their Captaine both in the forehead and the chin. Thus being whipped and thrust out in winter, they dyed with colde, no man relieuing them. Queene Elianor brought forth a daughter at Roane, and named her Elianor, after her owne name.

A brother of the Earle Ferrers was in the night priuily slaine at London, which when the King vnderstood, hee sware that he would bee auenged on the Cittizens: for it was then a common practise in the City, that an hundred or more in a company of young and old, would make nightly inuasions vpon the houses of the wealthie, to the intent to robbe them, and if they found any man stirring in the Cittie within the night, they would presently murther him, in so much, that when night was come, no man durst aduenture to walke in the streetes. When this had continued long, it fortuned that as a crew of young and wealthie Cittizens assembling together in the night, assaulted a stone house of a certaine rich man, and breaking through the wall, the good man of that house hauing prepared himselfe with other in a corner, when hee perceiued one of the theeues named Andrew Boccuinere to leade the way, with a burning brand in the one hand, and a pot of coales in the other, which hee allayed to kindle with the brand, hee slew vpon him, and smote off his right hand, and then with a loud voyce cryed theeues, at the hearing whereof the theeues toke their flight, all fauing hee that had lost his hand, whom the good man in the next morning deliuered to Richard de Lucy the kings Iustice. This thiefe vpon warrant of his life, appeached his confederates, of whom many were taken, and many were fled, but among the rest that were apprehended, a certaine Cittizen of great countenance, credit, and wealth, surnamed Iohn the old, when hee could not acquite himselfe by the Wardome, offered the King for his life 5. hundred markes, but the King commanded that he should be hanged, which was done, and the Cittie became more quiet. London bridge founded by arches of stone Lib. S. Alb. & Io. Leyland.

This yere, or rather in the yere 1173. after Rouse of Walwike, the stone bridge ouer the riuer of Thames at London, was begun to be founded, in a place where before had bin a bridge of timber, first builded and long since repaired by a Colledge of Priests, which Colledge stode where now Saint Mary Oueries Church standeth, in Southwarke. The King assisting this worke of the bridge, a Cardinall late Legate here, and Richard then Archbishop of Canterbury, gaue one thousand markes towards the same foundation. The course of the riuer for the time was turned another way about, by a trench cast for that purpose, beginning in the East about Radriffe, and ending in the West about Battersey.

This yere was compiled a booke of the orders and rules of the Exchequer, now commonly called there the Blacke booke: the author whereof (as diuers affirme) was Geruasius Tilberiensis Blacke booke in the Exchequer. nephew to king Henry the second. In this booke is described the reason and cause of the first institution of the same court, and why it was called Scaccarium, the names of the officers resident in the same, as well on the higher side, called the Chequer, as on the lower called the Receipt or Dreasury, their places and duties incident to the same, their priuileges and dignities, with diuers of their fees. The order and forme of making tayles, rolles, writs, and other like. The manner of accounts, and payments of rents vsed in these dayes, whereof some were yeelded in money, and some in victuals, prised according to the valuation of the money of that time, whereof mine Author maketh mention. For proufion of the Kings houshold vsed within his owne remembrance (as he saith) from the time of king Henry the first, wherein the officers of the Kings houshold reducing their victuailes into an estimate of money, did value for a measure of wheate to make bread for the seruice of 100. men one shilling: for the carcase of a fat Ore, one shilling: for a fat Hogge foure pence: for the prouender of 20. horses foure pence: many other especiall notes are contained in these bookes worthy of memory, which for breuity I ouer passe.

Wholesome bread for ten hundred men, xiii. pence. A fat Hogge iiii. pence.

In March the King called a Conuocation of the Clergie at London, when the Popes Legate was set, and the Archbishop of Canterbury on his right hand, as primate of England, the Archbishop of Yorke disdained to sit on the left hand, came and swapt him downe to haue thrust his taile betwixt the Legat and the Archbishop of Canterbury, which Archbishop being loath to remoue, the other set his buttocke in his lappe, but he had vneth touched him with his bumme, when the Bishops and other of the Clergie and Lattie crept to him, pulled him, threw him to the ground, and began to lay on him with fists and battes, so that the Archbishop of Canterbury (yeelding good for euil) was faine to defend the other Archbishop, who with his rent Coape got vp, and away straight to the King with a great complaint: but when the truth of the matter was once knowne, hee was well laughed at for his remedie.

The Church of secular Chanons at Waltam in Eſſex, founded by Harold, was by the Kings commandement new builded and regular Chanons placed there, to the number of 24. Richard the first augmented it, and so did Henry the third, with Farres and Markets, a Fayre for seauen dayes, and at Spingburg a Market euery Sunday, and a Fayre for three dayes. This Abbey at the generall surney, and surrender, was valued to dispend yerely 900. pound, foure shillings and foure pence. William Abbey. 1177. Vyodegans, Geruasius.

Rosamond the fayre daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, Concubine to Henry the second (poysoned by Queene Elianor as some thought) dyed at Woodstocke, where King Henry had made for her an house of a wonderfull working, so that no man or woman might come to her, but he that was instructed by the King, or such as were right secret with him touching the matter. This house after some was named Labyrinthus, or Dedalus worke, which was thought to be an house wrought like vnto a knot in a garden, called a Maze, but it was commonly said, that lastly the Queene came to her by a clew of thredde, or silke, and so dealt with her, that shee lued not long after, but when shee was dead, shee was buried at Godstow, in an house of Nunnes, beside Oxford with these verses vpon her Tombe. Rosamond concubine to king Henry the 2.

Hic iacet in tumba, Rosa mundi, non rosa munda,

After the death of this Rosamond, King Henry tooke priuily the daughter of Lewis King of France (that should haue beene married to his sonne Richard Earle of Poytow) for his Leman, and had practised for a diuorce betwixt him and Elianor his Queene: wherupon followed great discord betwixt the King of England and of France: but King Henry saying ouer into Ludouicus Viues.

Kings ſisters and daughters put to Nunneries. This yere 1178. Ferry alias Fredericke the first Emperour of that name, after he had continued seauen yeres in wrathfull siege about Milaine, hee take the Cittie, slew and spoyled all sorts and sexe of people, not sparing any, sauing such silly Infants, as in simplicitie would sucke an Asse instead of a mulke, and would eate pulse instead of mulke. He vsed more cruelty and torments vnto the Milanoises then I can heere relate, besides the ruine of that glorious Cittie, and the cause why hee dealt so extreamely with them was, for that the Cittizens called him, not long before, to bee set vpon an Asse, with his face towards her taile, and holding her taile in his hand instead of a bridle, and in this fashion with as great shame and derision as they could, they sent him forth to warres. But when hee returned to the siege of Milaine he wanted neither friends nor followers nor fauourites, whose fingers pitched to be auenged of that proud Citty for her pride, contempt, and immodestly. At this destruction was present Henry Lyon, Duke of Bauarya, and Reighnold Archbishop of Collen who twelue yeres after seeing as they verily supposed the absolute destruction of that Citty, they transposed from thence the bodies of the three Kings which made their Pilgrimage to see Christ, and were directed by a Star as you may reade in the sacred Scriptures, and brought them with great reuerence to Collen. The bodies of these three Kings were first brought out of Persia into Constantinople, and from thence by a miraculous manner brought to Mylaine by Saint Eustorgius, and so from Mayland to Collen, where they now remaine, there were brought with him from Mylaine the bodies of Saint Felix, and Saint Nabor. Anno reg. 24 The bodies of the 3. Kings of Colen were shipped and are made from Mylaine to Colen. Or originall the City of Ilim.

The famous Cittie of Collen is so ancient, that it is beyond record and was of old time called Vbium of a people then called Vbyes, which inhabited round about it. And long time after that it was called Agrippina by Marcus Agrippa their gouernour. And so from that time it was possest and gouerned by the Romans vntill the time of Charlemaine the most famous French generall, who with wonderous valour wonne it, and draue out the Romans, and brought it vnder the French obedience, in the yeare of our redemption foure hundreth, and then he named it Collen: and fiue hundreth thirty and eight yeares after that, Otto the Archi-Duke of Saxonie, being then chosen Emperour and surnamed Otto the great, who raigned 30. and fiue yeres, hee won Collen from the French and reduced it vnto the Imperiall obedience, as it is at this day. Charlemaygne builded a stone bridge ouer the Reyne at Collen, but Bruno brother to this Otto, being Bishop of Collen beate downe this bridge, because no Enemies should come that way to the Cittie, reade Sebastian Munster.

On Christmas day at Dronhall, in the territory of Derlington, in the bishoprick of Duresme, the Earth lifted vp it selfe in the manner of an high Tower, and so remained from the spring of the day vnmoueable, vntill the euening, and then fell with so horrible a noyse, that it feared the inhabitants thereabout, and the Earth swallowed it vp, and made there a deepe pit, which is seene vntill this day. For a testimony thereof, Leyland saith, hee saw the pits there commonly called Hel-kettles. An. reg. 25 1179. Cron. Tiuens. John Leyland.

The nineteenth day of August at night, the Moone was Eclipsed, which was seene of King Henry and his company, as hee rode all night, to meete the King of France, comming into England, to visite the Tombe of Thomas Becket the Archbishop. The King of France came into England.

On the 21. day of August, Lewis King of France entred into England, which neither hee, nor any of his predecessors had euer done, and King Henry of England meeting him, as hee entred out of the Ship.

On the 23. of August, both the Kings came to Canterbury, where they were with due honour receiued of the Archbishop Richard, and other Bishops of England, the Conuent of Canterbury, and a multitude of Noble men. Lewis King of France offered vpon the Tombe, and to the shrine of Thomas Becket a rich Cup of gold, he gaue also that renowned precious stone, that was called the Regall of France (King Henry the eight put the same in a Ring, which hee wore on his thumbe) he gaue to the Monkes by his Charter one hundred measures or tuns of wine, to bee paid them yerely at Paris in France, hee continued all one night in watching and prayer at the Tombe, and in the morning required to bee made a brother there, and was admitted. Then King Henry shewed the said King Lewis all the treasure of his Realme, which hee and his predecessours had gathered together, but the French men refrained from taking of gifts, but taking leaue of the King, receiuing some things in token of amitie, returned to Douer, and so ouer into France. A precious stone called the Regall of France offered to S. Thomas Beckets Shrine.

This being done, hee went ouer into Normandy, at which time alſo Henry Duke of Saxony, the Kings ſonne in law, was by the Emperour baniſ-hed, and came into Normandy to the King, and brought with him the Dutcheſſe, and his two ſonnes Henry and Otho, and the King receiuing them, did liberally find them all things neceſſary for their maintenance. King Henry remaining in Normandy, made his Teſtament, giuing a-mongſt other Legacies, much to houſes of Reli-gion. Alſo to the marriage of poore maides of England, he gaue 300. marks. To the marri-age of poore maides in Normandy, 100. marks, and to the like in Angeou, 100. marks.

Ann.reg.29 1183. King Henry the Father kept his Chriſtmas at Caine in Normandy, with his three ſons, King Henry the younger, Richard Earle of Poytow, and Geffrey Earle of Britaine: there was alſo Henry Duke of Saxonie, with his wife and their children, the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and Colaine, with other Biſhops, Earles and Ba-rons in great number. Here would King Hen-ry the Father, that his ſonne Henry the young K. ſhould haue receiued homage of his brethren, Richard Earle of Poytow, and Geffrey Earle of Britaine, whereunto the Earle of Britaine did not ſtay to grant, but the Earle of Poytow vt-terly refuſed to doe it, ſaying, it was not conue-nient ſo long as their Father liued, to acknow-ledge any ſuperiority to his brother: for as the Fathers inheritance was due to the eldeſt ſonne ſo he had to claime thoſe lands which belonged to his Mother. This deniall much offended his bro-ther the young King, whereupon Richard de-parted from the Court in great diſpleaſure, and comming into Poytow, he began to fortifie his Caſtles, that he might be in a readineſſe to ſtand at defence for his ſafeguard, if his father or bre-thren ſhould come to purſue him. But not long after, King Henry the ſonne, by counſell of his father followed him, being alſo incouraged there-unto by the earles and Barons of Poytow, which for the ſharpe and cruell gouernment of Earle Richard hated him. And ſhortly after commeth their brother Geffrey with a great army in ayde of his brother the young King, in ſo much that Earle Richard not knowing how to ſhift the preſent danger, ſent to his father for ayde. Who being ſory to ſee ſuch vnnaturall dealing amongſt his ſonnes, gathered an army, and came for-ward, and did ſo much, that all the three ſonnes came to Angeres, and there ſware to bee obedi-ent to their Fathers will. Whereupon a day was appointed them to meete at Myrable. In the meane while, King Henry the Sonne obtai-ned licence of his Father to goe into Limoges, vnder pretence that he might there labour to re-duce both his brother Geffrey, and the Barons of Guyen to quietneſſe, but all was diſſembling, for that when their Father followed with an ar-my, and came to Limoges inſtead of receiuing him with honour, they ſhot at him, ſo that they peirced through his vppermoſt armour, &c. At length, when K. Henry the younger, and his bro-ther Geffrey had done againſt their Father what they could, and yet could not obtaine their purpoſe for that their power was farre vncomparable to their wils, King Henry the younger, through in-dignation and diſpleaſure, fell into a greeuous ſickneſſe, in a village called Martell, not farre from Limoges, where his Father lay at ſiege. At the firſt he was taken with an extreame Feau-er, and after followed a flure, where through perceiuing himſelfe in danger of death, hee ſent to his Father, confeſſing his treſpaſſe, requiring him of forgiueneſſe, and alſo to come to him, but the Father fearing to commit himſelfe into the hands of ſuch vngracious perſons, as were about his ſonne refuſed to come at him, ſending him his ring in token of his bleſſing, and as it were a pledge or witneſſe, to ſignifie that he had forgiuen him. The yong King receiuing it with great humilitie kiſſed it, and ſo ended his life, without iſſue. Thus was the vnobedient childe cut off, as it had beene a Weauers thred, at the age of twenty eight yeares, his bodie being wound in thoſe linnen clothes, that at his Coro-nation were imbawed with holy Oriſme, he was royally buryed at Roane, in the Cathedrall Church

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King RICHARD Cuer de Lion.

An. Reg. 1.

RICHARD the first borne at Oxford, for his valiantnesse was named Cuer de Lion, or with the Lions heart, the third sonne of Henry the second, began his raigne the 6. day of July, in the yeare of our Lord, 1189. at the age of 35. yeares.

He was big of stature, with a merry countenance. To his souldiers fauourable, bountifull to his friends: to strangers a grieuous enemy: hard to be pleased: desirous of warre: abhorring idlenesse.

Elianor the old Queene, mother to Duke Richard, who at the commandement of her husband had beene long kept in prison, was set at liberty. And then the with the Lords of the Realme abode the Kings comming at Winchester, where Geffrey Ridle the pyous Bishop of Elyfell sicke, and departed this life intestate, leauing in his Coffers great treasure, to wit, 3000. marks of siluer, and 200. markes in gold, which was bestowed on the new Kings Coronation, for the Bishops rente.

Elianor the old Queene, mother to Duke Richard, who at the commandement of her husband had beene long kept in prison, was set at liberty.

Duke Richard hauing received Adelisia, or Alice his wife, (vpon suspition that he had beene dishonested whiles he was in his fathers custode, sent her home with her Dowrie: hauing concluded a marriage with Ladie Berengaria, daughter to Gernas King of Nauarre, he returned into England, and landed at Southampton the twelfth of August, and on the fourteenth was received into Winchester, with him also came his brother John, vnto whom he gaue the Earledomes of Horton, of Cornewall, Dorset Sommerset, Nottingham, Darby and Lancaster, with the Castles of Marlebozow and Ludgarshall, with the Forrest, and the appurtenances, the honors of Wallingford, Tichill, and Eye, to the value of foure thousand markes by yere. He also gaue him in marriage with Isabell his second wife, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, the Earledome of Glocester, although Baldwine Archbishop of Canterbury forbad the marriage, because they were Cousins in the third degree of consanguinitie. To Robert Earle of Leicester, he restored all his lands, which had beene taken from him. He came to London, and on the third of September, was crowned at Westminster, by the hands of Baldwine Archbishop of Canterbury.

Iohn Earle of Morton.

Iohn Maior, Gentlewos in England.

Yde Tilli. Bishop of Ely diceaseth.

He commanded that no Iewes nor women should be at his Coronation, for feare of enchantments which were wont to be practised: for breaking of which commandement, many Iewes were slaine the same day. For the Iewes dwelling about the Realme, being there assembled, meaning to honour the same Coronation with their presence, and to present to the King some honorable gifte one of them was striken by a Christian, who alleadged the Kings commandement to keepe them backe, which some of the vnruly people perceiuing, supposing it had beene the Kings commandement, fell vpon the Iewes with staues, bats and stones, beate them to their houses, and after assailing their houses, set them on fire, and burnt them in their houses, or slew them at their comming out.

The Archbishoppe of Canterburie being sore offended with Earle Ioon the Kings brother, for taking to wife Isabel Countesse of Glocester his cousin in the third degree, wrote a threatning letter to the same Ioon, commanding him not to touch the Virgin, and to appeare at a peremptorie day before him to answer that matter. The 15. of December at Ielpwell, in presence of the King, Archbishop and Prelates were elected Geffrey d. Elect to the sea of Winchester, Richard Archdeacon of Ely, the Kings Treasurer, to the sea of London, Hubert Walter to Salisbury, William Longchampe, the Kings Chancellour to Ely, and Geffrey the Kings bastard brother, to the sea of Yorke.

K. Richard gaue, or rather sold, the Castles of Berwike and Roxeburgh to the Scottish K. for the summe of 15. marks sterling: he also sold to Hugo de Puteaco, B. of Durham, his owne Prouince for a great peece of mony, and created him Earle of the same, and then said in game, I am a wonderous craftesman, I haue made a new Earle of an old Bishop. He sold the Priory of Couentrie, to Hugh Bishop of Chester, for 10. C. marks, which Hugh with a power of armed men, inuaded the Priory, chased the Priors away, brat the Bonkes, lamed some, cast some into Prison, and spoiling the other, drone them away, brake the hutches of the Church, burnt the Charters and priuileges.

The King also seamed to haue lost his signet, and made a new, and then caused to be proclaimed that whosoeuer would safely enioy those things which before time they had enrolled, should come to the new Scale, whereby it came to passe, that many which could not finde him in England, went ouer the Sea, to fine with him at his pleasure.

In this time were many Robbers, and Outlawes, among the which, Robert Hood and little Iohn, renowned Theeues, continued in woods, dispoyling and robbing the goods of the rich. They killed none but such as would inuade them or by resistance for their own defence.

The saide Robert intertained an hundred tall men, and good archers with such spoiles and thefts as he got, vpon whom foure hundred (were they neuer so strong,) durst not giue the onset. Hee suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated or otherwise molested: poore mens goods he spared, abundantlie relieuing them with that, which by theefte he got from Abbeys and the houses of rich Carles: whom Maior blameth for his rapine and theft but of all theeues he affirmeth him to be the Prince: and the most gentle Theefe.

King Richard betoke the guiding of this land to William Longchamp Bishop of Ely, Chancellor of England, and the foure and twentieth day of February he toke his scrip and staffe at Canterbury, and the 6. of March toke the Sea at Douer, and transported ouer.

The Iewes in the Townes of Norwich, Saint Edmundsbury, Lincolne, Stamford faire, and Lame, were robbed and spoyled. And at Yorke to the number of 500. besides women and children entred a Tower of the Castle, which the people assailing, the Iewes proffered money to be in safety of their liues, but the Christians would not take it: whereupon their men of law said to them, it is better for vs to die for our law, then to fall into the hands of our enemies: and they all agreeing to that counsell cut the throates of their wiues and children, and cast them ouer the walles on the Christians heads: the residue they locked vp in the Kings lodging, and burnt both the house and themselues.

King Richard exchanged Cyprus, with Guy of Lesingham, for the kingdome of Hierusalem: wherefore the King of England a long time after was called King of Hierusalem.

The bishop of Ely Legate to the Pope, Chancellour of England, and Gouernour of the Realme, was forced to take the Tower of London for his refuge, wherein Earle Iohn besieged him, at length, the Bishop getting licence to depart, went to Douer, but he was forced to sweare that hee would not depart the Realme: yet beeing in a marnalous disquietnesse of mind, hee put off his mans apparell, and put on womans, meaning so to escape, whilest hee goeth vp and downe on the shore, bearing a Web of cloth on his arme as though hee would sell it, still waiting for a Ship, a sort of women pulled off his kercheife, and threw him to the ground and after beate him, and drew him along the sands, whereupon great cry being made, the Mariners ran, and with much a doe, got him from among them, and kept him streightly till hee had obtained licence to depart the Realme.

Then the Archbishop of Roane, with the consent of Earle Iohn, take vpon him the rule of the land, as Viceroy and Loue.

History of Crux Roisia, or Roiston.

A certaine Ladie named Roisia, daughter to Paine Peuerell, or Countesse of Norfolke (as she might be both) hauing in the Raigne of King Stephen, raised a stone Crosse in the Kings high way, on the North limits, by the which Hartfordshire ioyneth on Cambridgeshire, which Crosse was then called Crux Roisiæ of Roisia. Iohn Eustachius de Marke Knight, Lord of Mucelles, about this time founded thereby a Priory in honour of GOD and Saint Thomas, for Chanons Regular. After which time, there were many houses built, by meanes whereof the Towne began to rise, and by little and little to encrease, so that in place of Crux Roisiæ it is called the Towne of Roisia, or Roistowne. Vnto the which King Richard granted a Faire, and a Market, with other Liberties. This Priory was since renewed, and augmented by Radulph de Roncelle, and other: so that at the suppression, the same was valued at 80. pounds, sixteene shillings. There was an Hospitall of S. Iohn, & S. James Apostles, also suppressed and valued but at 5. li. 6. s. 10. pence.

King Richard hauing knowledge that Philip of France, inuaded Normandie, and that Iohn his brother had made himselfe King of England, made peace with the Saladine for three yeares, and with a small company returning homeward, was taken prisoner by Leopold Duke of Austria, who brought him to Henry the Emperor, & there kept him in prison, a yeare and fiue moneths. He was enuied for his valiancy, in that hee had shewed more proofe of his prowesse, then all the other had.

Wolfangus Lazius in his booke de Romano Wolfan. Laz. Imperio, affirmeth that Leopold of Austria, when he had taken King Richard, for some iniury done to the house of Austria, he compelled him to build the walles about Vienna, the chiefest Citie of Austria, the which walles within our memory defended all Germany from the inuasion of the Turke. King Richard in Austria, & the Duke of Austria in England.

The rumour being spread that King Richard was taken as ye haue heard, forthwith the French King and Earle Iohn made a great conspiracy together, meaning to take the Kingdome of England, hereupon a great number of seruings were assembled at Wittsand, ready to come ouer, but their Messengers being taken, their treason was bewrayed. Earle Iohn rebelleth against Richard.

Elianor the old Quæne caused the Seacoasts to be watched ouer against Flanders, but notwithstanding Earle Iohn came secretly into England to raise the Welshmen and Scots, but the King of Scots would not ayde him. The Welshmen in the parts about Kingstone and Windsore tooke prayes abroad.

The French King entred Normandie, found small resistance, wan diuers Townes, Gisors was deliuered to him, then he hasted towards Roane, and besieged it, but through the great industrie of Robert Earle of Leicester, he profited little there, and so returned into France. Earle Iohn perceiuing his treason was discouered, fortified his Castles, and passed ouer into France, and ioyned with the French King.

King Richard sent for his Mother and the Archbyshop of Roane to come vnto him to Almain, being now in great hope to be deliuered, and in the meane time the Archbyshop of Canterbury was made Regent of England.

Ambassadors were sent from Philip King of France, and the like from Earle Iohn to the Emperour, offering great summes, vpon condition that King Richard might remaine still in Prison, vntill the Feast of S. Michael next comming, or else to deliuer him into their hands. The Emperour shewed these letters vnto King Richard, which draue him into great dispaire of deliuerance.

The Kings friends intreating for his deliuerance, his ransome was set at 100000. pound, to wit, to the Emperour 10000. marks, to the Empresse 30000. marks: and to the Duke of Austrich 20000. marks: whereupon commandement was directed from the Kings Iustices, that all Bishops, Prelates, Earles, Barons, The Kings ransome. rons, Abbots, and Priors, should bring in the fourth part of their reuenewes towards the kings ransome, and besides this, the Clergie brought in their golden and siluer Chalices, and sacred their shines; all which was coyned into money.

This imprisonment of King Richard was procured by Sauaricus Bysshop of Bathe, and Glastenbury, to the intent to haue Glastenbury Abbey, to be vnited to the Seate of this Bysshoprike, for confirmation whereof, I thought good to set downe the beginning of the Certificate of Henry the third, to the Pope in this sort.

The Order of the Cisterncies did giue their wooll for one yeare, all the money gathered for the Kings Ransome, to remaine in the custodie of Hubert Archbyshop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of London, William Earle of Arundell, Hameline Earle of Warren, and the Mayor of London. Matthew Paris Rog. Houeden

The King was restored to liberty, the most part of his ransome being paid, and pledges left for the residue. In the meane time letters were intercepted of Earle Iohn which he had sent into England touching treason, one Adam of S. Edmond Clearke, being sent by Earle Iohn, to prouide that his Castle might be fortified against King Richard, came to London, and dined with Hubert Archbyshop of Canterbury, where hee bragged of Earle Iohns prosperitie, and familiaritie with the French King, for which being suspected, he was after dinner apprehended by the Mayor of London, who take from him his letters, and deliuered them to the Archbishop of Canterburie, who on the next morrow called a Councell of the Earles and Barons, and shewed them the letters, whereupon they all consented that Earle Iohn should be dispossessed of all his land in England, and that his Castles should be besieged. The same day the same Archbyshop and Bishops excommunicated Earle Iohn and all his fauourers, which troubled the Peace of the Kingdome. And forthwith the Archbishop besieged the Castle of Marleborow, which belonged to Earle Iohn, and take it. After this he besieged Nottingham Castle. Roged. Cano

The King taking ship at Antwerp, landed at Sandwich on the 12. of March, shortly after hee besieged the Castle of Nottingham, and won it, and after that the Castle of Tickehill, and then rode to Winchester, where hee was againe solemnly crowned on the viii. of Aprill. After this he called into his hands, all such things as hee had eyther giuen or sold by Patents or otherwise, by which meanes hee got a great summe of money. 1194. Godw. Vinc. Gerua. Doro. King Richard hearing that the K. of France had besieged Vernale, hee take the Seales together with his Mother Quene Elianor, on the tenth of May, and transported ouer into Normandie, and arriued at Harfleu with 100. ships fraught with men, horse, armour, &c. The King of France hearing hereof, plucked vp his Tents, left the siege, and departed. King Richard herewith entring the French Dominions, sent three bands of Soudiers toward Vale Ruell, and went himselfe vnto Lochis, and besieged the Castle and wonne it: about the same time Robert Earle of Leicester hauing forth of Roane in hope to worke somewhat; vnaduisedly in the of Leicester re- lands of Hugh Gourney, hee fell within danger ceiued. of his enemies, who take him prisoner with other of his company. King Richard wonne the strong Castle of Mayleborge by surrender, hee wonne by force the Cittie of Engolisme, and other holds: at length a Truce was taken for a time.

King Richard being in Normandy, kept his Christmas at Roane. Whilest both the King of England and France were bent to try their matter, by dint of sword, there came Messengers to each of them from the Pope, exhorting them to Peace, but they preuailed not, for as soone as the Truce was ended, they got them to the field, King Richard drawing toward Issedune, a Towne in the confines of Buric, from whence he went to Barien, and to the Castle there, then went hee to a Towne called Nouencourt, this he besieged and it was yeelded.

In the meane time the King of France, besieged Albemarle, whereupon King Richard came to raise the siege, and there was a sharpe fight, but the Englishmen weary with trauaile of their journey, and being rashly entred into the battell, were not able to endure the Frenchmens violence, and so not without great losse, were constrained to retyre.

King Richard sent Messengers to the Pope, complayning vpon the Duke of Austrich, for misusing of him and his, as they came by distresse of weather through his Countrey: whereupon the Pope excommunicated the Duke, and enioyned him to release the Couenants that he constrained the King to make, and to send home the pledges: but the Duke refused this order, contemning the Popes authoritie; who shortly after hauing broken his leg, and in extreame anguith ended his life, and was kept vnburied till his sonne had released the English pledges which lay in hostage for the money behind of King Richards ransome, and further swore to stand to the iudgment of the Church for that offence of his Father.

Thus were the pledges released, and the residue of the money behind released, which thing to King Richard was both pleasant and profitable, for taking occasion thereof to amend his former life, into a better order, hee put away his Concubines, and toke him to his wife, whom of long time he had not knowne. Moreouer the Emperour gaue to the Cistiaux Monkes 3000. marks of siluer, parcell of King Richards ransome, to make siluer Censers in euery Church of that order, but the Abbots refused the gift, being a portion of so vngodly and wrongfull gaine: at which thing King Richard greatly marualled at the first, but after commended the Abbots in their doings, chiefely for shewing that they were Lord of the accustomed greedinesse, that men vsed to haue bene in them.

Hugh Bishop of Lincolne gaue to the King a thousand markes for his mantle of Sables, which his predecessors were wont yearely to haue giuen them by the King. An. reg. 7.

Robert Earle of Leicester, offered to the King of France for his ransome, a thousand marks sterling, and to quit claime to him and his heires for euer, the right which he had to the Castle of Pasley, with the appurtenances, but for y they were still continued, there was no answer giuen. Hee offereth money.

King Richard hauing refreshed his Souldiers, went to Miligio, and by assault wonne it, at the first brunt, and made it euell with the ground. After this, there was a motion made for Peace betweene the two Kings, being now wearied with long Warres. Whereof when Earle Iohn was aduertised, he began to doubt, lest by agreement made, he might be betrayed by the King of France, vpon couenants passing betweene them, and therefore determined to commit his whole safety to his naturall brother: whereupon coming to King Richard, he beseought him of pardon for his offences, and though he had not dealt brotherly towards him, yet that he would brotherly forgiue him his rebellious trespas, &c. Vpon whose submission, and by the intreating of Elinor his mother, and other, in the end, King Richard did not onely pardon him his life, but vpon his oath, restored him to the Earledomes of Poictaigne in Normandy, and Glocester in England, with the honour of Eye, the Castles except, and in recompence of his other Earledomes, his brother gaue him yearely 8000. pounds of Anjow money. Rebellion of Earle Iohn.

King Richard pardoned Hugh Nouent Bishop of Conentry, and restored him to his Bishoppricke for the summe of 5000. marks of siluer: but Robert Nouant his brother, died in the Kings prison at Doner.

William Fitz Osbert a Citizen of London, a man of degree, euill fauoured of shape, but yet very eloquent, moued the common people to seeke libertie and freedome, and not to be subiect to the rich and mighty, by which meanes he drew to him many great companies, and with all his power defended the poore mens cause against the rich, 52000 Londoners hee allured to him, to bee at his deuotion and commandement. W. Fitzosbert his beard. Rog. Houeden. W. Parvus. Iohn Terror. Genus. Dorobernensis. Cant. Record. Gual. Coven.

The King being warned of this tumult, commanded him to cease from those attempts, but the people still followed him, as they before had done: he made to them Orations, taking for his Theame this sentence, Haurietis aquas in gaudio de fontibus saluatoris, which is to say, Yee shall draw in ioy waters out of the welles of your Sauiour. And to this he added, I am (said he) the Sauiour of poore men, yee be poore, and haue a long time long the hard hands of rich men. Now draw yee wholsome water saith of my welles, and that with ioy, for the time of your visitation is come. This William was commanded to appeare before the Kings Councell to answer for himselfe in such causes as should be layd against him, where he appeared, but with such a multitude of people, that the Lords were afraid, and remitted him with pleasant words for the time, appointing some priuily when he was alone to apprehend him. Hee take the Steeple of Bow Church in Cheape, and fortified it with munition and victuals. The Archbyshop of Canterbury then being at London, with other Iustices sent to him, and willed him to come forth of the Church and he should haue his life saued: but he refused to come forth, wherefore the Archbishop talking with the Citizens of London called together, a great number of armed men least any stirre should be made. 1196.

This yeare 1196. as the French Chronicles affirme, at Beauvoysin betweene Campeigne and Clermont there hapned great Thunder, haile and Tempest, which was so violent, that it threw downe trees and houses, and that Rauens with fire-brands were seene flying in the ayre, and to set houses on fire, and amongst other was burned our Lady Church of Chartres, and the Castle of Chaumont. Strange tempests. Birds flying by fire.

The Saturday therefore being the Passion Sunday euen, the Steeple and Church of Bow were assaulted, and William with his complices taken, but not without bloudshed, for he was forced by fire and smoake to forsake the Church: he was brought to the Archbishop in the Tower, where he was by the Iudges condemned, and by the heeles drawne from thence to a place called the Elmes, and there hanged with nine of his fellowes. Where because his fauourers came not to deliuer him, hee forsooke Maries Sonne (as he termed him) and called the diuell to helpe and deliuer him. Ralph Higden.

This counterfeit friend to the poore, who named himselfe to be the Sauiour, perswading them against the rich, was a man of an euill life, a murderer, who slew a man with his owne hands: a fornicator, who polluted Bow Church with his Concubine: and amongst other his detestable facts, one that had falsely accused his elder brother of treason, which elder brother had in his youth brought him vp in learning, and done many things for his preferment. Yet after the death of this wicked malefactor, the simple people honoured him as a Martyr, insomuch that they stole away the Gibbet whereon he was hanged, and pared away the earth, that was bedded with his bloud, and kept the same as holy reliques to heale sicknesse. If folke accounted of him other by other meanes and vses his gods: God mend all. by fond flatterers false apostles.

King Richard granted licence vnto Philip his Chaplaine late made Bysshop of Durham, to coyne money in his City of Durham, which liberty none of his predecessors had enjoyed of long time before. Robert Earle of Leicester gaue Philip King of France two thousand markes of siluer, and the quite claime of his Castle of Pasley, for his liberty, and to be cleane released. An. reg. 8. Rog. Houeden.

Philip King of France, besieged Albemarle, and at length won it, and rased it downe to the ground, and King Richard gaue vnto him three thousand markes of siluer, for the ransome of his men of armes, and other taken in that fortresse. After this the King of France won Mountfort, & Earle Iohn tooke the Castle of Gamages Rog. Houed. Gamages Castle.

About

About the same time King Richard gaue vnto his nepcow Otho, the Earledome of Poyctow. Also, as the countelle of Britaine, the mother of Duke Arthur came into Normandy, to haue spoken with King Richard, Reinolph earle of Chester, her husband meeting her at Pontawlon, tooke her as prisoner, and shut her vp within his Castle of Saint Iames de Beuineman and when her sonne Arthur could not find meanes to deliuer her out of captiuitie, he ioyned with the French King, and made a great hauocke in the lands of his vncle King Richard. Whereupon the King gathered a mightie power, and inuaded Britaine, cruelly wasting that Countrey, King Richard and the Earle of Flanders confedered together. The French King entring vnwarily into Flanders, was intercepted and taken by the Earle of Flanders, but giuing pledges vpon Couenant to make peace, he was suffered to depart. An. reg. 9.

The eight day of September they met at Lisle, where by mediation of the Archbishop of Canterbury, they take a truce. The Archbishop of Roan returned from Rome, where he had complained on King Richard, for taking from him a plot of ground, whereon he builded a strong Castle, but at the request of the Archbishop of Canterbury, the King gaue him in recompence, the towne of Dieppe.

The Welshmen on the Marches tooke bootes and did much hurt, but Hubert the Archbishop of Canterbury, being Lord chiefe Iustice, Lieutenant, or Warden of England, found meanes to resist them, so that they being fought with, were ouerthrowne, and 5000. of them slaine. The Archbishop hauing got this victorie, returneth to London, where calling together a great number of the Nobles of the land, he resigned his office of being head Ruler, in whose place the Lord Geffrey fitz Peter succeeded in August. *1198. King Richard take of euery Carucata plough land, or hide of land through England, fiue shillings. Commissioners were appointed in euery shire, with the assistance of the Shiriffes to see the same assessed, and rated at after 100. acres of land to a hide, according to the custome. The French King was intercepted by the army of King Richard, so that with much adoe hee escaped into Cipres, his army was dispersed and almost an hundred knights taken, besides other common souldiers, without number. The Charters which the King had before made with his new seale were changed. An. reg. 10. 100 acres of land to an hide. Matthew Paris, Collectanea ex Lambert.

Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury through the procurement of the Monkes of Canterbury, and by the commandement of the Pope, brake down euen with the ground the Chappell or Colledge at Lambeth which his predecessours had founded, and he had finished in the honour of Thomas Archbishop of Canterbury.

King Richard turned his army against the Barons of Poictow that rebelled against him, he set their Cities and townes on fire, spoyled their Countrey, and slew many of his aduersaries cruelly, at the last came to the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and besieged the Castle of Chalne, and brought it to that, that they within offered to yeeld vpon conditions, but he would not in such manner receiue them but he would haue them by force: whereupon a certaine young man named Bertram de Gordon, standing on the Castle wall, levelled a quarrell out of a Crosbow, and smote him with a venomed dart in the left arme or shoulder: which stripe the King little regarded, but inuading the Castle, wonne it, and put the souldiers in prison. Of this wound aforesaid, he died the 6. of Aprill, in the yeare of our Lord 1199. when he had raigned 9. yeares, and 9. monethes, and was buried at Fonteuerard at his fathers feete, whom he confessed he had betrayed: his heart was buried at Roane in testimony of the loue he had euer borne vnto that City, for the stedfast loyalty he had alwayes found in the citizens thereof, and his bowels at the foresaid Chalne. *1199. THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King IOHN.

IOHN Earle of Mortoun, and Lord of Ireland, aged 34. yeares, a person of an indifferent stature, but of melancholy complexion, after the decease of King Richard, take vnto him, and reteyned al the knights and souldiers that had serued his brother, hee kept them in wages, and promised them large gifts. Moreouer, he sent Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, William Marshall, and Geffrey fitz Peter chiefe Iustice in England, to proclaime his peace to be kept amongst the rest of the Nobles of the Realme. These, when they came into England, caused all men to sweare to be true to earle Iohn, and so went forward to Northampton, where they called together all those Nobles, whom they doubted, and promised in the name of earle Iohn, that he should restore vnto them, and to all men, their right: and vpon that condition they gaue to him their fidelities. Also they sent word by Eustace de Vesey, to William King of Scots, that earle Iohn at his returne into England should content him for all his right which he claimed in England, and thereto willed him in the meane season to be faithfull to the said Earle and to keepe his peace, which he promised, by which meanes all strife and debate in England was appeased.

Whilest these things were doing in England, Earle Iohn went to Chinon, where King Richards treasure lay, which treasure, with the Castle, was deliuered to him by Robert de Turnehame. But Thomas de Furnell deliuered vnto Arthur Duke of Britaine, the Citties and Castle of Angiers, for as well by him, as by al other the nobles and peres of the Countries of Anglew, Paine, and Turon, Arthur was received as their soueraigne Lord. Moreouer, Constantia Mother to the said Arthur, deliuered him to the King of France at Turon: whom he sent to Paris to be kept, and tooke into his hands all the Castles and Citties that appertained to the said Arthur: but Earle Iohn and Elianor his mother, came with a great armie to the Citty of Mans, and wonne both it and the Castle, destroyed all the stone houses there, and carried the Cittizens away captiues. This being done Earle Iohn entring into the Countrey of Aniow held his Easter at Beaufort, and on the morrow after, he sent Du. Elianor and Marchadius vnto the city of Aniow, who with a warlike power spoyled it, and carried the Cittizens away captiues.

In which meane time Earle Iohn came to Roane, and there by the ministry of Walter Archbishop of Roane, he was girt with the sword of the Dukedome of Normandy. In the Cathedrall Church, where the Archbishop before the high Altar, did set a crowne of gold vpon his head, artificially made with Roses of gold, &c. Duke Iohn sware vpon the holy Euangelists to defend the Church and liberties therof, to see Iustice ministred to the people, good lawes put in execution, and euill lawes suppressed.

Then Iohn Duke of Normandy sayled ouer into England, and arriued at Shoreham on the fiue and twentie day of May, and came to London on the Ascention euen, where the Archbishops, Bishops, Earles, Barons, and other being present, Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury standing vp in the middest of them all, said in effect as followeth.

Your discreete Wisedomes doe know (right honourable) that by most reason none ought to succeede in the kingdome, except by vniuersall consent of the whole realme (praying for the grace of the holy Ghost) he be chosen according to the excellency of his qualities and behauiour, by the example of the first annointed King Saul, whom our Lord appointed vnto his people, not being the sonne of any King, neither of the progeme of any King. Likewise, after him, hee made Dauid King the sonne of Ishai, who was a stoutman, apt and meete for the worthy dignity of a King, and that because he was holy and humble; so that hee (whiles doth in such sort excell in prowes all other in the kingdome, ought to be chosen to gouerne the same: but if there be any of the kings linage that doth excell other, we ought to be ready to elect and choose him. This I speake touching the Noble Duke Iohn, brother to our late excellent king Richard now deceased, which had none heire proceeding of his body. Which Duke Iohn apparently plainly vnto vs, to be both wary & sout, whom therefore beseeching the holy Ghost of his grace, we doe with one consent elect and choose, as being both of the same worthinesse, and also of the same bloud and kindred that king Richard was of.

This Archbishop indeede was a man of deepe vnderstanding, a singular pillar of stability, and of incomparable wisedome, so that no man was so bolde as to make any reasoning of the matter at that time, because they knew well enough that hee did not without cause define in such sort of this thing: wherefore the Duke Iohn, and all other there present did accept of the choise crying, Viuat Rex. But afterwards, the Archbishop being demanded, why hee made this election he answered, and said, that by certaine Oracles, and by the gift of Prophecy, hee was certified that this Iohn should once take to himselfe the Realme and Crowne of England, and should bring to fame into great confusion: wherefore, to the end he should not haue so much occasion to bring these thing to passe, hee said, that hee was to be elected to the kingdome, though the same by succession of inheritance belonged not to him; and so hee set the Crowne vpon his head and annointed him King at Westminster on Sunday in S. Peters Church, vpon the Ascention day, which which was the fiue and twenty day of May: he was sworne to leue the catholike Church and ordinances thereof: to keepe and defend the same harmelesse from the inuasion of euill disposed persons: to distaunt peruerse Iudges, and erect good Iudges, and according to the same to minister true iudgement throughout his Kingdome.

The same day King Iohn inuested William Marshall with the Office of the Constable of Estrigale, and Geffrey fitz Peter with the Cheefehouse of Essex, and they serued that day at the Table with their Swords girt to them. Also Hubert Archbishop of Canterbury, was made Lord Chancellor of England.

Whilest these things were in doing in England, Philip King of France with an armie, brake into Normandy, and tooke the Citty of Euereux, the Towne of Argues, and diuers other places from the English, and passing forth into Saine, recouered that Countrey. Also the Iewes, wan the townes of Gorney, Butenant, and Gerselone: they tooke also the Citty of Aumarle, &c. Which being signified to King Iohn, he went ouer into Normandy, where many submitted themselues to him: but a truce was taken betweene the King of France and him, vntill the 26. of August. In the meane time, King Philip of France made Arthur Plantagenet Duke of Britaine, knight of the field, and receiued of him homage for Anioine, Poytiers, Turon, Maine, Britaine, and Normandy: for the which the said King Philip promised by oath to ayde him in recouery thereof.

King Iohn made a law, that no tunne of Rochell wine should bee sold dearer then xx. shillings, of Aniow xv. xviii. shillings, and of France xvj. shillings, and not aboue, vnlesse the same were of such principall goodnesse, that some for their wine would giue twenty fiue shillings foure pence for the tunne, and not aboue in any sale. A gallon (by retale) of Rochell wine to be sold for foure pence, the gallon of white wine not aboue sixe pence. It was also ordained, that in euery Citty, towne and place where wine was vsed to be sold, there should be xij. honest men sworne to haue regard that this assise should not bee broken: and if that they found any Vintner that should sell any wine by small measures contrary to the same assise, his body should be attached by the sheriffe and detained in prison, till order was taken for his further punishment, and his goods seized to the Kings vse: and the like punishment was appointed for such as should sell by the tunne, hogshead, or otherwise, contrary to the assise.

1200. Philip King of France and Iohn King of England met betwixt the Castles of Waylun, and Butenant, where they agreed vpon a peace, that King Iohn should quite claime vnto the French King, and his heires for euer, all Vilgelwin, Gisors, and other Castles. Also King Iohn gaue in marriage with his neece Blanch, daughter to Alfonse, King of Castile, vnto Lewis, Sonne and heire to Philip King of France, all the Castles which the same Philip had taken in Normandy, that is to say, Vernon, Passey, Pacy, and Nonancourt, and many other Citties, Townes, Castles, &c. besides to King Philip 30000. marks. King Philip then restored Arthur to King Iohn, and received of him homage, for Britaine and Richmond, both Kings sware to obserue this peace firme with their Seale for euer.

King Iohn hauing made peace beyond the Seas, returneth into England, where hee requireth an ayd of his Realme to pay the thirty thousand markes, and edict was made, that euery euery plowland should pay three shillings, which troubled the land sore, considering the scarsage that went before, which was for euery Knights fee two marks, which before time was neuer but twentie shillings. King Iohn went ouer, and hauing payd his thirtie thousand markes to the King of France, hee was there by the hands of Helias Archbishop of Burdeaux, and the Bishops of Poytiers, and Stone, diuorced from his wife Isabell, daughter to Robert Earle of Gloucester, because of nerenesse of bloud, as touching her in the third degree: And then hee married Isabell daughter to Amerie Earle of Angolesme; which Isabell before Hugh sur-named Brune Earle of Marches had taken to wife.

This being done, King Iohn returned with his new wife, and crowned her Queene at Westminster on the eight of October. And the same day King Iohn commanded Hugh Nuell chiefe forester, and the other foresters to weene all the Bonkes of the Castiaux oder throughout England, that from the Octaues of Saint Michaell, vnto the Quindem, they should remoue all their Hoses, their Swine, and other Cattell whatsoeuer off the forrest ground: and if any were after found vpon the forrest ground, they should bee sold to the Kings vse. The Bonkes promised for themselues, and patiently bare the Kings displeasure.

The Archbishop of Canterbury sent to all the Abbots of that order, admiling them to meete the King at Lincolne on the xv. of November, that being together, by his helpe they might attempt to appease the Kings mode, they did as they were willed. The Archbishop counselled them, the next day to meete the King without the Citty, and to humble themselues vnto him, but they thought not this to bee the best way, least those that rode before the King should abuse them.

The next day King Iohn talked with William King of Scots King of Scots that was come to Lincolne, with his homage to Rorland Lord of Galloway, and many other noble men, to doe homage to the King.

The next day the Archbishop moued the King in the matter touching the Abbots, but the King willed him not to vexe his spirits, for hee meant that day to be let bloud.

On Sunday next following, the Archbishop caused the Abbots to come into the Kings presence at masse time: whereupon, after the King had heard Masse, and comming forth of the Church, the Archbishop besought him to heare their sute, and then they falling downe at the Kings fote, besought him to haue pittie vpon them: the King commanded one to bring the Abbots into his chamber, and he with the Archbishop, Bishops, and Nobles went into the same chamber before them, where, when they had sate a while, the King rose vp, and went into an inner chamber, there to conferre with the Noble men, such as pleased him; and after comming forth, called for the Archbishop and certaine other Bishops, with whom he talked secretly: and after the Abbots being called, the King appointed the Archbishop to declare vnto them his pleasure, which was, that although the King had shewed himselfe in words to be offended with them, yet hee neuer meant to hurt to that order, and now had put away all rancor and malice towards them: herewith they fell downe on the ground, and gaue humble thanks to the King, and withall, the Archbishop inferred, that the King requested them to forgiue him: and the King herewith fell downe, watering his cheekes with teares, and they likewise at his feete. The Archbishop, after both parts were vpon their feete, said, that the King required, that by their intercession hee might bee made a brother in the chapiter of the Cisteaux, and that they would procure him to bee admitted: Moreouer, the King hee said, minded to build a house of that order, that he might be had in memory, and would be a Patron and defender of their order. The Abbots being greatly reioyced, departed, praysing God.

1201. King Iohn going into Ireland take a great piece of money there, and returning into England, was crowned together, with his Queene at Canterbury on Easter day.

King Iohn with Isabell his Queene sayled into Normandy, fell into communication with Philip King of France, where they agreed so well, that they passed together into France, where King Iohn was honourably receiued Saint Denys, and into Paris, &c.

An. reg. 3. Hugh Brune rebelleth. A Noble man of Aquitaine named Hugh Brune rebelling against King Iohn, inuaded diuerse parts of the Prouince, because the king had married the daughter of the Earle of Angolesme, whom the said Brune had affied, and had in his custodie, wherefore they passed ouer, and restrained the Rebells from their attempts.

Ypodigma. Trope 15. The fiue and twentieth of June, there arose a cruell tempest of Thunder, Lightning, and Hayle, with a vehement raine, that destroyed Come, Cattell, Men, and Houses, by burning them, &c.

The tenth of July, another tempest much like to the former happened, so that the Medowes could not bee mowed, and the Hay that was down, was carried away by the outragious course of waters that ouerflowed the ground great numbers of fishes through the corruption of the waters dyed, many Bridges borne downe. Come and Hay carried away and many men drowned, so that all men though a new deluge had beene come.

1201. Ralph Cogshall. An. reg. 4. King Iohn sharply warred vpon the Earle of March. Hugh Brune, and the Earle de Eue his brother, who being not able to resist, they complained to Philip King of France, as to their soueraigne and chiefe Lord, who sent off times to King Iohn, moning him to cease from hurting them, but that would not serue: wherefore he was summoned by the Nobles of France as Duke of Aquitaine and Amow, to come vnto the court of the French King, and to stand to the iudgement of his peeres, all which King Iohn denyed; whereupon the same Court adiudged him to bee depriued of all his lands, which hee or his predecessours held of the King of France, &c. King Iohn commoned in the Court of Kings Court.

King Philip forthwith assembled an armie, and inuaded the Castle of Butenant in Normandy, which king Richard had builded, he rased it to the ground. He toke the land of Hugh Gorney, and all Castles thereabout. He toke the Castle of Albemarle, with the county of Eue, and all the land to arches, none resisting him. Also Arthur Earle of Britaine being made knight by the French King whose younger daughter he had affianced, he being but fiftene yeres old, went to Hugh Brune, and Geffrey Lucingham, and with two hundred and 50. knights, besieged the Castle of Mirable, in which Queene Elianor his Aunt was inclosed: but king Iohn came with a power, and deliuered his mother from danger. He toke there his Nephewe Authure, William de Brawse. Geffrey de Lucingham, Hugh Brune, Andrew Caueny, Saluarieus de Mauleon, and diuers others. Arthur Earle of Britaine made knight.

Great thunder and lightning, with haile as big as hennes egges, &c.

The waters increased, and did much hurt in England: Arthur Earle of Britaine, from Falaise was brought to Roane, and put in the Tower vnder the custodie of Robert de Veypoint, where shortly after he was dispatched of his life, some say by the hands of his vncle Iohn. 1203.

The king of France inuaded the Castles of Normandy, toke Leisle, Dandeley, with the Castle, and the vale de Ruell, in the which were Robert fitz Walter, Sayer de Quincy, and many other. He toke the strong Castle vpon Seine, builded by king Richard, which had beene valiantly kept by the Constable of Chester.

Among many other that found themselues agreeued with the shamefull murther of Duke Arthur, some to Geffrey Duke of Britaine, king Iohns elder brothers sonne, and therefore right full heire to the crown and realme of of Englaad was Iohn Courcy the valiant Conquerour, and earle of Ulker in Ireland: Which being brought to the kings eares, hee cast the said Courcy into the Tower of London. But the matter fell out better betweene the king of France and K. Iohn (as we haue heard) so that the King of France bereft him of all the lands that hee held in the fee of the Crowne of France, and among other matters, he sent hither a mightie man, who should try that quarrell with an English champion by combat: To vndertake the which, the King moued Courcy, who stontly answered him, that in his quarell, whose murtherous vile mind, cowardlinesse, treacherous conditions, and tyrannicall gouernment deserued not the aduenture of losing one drop of bloud, he would not fight one stroke, but for the honour of the Realme, Paulus Emilius. Of Iohn de Courcy that hardy man, Brehan, wherein many a good and honourable man lost his life to his great griefe, he would willingly haue giuen his life and therewithall accept the combat with a Gyant. But no harme was done, for the French man, as soone as he saw the mightie limmes, and fierce countenance of Courcy, went away.

King Iohn doubting treason in his owne men, in December returned into England, where he gathered great sydes of money.

Eleanor daughter to the Earle of Poitiers, that had beene wife to Lewis king of France and after to King Henry the second of England departed this life, and was buried in Fontenevraud. 1204. Cogshall. Mat. Par.

King Iohn confirmed to Aller ike de Vere the Earle Dome of Oxford, and made him Earle, by girding him with the sword. King Iohn sent Ambassadors to treate a peace with the king of France, but he because he would not with him would not agree in any wise, except Arthur might be deliuered to him alue, or if he were dead, he would haue his sister in marriage with all the lands on that side the Seas. Arthur Earle of Britaine. Cogshall. Mat. Par.

Shortly after he toke Falaise, Caen, and so forth all the Country to Barfleet Carbu. gh, Dunfront, Roane, Vernoll, and Arches: and so proud Normandy, Anioll, Britain, Maine, Poytow, and Thoraigne, were within a short time deliuered to King Philip.

King Iohn married Isne his bastard daughter to Lewlin Prince of Wales, and gaue with her the Castle and Lordship of Glingunoge now called Clifmere, in the Marches of South-wales. Brompton. Mat. Par.

Robert Fitz Parnell Earle of Leicester dyed without issue, and then Simon de Mountford, and Sayer de Quincy deuided the Earledome betwixt them, because that Sayer de Quincy, and Simon Mountford had married the sisters of the said Robert. Parnell. 1205. Cogshall. Mat. Par.

The foureteenth day of January began a frost, which continued till the two and twentith day of March, so that the ground could not be tilled, whereof it came to passe that in Summer following, a quarter of wheate was solde for a marke of siluer in many places of England, which for the more part in the dayes of King Henry the second, was sold for twelue pence: a quarter of beanes or peale for halfe a marke: a quarter of Otes for 40. pence, that were wont to be sold for foure pence. Also, the money was so sore clipped, that there was no remedy, but to haue it renewed. Annes. 7.

King Iohn gathered great armies of men to haue gone ouer the Seas, but being sailed onward of his voyage, he returned againe, and tooke escuage, two markes and a halfe of euery knights fee through England, procreeding a quarrell against his Barons, because they would not follow him into the parts beyond the Seas. Barons refuse.

1206. Cogshall Mat. Par. An. reg. 8. The Earle of Salisbury, the kings brother, Geffrey the kings sonne beget on a concubine, and many other knights, were gone ouer before, but all in vaine: the charges was vnestimable that had beene laid out about the preparation made for this iourney.

Great thunder and lightnings burning out of the clouds were seene, so that men thought that the day of Doome had beene come, many men and women were destroyed, beside cattell, and houses burned. The corne in the fields was beaten downe with hailestones as big as ale cages. Great thunders, lightnings, and wonders hapte.

About Maidstone in Kent, a certaine monster was found, stricken with the lightning, body like a man, and all other parts far differant from any one liuing thing. This dead body no man might vnneth come neere vnto for stench. A strange monster.

King Iohn toke the 13. part of all moueable goods, both of lay and religious through England, of which all men murmured.

The 27. day of January, a great wind ouerthrew many houses and trees, and a great snow destroyed many beasts. 1206.

The Bishop of Canterbury, by the aduise of the Pope, elected Stephen Langton to bee their Archbishop, and then Pope Innocent intending to obtaine the fauour of King Iohn towards this election, because he knew that he did make diligent search for precious stones sent him an eloquent Epistle, with diuers precious Iewelles, which were of King Iohn well accepted: and Stephen Langton was consecrated at Rome. Then the Pope sent letters to king Iohn, humbly exhorting him to receiue the said Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury, being thereunto canonically elected, the rather because he was an Englishman borne, and a doctor of diuinity, &c. But King Iohn being greatly offended with the promoting of the said Stephen, sent men in armour to expell the Monkes of Canterbury, to the number of three score and foure out of the Realme, and condemned them of treason, the Monkes went into Flanders, and their goods and lands of their Church was confiscate. Also King Iohn sent threatning Letters to the Pope, whereunto the Pope made a large answer. An. reg. 9. Mathew Paris.

Queene Isabell vpon the first of October was deliuered of her first sonne at Winchester, and named him Henry.

The 23. of March, William Bishop of London, Eustachius Bishop of Ely, and Malgor Bishop of Winchester by the Popes commandement executed the interdiction vpon the whole Realme, and they ceased through all England from ministring of Ecclesiasticall Sacraments, saueing to them that were in perill of death, and baptisme to children. All the bodies of them that dyed, were buried like dogs in ditches and corners: Many bishops, especially they that pronounced the interdiction, fled the Realme. 1208. Englandintersdicted. Nich. Trenet Mathew Paris, Rad. Cogshall.

The king set all the bishoprickes and abbeyes in the Realme into the custody of lay men, and commanded all Ecclesiasticall reuenues to bee confiscated. Also doubting least the Pope should excommunicate him by name, or discharge the Nobles of England of their allegeance towards him, he laid hold vpon them, specially such as he had in suspition, and toke pledges of them. London bridge builded of stone Ex lib. Pomis Londinensis.

The Arches and stone Bridge ouer the Thames at London, hauing beene three and thirtie yeares in building, since the foundation thereof was laid, to witte, in the yeare of CHRIST, one thousand one hundred seauentie and fiue, and the twentie two of Henry the second, was this yeare finished by the worthy Merchants of London, Serle Mercer, William Alman, and Benet Borewright. Maister Fowle a learned man, last Prior of Saint Mary Ouaries Church in his life time, reported, that at the first, being no Bridge at London, but a ferrie, the ferrier and his wife decreasing, left the same ferrie to their daughter, a Mayden named Marie, who with the goods left by her parents, and the profits which came by the said ferrie, builded a house at Sothwarke, which is the vppermost end of Saint Maries Church aboue the quier, where shee was buried. Iohn Lon. ed. vnto the which house shee gaue the ouerplus and profit of the same ferry: but afterward the house of Sisters was conuerted vnto a College of Priests, who builded the bridge of timber, and from time to time kept the same in reparations, but considering the great charges in repairing, lastly by the great ayde of the Citizens of London, and others, they builded the same of stone. King John gaue certaine vacant places in London to build on, the profites thereof to remaine towards the charges of building and repairing of the same Bridge. A Mason being maister worke-man of the Bridge, builded from the foundation the Chappell on London Bridge, of his owne proper expenses.

Welchmen in Anglesey.

The King gathered a great Armie, minding vtterly to destroy all the Coastes of Wales, but when he came to Nottingham, hee caused eight and twenty pledges of the Welchmen to be hanged: and immediately after, whilest hee fate at meate, there came a Messenger, that brought him Letters from the King of Scots informing him, that he should be betrayed: and likewise also came another Messenger out of Wales, from the Kings Daughter, wife to Lewlin King of Wales, certifying him of the same conspiracie, that is to say, that if hee did not leaue off and desist from that hee had begun, his Nobles would either kill him themselues, or else betray him to his enemies to bee killed.

Wherefore when the King came backe to London, hee sent Messengers, to all the great men, whom he suspected to be vntrue to him, and demanded pledges of them, who daring not disobey the Kings commandement, sent to him their sonnes nephewes, and kinsfolke, to bee at the Kings pleasure.

Peter of Pontfract.

About this time in the Prouince of Yorke, there was an Hermite named Peter of Pontfract, who was also called the Wise, because he had declared into many diuers strange things that were to come. This Hermite prophecied openly of King Iohn, and said, that vpon the Ascension day next comming, there should bee no King, nor from thenceforth, but hee said the Crowne should at that day bee translated to another. Whereof, when the King heard tell, hee commanded this Hermite to bee brought vnto his presence, and demanded of him, whether the King should dye at that day, or no, or else, in what order the King should he depriued of his Raigne. The Hermite answered, know this most certainly, that at that day, thou shalt not bee King: and if I be found a lyar, then doe with me what ye will. And the King said it should bee euen so, as thou hast said, and so committed him to William de Hartcourt to keepe, and he kept him in streight Prison vntill he saw the end.

There were at that time many Noblemen in England, whose Wiues and Daughters the King had oppressed, and other some, whom with extreame exactions hee had brought into great pouerty and otherwhile, whose Parents and friends the King had banished, and had turned their inheritance vnto his owne vse: so that King Iohn had almost as many enemies as he had Nobles and great men, and the report was, that they did send their writing and Charter to the King of France, sealed with their Seales, wherein they promised him, that if hee would come and inuade England, they would receiue him, and crowne him with honour.

Archbishop of Canterbury and other Prelates of the King dome.

About this time Stephen Archbishop of Canterbury, William Bythop of London, and also the Bishop of Ely went to Rome, and informed the Pope how many enormious deeds King Iohn shoes.com with great contumacie had done against God and his holy Church; wherefore they humbly besought him to helpe and succour the Churchof England, which now was in great danger. Whereupon the Pope determined, that King Iohn should be deposed, and another more worthy set in his place: Toward the execution whereof, the Pope wrote his letters to King Philip of France, willing him to expulse the king of England, and he should for euer possesse the kingdome.

...ere was a great multitude of people ... to extinguish and quench ... the South winde was also set on fire, and the people which were now passing the bridge, perceiving the same, would have returned, but were stopped by fire, and became to passe, that as they feared of pourtraied time, the other end of the Bridge also namely the South end was fired, so that the people thronging betweene themselues betweene the two fires, did nothing else else but bake for their death. Then came there to ayde them many Ships and Vessels, into the which the multitude so indiscretly pressed, that the Ships being drowned, they all perished: it was said through the fire and the ship-ragge, that there were drowned about three thousand persons. Wil. Packington writeth, that there were found in part or halfe burnt, 3. thousand bodies, besides those that were quite burned that could not be found.

1213. Noblemen disherited.

King John disherited some Noblemen without iudgment of his Peeres, and he would haue destroyed Randulph Earle of Chester, for that he reproached him with this, that he should vse the wife of his brother Geffrey Earle of Britaine, whom Randulph Earle of Chester had married, and from whom Randulph was diuorced by the counsell of king Ioan, and the said Earle had married the daughter of the Earle Ferrers.

King John being now in extremitie, and minding to impute the fault to them that would not appeale his fury aforetime, reprehended sometimes one, and sometimes another of his Nobilitie as traitors, calling them iealous, whose beds (as he bragged) he had defiled, and defiowred their daughters.

Cognot Dun. Mawd the faire daughter of Robert fitz Walter.

The Chronicle of Dunmow saith, this discord arose betwixt the King and his Barons, because of Mawd called the Faire, daughter to Robert Fitz Walter whom the king loued, but her father would not consent, and thereupon ensued warre throughout England. The King spoiled especially the Castle of Baynard in London, and other holds & houses of the Barons. Robert Fitz Walter, Roger Fitz Roberts, and Richard Mount Fitchet passed ouer into France, some also went into Wales, and some into Scotland, and did great damage to the king. Whiles Mawd the Faire remained at Dunmow, there came a Messenger vnto her from King John about his suit in loue: but because she would not agree: the Messenger poisoned a boyled or potched Egge against thee was hungery, who eate of the eyed, and was buried in the quire at Dunmow.

Mawd the faire poysoned.

At this time also King John subtilly, to excuse himselfe withall, demanded and obtained of all religious persons, a writing, wherein they acknowledged, that they had willingly giuen the King all that he had with violence taken from them.

About this time, the King of France wasted the King of Englands Lands beyond the Seas, and the King of England likewise wasted his: but at length a Truce was taken, and an Army of the Sea being betwixt either Host, there was a Knight in the English host that cryed to them of the other side, willing some one of their knights to iust a course or twaine: whereupon without stay Robert Fitz Walter made himselfe ready, ferried ouer, and got on his horse without any man to helpe him, and being ready against the face of his enemie, at the first course hee strake the other so hard with his great speare, that horse and man fell to the ground, and when his Speare was broken, he went backe againe to the king of France: by Gods troth (quoth King Ioan) he were a King indeed that had such a Knight. Roberts friends hearing that, kneeled downe, and said: O King he is your knight, it is Robert Fitz Walter: and the next day hee was sent for, and was restored to the Kings fauour, and by his meanes peace was concluded, and he restored his liuings, and had leaue to repaire his Castles, &c. There the most expedite and valiant Knights of England in those dayes were Robert Fitz Walter, Robert Fitz Roger, and Richard Mount Fitchet.

Robert fitz Walter.

Robert fitz Walter restored to his liuings.

King John caused a great Armie to bee gathered at Douer in the Lent season, and gathered together a great name of Ships, and whilst hee remained about the Sea Coast with his force to withstand the French King when hee should come, there arriued two brethren of the Temple at Douer, who came to the King and in friendly manner said vnto him: We be sent vnto thee (most mighty king) in the behalfe of Pandolph, who for the commoditie of you and of your Realme desireth to haue talke with you, for he hath to propound vnto you a certaine forme of Peace, whereby you may bee reconciled to God, and to the Church, notwithstanding that you be condemned by sentence in the Court of Rome to bee deposed from the title of your Realme.

Pandolphs Legate.

When the King had considered well the message of those Templars, he gaue them commandement to cause Pandolph to come ouer vnto him. And not long after, Pandolph came to the King at Douer, and said vnto him: Behold, the most mighty King of France lyeth with an innumerable number of Shippes, and a great multitude of Knights, Horsemen and Footmen in the Hauen, ready to come ouer to inuade, and depose you, as a Rebell vnto God, and vnto the Pope: there come with him also the Bishops that of late were banished out of England, with the Clearkes and Laymen, to the end, that whether yee will or no, they hauing the French King to their Captaine, they may receiue their Bishoprickes and goods.

The King of France also doth boast that hee hath Charters almost from all the Nobles of England, of their allegiance and subiection vnto him, so that thereby hee doubteth not but to bring his purpose to passe. Now therefore at the last looke to your owne commoditie, that you may come to repentance, and make no delay to reconcile you to God, whom you haue prouoked to take vengeance vpon you. For if you make assurance, that for his sake, which humbled himselfe for you, you will will humble your selfe to the iudgement of the Church, you may recouer your Realme: from whence, for your contumacy you be adiudged and condemned by the Court of Rome to be deposed. Now therefore that your enemies doe not reioyce ouer you, frame into your owne heart, and take heede that you doe not bring your selfe into such a distresse as you shall not be able to ridde your selfe out againe.

King John, moued to repentance.

With these words King John was moued to repentance, chiefly considering foure things. The first, for that he stood excommunicate the space of fiue yeares. The second, hee feared the comming of Philip King of France, which lay round about the Sea Coasts with a great force, prepared to depose him. Thirdly, he feared, that if hee should ioyne battell with his Enemies, the Nobles of England would either leaue him in the field, or deliuer him to his Enemies. And the fourth, which hee feared most, was because Ascention day was of hand, when according to the Prophecie of Peter the Hermite, hee should lose his life or Kingly Authoritie, both Spirituall and Temporall. For these and such like causes, King Iohn being fallen into desperation, did follow the perswasion of Pandulph, and take his oath vpon the Euangelists that in the presence of Pandulph, hee would stand to and obey the iudgement of the Church, and streteene of his Earles and Barons did sweare the same, and couenanted that if her paraduenture should repent him of his oath, they would compell him, so much as lay in them to performe it. Thus on the thirteenth of May, on Mundayy before Ascention day, the King and his Nobles, Earles, and Barons, met with Pandulph at Douer, wher with one consent they agreed vpon a forme of peace.

The Barons sweare an oath.

King John, and Pandulph, with the Nobles of the Realme, came together at the house of the Knights of the Temple, by the Colowe of Douer, on the fifteenth day of May, being the Ascention Euen, where the King, according as sentence was giuen at Rome, did resigne his crowne with the Realmes of England and Ireland into the Popes hands: whose Vicegerent at that time was Pandulph aforesaid: and when he had made this resignation, hee gaue the aforesaid kingdomes to the Pope and to his successours, and confirmed his gift with a Charter, dated the fifteenth day of May, in the fourteenth yeare of his raigne. When the Ascention day was past, hee commanded the foresaid Peter Hermite to bee fette out of the Castle of Corke, to bee bound at a Hoyse-taile, drawne through the streetes to Watham, and there both hee and his Sonne to bee hanged on a gibbet.

The Archbishop and Bishops likewise, with teares tooke him vp from the ground, and brought him into the Quyre of the Cathedrall Church, and with the Psalme of Miserere absolued him: then the King tooke an oath to call in all wicked Lawes, and to put in place the Lawes of King Edward. Diuine seruice being ended, the King, the Archbishop, Bishops, and Nobles, dined all at one table.

The second day of July, King Iohn sayled toward Britaine intending to besiege Nauntes, in the which Warres he had the ayde of Otho the Emperour, and of the Dukes of Louaine, Brabant, and Hollande, of Reignolde Earle of Boloigne, and Farrandis Earle of Flanders, so that there was a great fielde fought, in which the French King escaped narrowlie, but being rescued, hee tooke the foresaid Earles, put Hugh de Bones to flight, and droue the Emperour out of the Fielde, and then a Truce was taken betwirt King John and the King of France for fiue yeares by the Popes commandement, as some said, but as other said, this Truce was agreed by meanes of 6000. marks, which the King of England gaue, fearing to incounter with the great multitude of Frenchmen.

number. And the same time the Earles and Barons of the Realme, especially them of the North, came to talke with the king, he being then at S. Edmundsbury, but their intent was not only to talke with him, as well appeared: for after they had a long season handled the matter among themselues, they brought forth the Charter of king Henry the first, which they had receiued of Stephen the Archbishoppe, where of we haue made mention here before. And so they came together into Saint Edmonds Church, where the chiefest of them beganne, and they all sware by the high Altar, that if the king would not grant the foresaid Lawes and Liberties, they would make warres against him, and withdraw themselues out of his allegeance, untill hee did with his Seale confirme and ratifie the same. And they consented all on this to come to the king after Christmas, and in the meane season they would prouide themselues both of armour, horses, and munition.

The Barons require the Charter of Liberties.

Fishes of vnwonted shape were taken in England, for they were armed with Helmets and shields, in outward shape they resembled, and were like vnto armed knights, sauing that they were farre greater in proportion.

Almost the whole towne of Saint Edmundsbury was consumed with fire.

The king being lodged in the new Temple at London, there came to him, the foresaid Noble men, in warlike order, demanding of him to confirme the Liberties of king Edwards Law and other: the king requiring respite till Easter, was faine to put in sureties, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, the Bishoppe of Ely, and other, to satisfie all men in that behalfe, and then the Noble men returned. The king in the Church of Saint Paule at London, at the hands of William Bishoppe of London, tooke on him the signe of the Crosse of the Holy Land, by meane thereof to be in the better safeguard: the Earles of Chester and Darby did the like. In the Easter weeke the Noblemen in armour incte at Stamford, and after at Barkeley, whither came to them from the king, the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, William Marshall with others, to demand of them what they would haue confirmed, and the Nobles deliuered to them a schedule containing the olde lawes and customes, which except the king would grant, they would take the Castls of his lands, and so compell him.

Anno reg. 17.

The seuenteenth day of May being Sunday, the Barons came to London, and entred through Aldgate, in the service time, where they tooke such as they knew fauoured the king, and spoyled their goods. They brake into the Houses of the Iewes, and searched their Coffers, to stuffe their owne purses that had beene long emptie. After this Robert Fitz Walter, and Geffrey de Mandeuill Earle of Essex, and the Earle of Gloucester, chiefe leaders of the armie, applied all deligence to repaire the gates and walles of the Citie, with the stones of the Iewes broken houses. The Tower of London yet held out, though there were few within to defend it. When it was noysed that the Barons had London, all (except the Earles of Warren, Arundell, Chester, Pembroke, Ferrers, and Saltsburie, and the Barons, William Brewer with other) went to those Barons that were against the King, who called themselues the Armie of God, whereby such a feare came on the King that he durst not passe out of Windsore Castle: at length he appointed to meet with the Barons, in a Meddow betwixt Stanes and Windsore, which appointment he obserued, and there granted the Liberties without any difficultie, the Charter whereof is dated: Giuen by our hand in Runningmede, betwixt Stanes and Windsore, the 16. of Iune, the fruenteenth of our raigne, vnto which all the whole Realme was suoone.

Whiles the Barons returned home, the King being left almost alone, he sent Pandolph the Legate with other to Rome, to the end that by the Apostolike authozitie, hee might make frustrate the purpose of the Barons. Also he sent Walter Bishop of Winchester and Iohn Bishop of Norwich, with other, vnto the Realmes next adioyning to procure him soldiers, promising them lands and large possessions: By meanes of Pandolph the Pope disanulled the foresaid Charter and liberties granted, and also excommunicated the Barons.

By the other Messengers were procured a great number of men of warre, which landing at Douer, the king forthwith besieged Rochester, coueting to burne the Bridge, that no ayde should come to the besieged: but Robert Fitz Walter defended the Bridge, and quenched the fire; neuertheless after long assault the Castle was yeelded.

Rochester besieged.

As a great number of strangers were on the Seas, minding to haue landed at Douer, to haue ayded the King against his Barons, thzough a suddaine Tempest they were all drowned, so that about the Coast of the Sea, was cast vp such a multitude of men, women and children, that the Ayre was soze infected with their putrified bodies: It was said that of 40. thousand, there escaped not one aliue. The King had promised to this people, the Countries of Norfolke, and Suffolke.

King John diuided his Armie, the one halfe whereof he put vnder the leading of Savarike de Maulion a Poictouin, Fulco a Norman, the Earle of Salisbury his bastard brother, Gerard de Sotingham a Fleming, and Walter Buc a Brabander. Hee himselfe went against the Northerne men. Savarike besieged the Castle of Plashy, that belonged to Geffrey Mandeuill, the other gaue themselues to wake the Countrey about.

On Christmas day they spoyled the Abbey of Miltey, and carried away much treasure that there was layd vp in trust by diuers of that countrey. On new zeres day they did the like at Cogshall Abbey.

From thence they went to Saint Edmondesburie, and so to the Ile of Ely, which Ile they besieged, because diuers Knights and Ladies

About the Epiphanie Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, and other, returned from beyond the Seas, bringing with them one and fozte ships laden with Souldiers: and about the feast of the Purification of our Lady, they besieged Colchester Castle, but hearing that the Barons that were at London made haste to come and succour the Castle, they went backe to S. Edmondsbury.

Winchester returned.

The King with his Armie was long time on the Scottish Seas, and oft times inuaded the Lands of his Barons in those Coasts, burning their Castles, and spoyling their goods, in which expedition he went so farre, that it was not well knowne what was become of him, insomuch that he was noysed to be dead, and secretly buried at Reading.

Geffry Mandeuill dyed at London of a wound receiued in iusting: he was buried in the Pozoy of the Trinitie at London.

The Pope excommunicated the Barons by their particular names, but the Chanons of S. Paul in London, and many other Ecclesiasticall persons, with the Barons that remained at London, appealed against this sentence, taking exceptions against it, as pronounced by false suggestions.

The Barons send to Lodowike.

The Barons sent Sayer de Quincy and other, to Philip king of France, earnestly requesting him to send his sonne Lewis into this Realme, promising to make him King thereof, which the French king refused to doe, till the Barons had sent him foure and twenty Pledges of the best mens Sonnes in the Kingdome, and then he sent them ayde. Gualo the Legate was sent from the Pope into France, to forbid Lewis to goe into England, but his perswasions nothing preuailed, whereofore hee excommunicated them. Also the Abbot of Abingdon, renewed the excommunication against the Barons, the Citizens of London, and the French, which came to their ayde. About Midlent the king besieged the Castle of Colchester, and after a few dayes it was deliuered to him by the Frenchmen that kept it, with condition that they might depart free with all that belonged to them, and that the Englishmen should be suffered to depart vpon reasonable ransome, notwithstanding the Englishmen hee put in Dyuers impriso-ments. The Londoners also take the 65. ships of Pyrates, besides innumerable other that were drowned, that had besieged the Coasts on the Riuer of Thames.

In the meane time the King hauing knowledge that Lewis meant to come into England, he sent ouer to the French King, the Bishop of Winchester, William Marshall the elder, and other, to try if they could perswade the French king to stay his Sonne from that journey, but they returned without audience. The King therefore marching along the Sea Coast fortified his Castles, and getting pledges of the fiue Ports, gathered a great multitude of Shippes of Yarmouth, Linne, Dunwich, and other Hauens, fraught them with men of Warre, and determined to encounter the Frenchmen by Sea, when they came to arriue in England, but by Tempest that arose from the South, those Ships were brused, drowned, or driuen into the South parts of the Sea. Lewis hauing all his power ready at Calcis, Graueling, and Whitland, the Northeast wind comming about, hee set forward toward England, and with some difficultie, because it was a side Wind, he landed at Stonar, in the Isle of Thanet, the 21. of May. From which place he directed his Epistles of title and claime &c. King Iohn being then at Doner, because his Souldiers were strangers, durst not goe against Lewis, but fled towards Gilford.

Ann. reg. 18

Lewis went straight to Canterbury, where hee receiued both Castle and Cittie into his subiection, and after all the other Castles in Kent, Douer onely excepted: then came hee to London, where he was honourably receiued of the Nobles and Cittizens, who altogether sware fealtie to him, and did him homage at Westminster: After this taking the Castles of Rygat, Gilford, and Fernehame, he hasted forward to take the King, who as he heard was at Winchester, and had raised vp the standard of the Dragon, as he had meant to giue battell to Lewis if hee came to offer it. But when King Iohn heard that Lewis approached, he layde downe his Dragon, set fire on foure parts of the Cittie and fled. The Cittizens quickely quenched the fire, and went forth to meete Lewis, receiuing him ioyfully into their Citty, and sware to him fealtie. Heere came to him in manner all the Earles and Barons of the realme: then taking the Castle of Odiham, and the Tower of London, he returned into Kent, and the 22. of July he besieged the Castle of Douer, and continued the same till the fourteenth of October: then Hubert de Burgh and Gerard de Scoring, being not able longer to abide the assaults, obtained Truce, that they might send to King Iohn for succour. Whilest this siege remained, King Iohn went about the Land, consuming with fire and sword the possessions of the Barons.

Douer Castle besieged. W. Packington

Alexander King of Scots hauing subdued to Lewis all Northumberland, sauing Barnard Castle, with the Barons of the North, came Lewis.

King of Scots did homage to vnto Canterbury to Lewis, and did him homage, for that which hee ought to hold of the King of England, and as he came towards Lewis with a great armie, for feare of King Iohns power, as he passed by Barnards Castle, which was in the Fee of Guido de Bailoil, in the County of Yorkeshire, he with his Nobles of that Countrey, went round about the Castle to see whether it were weake in any place, and assaultable, and a certaine Archer within the Castle shot a dart, and smote Eustach de Vetay vpon the forehead, and pierced his braine, so that hee dyed immediately. This Eustach was a noble and mighty man, and had married the King of Scots sister, so that the King and the Noble men were sore abashed: and when the King of Scots had done his homage, he returned home into his Country.

The Vncertaine of Walter his Confession.

About this time it chanced that the Vicount of Melun a Nobleman of France, which came with Lewis into England lay very sicke in the Cittie of London, who when he knew that death approached, called to him certaine of the Barons of England, vnto whom he declared in effect as followeth: I am sorry brethren, for your subversion, and desolation, whereof you know nothing: for Lewis and fiftene of the Earles and Barons with him haue sworne, that if it bee his chance to subdue England, and to bee crowned King, he would banish out of the Realme for ever, all those which now doe take his part and persecute King Iohn as Traytors to their King, and will rote all their kindred out of the earth, and to the end you shall not doubt hereof to bee true, I which now lye here a dying, vnder perill of my soule, affirme this to bee true, and that I was one that did sweare the same with Lewis. Now therefore from henceforth prouide for your owne commodities and profit, and keepe this secret which I haue told you, and when he had said this, he dyed. The Barons perceiuing what danger they were in by Lewis, who had giuen to the Frenchmen the Lands and Castles which pertained to the Barons, and when any murmured against Lewis, he cast in their teeth that they were Traytors, &c. they beleeued what the Nobleman had told them. This did also much increase their heauinesse, that they were euery day excommunicated by name of all earthly honour, so that they were in great anguish both of Bodie and Soule: Wherefore many deuised how to returne into the allegiance of King Iohn.

The King marched through Norfolke and Suffolke till he came to Lin, where the Townesmen receiued him with great ioy, and honoured him with large gifts, there he appointed Sauarike de Malton to be Captaine, who began to fortifie the Towne: but here, as (it was said) filling his belly too much, as he was thereto greatly giuen, he got a surfeite, and therewithall fell into a Flixe. Afterward taking his journey toward the North, in the Water which is called Wilstreme (they said) he lost sodainely all the Carts and Chariots, with his treasure, and precious princely vessels and furniture of his Chappell, which he set most by, for the earth opened in the midst of the waues on the Marches, and the whirlepit of the deepe so swallowed vp both men and horses, that none escaped to bring King Iohn tydings. The King with his Armie going before, escaped very narrowly, and men said that night he lay at the Abbey of Swyniled, where he remained two dayes, and there (as men supposed) hee tooke such heauinesse of heart for the losse of his treasure in the waues, that he was taken with an extreame ague, and began to bee very sore sicke: the pernicious and greedy eating of Peaches, and drinking of new Cider encreased his sicknesse, and kindled the heat of the ague the more strongly, notwithstanding in the very breake of the day, with great paine, he went to the Castle of Sleford in Lindsey, belonging to the Bishop of Lincolne. There he was let bloud (say some) but so it happened, that about this time, to wit, on the 14. of October, Hub. de Burgo and Gerard de Sotins, being not able longer to abide the assaults of Lewis and his complices, obtained of him Truce, that they might send to King Iohn for succour, which Messengers when they were come to Sleford, and had declared their case, that is, that except he would rescue them in the Castle of Douer, the same must be deliuered vp to Lewis: his disease with griefe conceiued thereat, increased much, so that on the next morning, hee could scantly on Horsebacke come to the Castle of Newarke, which Castle also belonged to the said Bishop of Lincolne, in which place the sickenesse so increased in the space of three or foure dayes, that he take the counsell of his Confessor, and receiued the Sacrament at the hands of the Abbot of Croxton, and then hee made Henry his eldest sonne, the heyre of his kingdome, causing all that were about him to sweare to him, and sent letters sealed with his owne Seale, to all the Sheriffes of England, and Castle-keepers, willing them to bee attendant and diligent to the said Henry. When these things were thus done, the Abbot of Croxton asked him if hee should chance to die, where he would haue his body buried: To whom the King answered and said, I commit my Soule to GOD, and my bodie to S. Vlstane. And afterward, to wit, in the night, which followed next after the Feast of S. Luke, he departed this life in the said Castle of Newark, from whom his Seruants taking all that was about him fled, not leauing so much as any thing (worth the carriage) as would couer his dead carkase. At the time of King Iohns death, there came to him Messengers of certaine Barons of England, to the number of foure, with Letters requiring to haue come againe to his peace and allegiance, but he lying in the extremities of death, could not giue attendance to them, hee deceased on the nineteenth of October, Anno 1216. when he had raigned 17 yeares, fiue monethes, lacking eight dayes, at the age of 51. yeares. The Constable of the Castle, caused the Kings bodie to be bowelled by the Abbot of the Chanons at Croxton, which Abbot was expert in Phisicke and also at that time the Kings Phisition, to the end it might be the more honourably carried: his bowels being powdered, were buried in the Abbey of Croxton, vnto the which Abbey bey King Iohn had on his death-bed giuen ten pound the yeare of Land for euer, his body was honourably conueyed to Worcester, and there buried in the Cathedrall Church, neere vnto the body of Bishop Wlstane.

Thus haue I set downe the life (though much abridged) and death of King Iohn, after the writing of Rog. Windouer, Rad. Niger. Rad. Cogshall, a nameleste Chanon of Barnewell, Mathew Paris, and other, who all liued when the King raigned, and wrote for that time what they saw, or heard credibly reported. Notwithstanding, I thinke it good (as heretofore) to set downe concerning his death, as is reported by a nameleste Author, a continuer of Geffrey Monmouth, in the raigne of Edward the third, and since increased, printed by William Caxton, and thereafter called Caxtons Chronicle. This booke (I say) and other after commers report, that King Iohn was poysoned by a Monke of Swinsted Abbey in Lincolneshire, for saying that if he might liue halfe a yeare, he would make an halfe penny loafe of bread, worth twenty shillings, &c. as yee may reade in the sayd common English Chronicle. But to conclude, howsoeuer he dyed, certaine it is, that he raigned with trouble enough, as by the premises may appeare.

Issue of King Iohn.

Hee had issue two sonnes, Henrie and Richard, and three daughters, Isabell the Empresse, Elianor the Queene of Scots, and Ione: Geffrey a base sonne gotten on a Concubine, Richard and other: hee founded the Abbey of Bowley alias Bealieu, in the new Forrest in South-hamptonshire: the Monastery of Farendon, and the Monasterie of Hales Diuen in Shropshire, he reedified Godstow by Oxford, and Worcester hall by Warwicke, and increased the Chappell of Knaresborough, &c.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King HENRY the III.

An. Reg. 1.

HENRY borne at Winchester, the eldest sonne of Iohn, of the age of nine yeares, began his Raigne the 19. of October, in the yeare 1216. hee was crowned at Gloucester on the twentyeight day of October, by Peter Bishop of Winchester, and Iocelin Bishop of Bathe, in the presence of Walo the Legate, Sylvester Bishop of Worcester, William Bishop of Couentry and many other Prelates, Isabel the Queene, Randulph Earle of Chester, William Marshall Earle of Pembrooke, William Earle Ferrers, William de la Bruere, Saualric de Maulion, Iohn Marshall, Philip de Albineto, with the Abbots and other in great number: being crowned by common consent, the gouernment of the King and Kingdome was committed to the Legate, to the Bishop of Winchester, and to William Marshall Earle of Pembrooke. These things being knowne abroad, those that were of the contrary part tooke great indignation thereat: and because there should be no hope left to the new King to preuaile against them, they take a solemne oath, and swore they would neuer hold any Land of any heire of King Iohn; but the Legate maintaining the Kings part, admonished, prayed, and commanded them that were disobedient to the King, to doe the like as hee did; hee calling a Councell at Bristow, caused the Bishops and Prelates to incline to his part: Notwithstanding, Lewis did what hee could to the contrary, spoyling their goods and possessions, yet could hee not get one of the Prelates to doe him homage, or fealtie. William Marshall Earle of Pembrooke perswaded the Citizens, Castle-keepers, and other to doe their seruices to the young King Henrie, promising them great gifts, and large possessions, whereby they serued King Henrie much more faithfully than they did King Iohn his Father, for they thought that the iniquitie of the Father ought not to be imputed vnto the Sonne. This did also greatly incourage them, when they vnderstood that euery Sunday Lewis and his complices were excommunicated: Lewis and the Barons being not able to winne Douer Castle, determining therefore to subdue the smaller Castles first, they removed their siege, and came to London where on the first of November, the Tower of London was deliuered to them. From thence Lewis with the Barons went and besieged the Castle of Hartford, from the 12. of Nouember, till the first of December, on which day the Castle was yeelded: about the same time his men had won the Ile of Ely, all, except a Fortresse within the same, wherein the Kings people were inclosed. The Cittie of Lincolne also being won againe by his partakers, and the Castle besieged, Lewis went to Barkhamsted, and besieged the Castle there. In time of which siege, there went out of the Castle certaine Knights and Souldiers, who with violence entred upon the Barons, tooke their Chariots with their carriages, and the standard of William de Mandeuill, and returned into their Castle therewithall: but in the end, after long siege, by the Kings commandement, they yeelded the Castle to Lewis on the 2. of December.

On the next morning Lewis came to Saint Albons, and demanded of the Abbot to doe vnto him homage, which the Abbot refused, but Lewis swearing hee would sette the Abbey on fire, the Abbot after many threats, by the perswasion of Sayer de Quincie Earle of Winchester, fined himselfe and the whole Towne for 80. Markes of siluer. Which being done, Lewis returned to London: and a Truce was taken till the Octaues of the Epiphanie. The Feast of Christmas being past, the Truce yet continuing, Lewis called his Fauourers vnto a Councell at Cambridge, and the Gouernors of the King called the like Councell at Oxford. All these laboured to haue compounded vpon a Peace, or at least to haue prolonged the Truce, but when Truce could not be prolonged, Lewis besieged the Castle of Hedingham, and at one selfesame time, the said Castle, and also the Castle of Oxford, were both rendered, and in likewise were the Castles of Norwich, and Colchester, for to haue the Truce continued till a moneth after Easter: And by this meanes all the East parts of England fell to Lewis.

1217. Councels at Cambridge, & at Oxford.

Castles of Hedingham & Oxford, Norwich and Colchester yeelded to Lewis.

In this meane space to wit, on the 20. day of January, the Knights and Souldiers of the Castle of Mount-sorell in Leicestershire went out to robbe, which when the Knights and souldiers of Nottingham vnderstood, they met and fought with them, toke 10. of their Knights, 14. of their Souldiers, slew 3. of them, and returned.

The 22. of January, Falcasius de Brent, a wicked Robber, hauing gathered a number of Ruffians out of the Castles of Oxford, Northampton, Bedford, and Windsor, came to the Abbey of S. Albones in the Euening, spoyled the Towne, the men, women, and children, and bound them very fore, and slew some, so that the Abbot to saue the Abbey and Towne from burning, was faine to giue to Falcasius one hundred pound of siluer.

The towne of S. Albons spoyled by Falcasius.

About this time the Ambassadours of Lewis, which were at Rome about his businesse there, did giue him to vnderstand, that except hee went out of England, the sentence of excommunication which Wale the Legate had pronounced against him should bee confirmed by the Pope, vpon Maundy Thursday: for this cause therefore Truce was taken betweene Lewis and King Henry vntill one moneth after Easter, all things to remaine in state as they then were.

A truce taken.

Philip King of France called his sonne Lewis by speciall commandement, to returne into France, vnto a Councell at Lions, to bee holden about Midlent, which thing the English men tooke heauily: but he receiuing an oath on the Euangelists to returne before the Truce should be expired, they were somewhat pacified. Hee being passed ouer, straight way William Earle of Salisbury, William Earle of Arundell, William Earle of Warren, and many other, reuolted to the Kings side. Also William Marshall reclaimed William his eldest sonne vnto the Kings allegiance: and thus became the part of Lewis weakned very much, and the KINGS power was greatly encreased: And being diuided into diuers places they besieged many Castles at one time, recouering the Castles of Marlebozow, Fernham, Winchester, Chichester, and other which they demolished.

In the Feast of Easter, by procurement of William Marshall the elder, Randolph Earle of Chester, William Earle of Albemarle, William Earle Ferrers, Robert de Veteriponte, Brienus de Insula, William de Entelope, alias Lentelope, Philip de Mare, Robert de Gangy, Falcarius de Brent, with his Castle-keeper and many other were gathered together, to besiege the Castle of Mount-sozell in Leicestershyre, the cheefe keeper of which Castle was named Henry de Braybrooke, who sent to Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, then at London with the Frenchmen, and requiring him to come to their ayde: whereupon the said Earle of Winchester, to whom the Castle belonged, went to Lewis, then lately returned out of France, requiring him to send some ayde to remoue the siege, and so a Power was sent out of London, fiue hundred Knights, and twentie thousand armed Souldiers; they had 60 Captaines, Earle Patricius, the Marshall of France, Sayer de Quincy, Robert Fitz Walter, and other, who marching forward, spoyled S. Albons, the Church at Ruddoyne, Dunstable, and so forth toward the North, to raise the siege before Mount sozell: but Ranulph Earle of Chester, and other left off their siege, and went to the Castle of Nottingham. The Barons aforesaid finding the siege to be remoued, they march toward Lincolne, where Gilbert de Gaunt and other had laide siege: they assaulted the Castle sharpely, but William Marshall the elder sent thither a great power, such as would bee in this place too long to write. But to be short, these with much difficultie brake the Gates of the Citty of Lincolne, and entring the Towne, they boldly smote vpon their enemies, and fought there a cruell battell, wherein the Kings part so vnhorsed the Barons, that they slew and toke the most part of them: which being done the Kings company fell vpon the Earle af Percy, and smote him through the braines, so that hee fell downe dead. Thus when the greatest part of the Frenchmen were slaine, the residue toke them to flight, the Barons on the Kings side following them that fled, toke many in the chase, amongst amongst the which was taken Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, Henry de Bohune Earle of Hertford, Gilbert de Gaunt whom Lewis had lately made Earle of Lincolne, Robert fitz Walter, Richard de Mountchensi, William de Mowbray, William de Bellocampo, William Mandute, Almaricus de Hacary, Roger de Crasse, William de Caluile, William de Rele, Robert de Reperse, Radulph Chandoise, and many more. The Kings soldiers spoyled the Citty to the bare walles. This battell was tought on th 19. day of May.

On the next morrow there came newes to the King, that the Castle of Mount-sozell was forsaken: whereupon the sheriffe of Nottinghamshire was commanded to lay the same flatte with the ground.

Castle of Mount-sozell ouerthrowne.

Lewis thought this misfortune that fell to him at Lincolne, fell in despaire of any good end to come to his purpose, and therefore sent messengers to his father, and to Blanch his wife, who forthwith dispatched to him a power: But the Coasts by William Marshalls commandement were kept. And now vpon Saint Bartholomews day the Apostle, the nany of French men were commanded to the wicked man Eustach the Moyne or Monke, to be conducted to the ayde of Lewis then being at London. These being entred into the Sea, had a faire wind, which draue them vpon the English Coast: where when they were sailed a great way on their voyage, Hubert de Burgo and they of the Posts, espying them to be twenty ships, and a great number of smaller vessells, and gallies well armed, they durst not ioyne battaile with them on the Sea, hauing themselues not past fourtie Galleies and Ships, not hauing the ayde of the Kings Souldiers, fell roughly vpon them on the backe parte, made great slaughter of them. The Englishmen also hadde Galleies with yron hookes, which gowged the shippes of their enemies, whereby they were drowned in a moment: there was a cruell fight betweene them, but the Frenchmen in short space were vtterly vanquished: Eustach le Moyne was slaine by Richard a bastard Sonne of King Iohn.

Lewis of France his power of French vanquished.

These things beeing thus done, William Earle Marshall besieged the Cittie of London round about as well by water as by land, to cause them within to yeeld: whereupon Lewis being in so great a straite, gaue vnderstanding to the Legate, and to Earle Marshall, that he would bee ruled by their Councell in all things, vpon condition that hauing his honour and auoyding slander of his meane, hee might haue peace conuenient: whereupon both parties met, and talked together; Here vnto the towne of Staines, hard by the riuer of Thames, King Henry, the Legate, the Marshall, and many other on the one part, and the said Lewis, the Barons, and noble men on the other side, where by the operation of Gods grace, they did fully agree to the same of peace on the xi. day of September. First Lewis and the excommunicate persons of his side, did sweare by the holy Euangelists, they should stand to the order and iudgement of the Church, and should be faithfull &c. Lewis returned into France. From the benefit of the absolution and peace were exempted, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and all of the Clergie, which had borne any fauour to Lewis and the Barons, were all deprined from their benefices by the Legate.

Lewis returned into France.

Ranulph Earle of Chester, Sayer de Quincy Earle of Winchester, William de Albeneto Earle of Arundell, William Earle Ferrers, with the Barons, Robert fitz Walter, John Constable of Chester, and William Harcourt, with a great traine, toke their iourney toward Jerusalem. Wale the Legate being sent for by the Pope to returne, departed toward Rome with an infinite quantity of money gotten by one meanes or other, and Pandolph elected Bishop of Norwich succeeded Legate. About this time King Henry did obtaine and gate the proper seale of the Realme into his custody.

1220 King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Parlebrow.

About Midlent, Pandolpe the Legate called a Councell at London, the Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, and other being preſent, the Abbot of Welles was conſecrated Biſhop of Ely. Unto the which Councell Robert ſometime Abbot of Thorney, brought the Popes Letters, which commanded his Legate Pandolpe and Stephen Archbiſhop of Canterbury, that they ſhould ſee the King to be newly crowned, becauſe his firſt Coronation, by reaſon of the troubles, was not ſo ſolemnly done as was decent: Wherenpon order was taken, and on Whitſunday her was crowned at Weſtminſter by Stephen Langton Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie.

King Henry newlye crowned.

Ralph Earle of Cheſter returned from Damata my ſiege wherof he had ſet forth himſelfe and his people, with moſt large expences, whereby he wonne praiſe and honour before God and men: But Sayer de Quincy Earle of Wincheſter, with Robert Fitz Walter and other arriving at Damata after the ſame was wonne, dyed there.

A Prouinciall councell was holden at Oxforde, by Stephen Langton Archbiſhoppe of Canterburie, and his ſuffragane Biſhops and others, in the conuentuall Church of Oſney, fifteene dayes after Eaſter, where were degraded a prieſt and a Deacon, the prieſt for homicide, the Deacon for ſacrilege and theft committed. Another Deacon offending more deeply, denyed the profeſſion of Chriſtian religions and for the loue hee bare to a Iewiſh woman, cauſed himſelfe to bee circumciſed following the Iewiſh rites and cuſtomes: hee was degraded, and being left as a lay perſon and Apoſtata, was condemned and committed to the fire, by the ſeruants of Falcacius, wherein hee miſerablyended his life. There was alſo a young man and two women brought before them, the young man would not come in any Church, nor bee partaker of the Sacraments, but had ſuffered himſelfe to bee crucified, in whom the ſcars of all the woundes were to be ſeene, in his hands, head, ſide, and feete, and he reioyced to be called Ieſus of theſe women and other. One of the women being old, was accuſed for bewitching the young man into ſuch madnes, and alſo (altering her owne name) procured her ſelfe to bee called Mary the Mother of Chriſt: They being conuict of theſe Crimes and other, were adiudged to bee cloſed vp betweene two walles of ſtone, where they ended their liues in miſery. The other woman being ſiſter to the young man, was let goe, becauſe ſhee reuealed the wicked fact. Prouinciall Councell. Gualt. Cou. Nic. Trivet. Rad. Coggeſh. Ieronimites Expelled.

On Saint Iames day, the Citizens of London kept games of defence and wreſtling, neere vnto the Hoſpitall of Matilde, where they got the maſtery of the men of the Suburbes. The Bayliffe of Weſtminſter deuiſing to be reuenged, proclaimed a game to bee at Weſtminſter vpon Lammas day, whereunto the Citizens of London repaired, and when they had plaid a while, the Bailie with the meanie of the Suburbes harneſſed themſelues and fell to fighting, that the Citizens being ſoullie wounded, were foyced to runne into the Cittie, where they Wreſtlings. Mathew Paris

Anno reg. 7. ſtay'd the common Bell, and aſſembled the Citizens in great number, and when the matter was declared, euery man wiſhed to reuenge the fact. The Maior of the Citty being a wiſe man and a quiet, willed them firſt to ſummon the Abbot of Weſtminſter of the matter, and if hee would promiſe to ſee amends made, it were ſufficient: But a certaine Citizen named Conſtantine Fitz Arnulph, willed that all houſes of the Abbot and Baliffe ſhould be pulled down, which word being once ſpoken, the common people iſſued out of the Citty without any order, and fought a cruell battaile (for Conſtantine the firſt) pulled downe many houſes, and oft times with a loud voyce cryed in praiſe of the ſaid Conſtantine, The ioy of the mountaine, the ioy of the mountaine GOD helpe, and the Lord Lodowike. Commotion in London

Few dayes after this tumult, the Abbot of Weſtminſter came to London, to complaine of the iniuries done to him: which the Londoners perceiuing, beſet the houſe about, and take by violence twelue of the Abbots Horſes away, cruelly beating of his men, &c. But whiles the foreſaid Dawney laboured to pacifie the people, the Abbot gotte out at a backe doore of the houſe, and ſo by a Boate on the Thames hardly eſcaped, the Citizens throwing ſtones after him in great abundance. Theſe thinges being thus done, Hubert de Burge, Iuſtyear of England, with a great armie of men came to the Tower of London, and ſent for the Mayor and Aldermen, of whom hee enquired for the principall Authors of this faction. Then Conſtantine, who was conſtant in the ſedition, was more conſtant in the anſwer, affirming that he had done it, and that hee had done much leſſe then he ought to haue done: The Iuſticiar take him and two other with him, and in that morning early ſent them to Falcacius by water, with a great number of armed men, who brought Conſtantine to the gallowes, and when hee ſaw the rope about his necke, he offered for his life 15000. marks, but that would not ſaue him: ſo hee was hanged with Conſtantine his Nephewe, and Gallyne, that proclained his proclaimation on the firſteenth of Auguſt. The King toke of the Citizens fortie pledges, which he ſent to diuers Caſtles: hee depoſed the Mayor, appointing a Gardien or keeper ouer the Citty, and cauſed a great gibbet to be made, and after heauy threatnings, the Citizens were reconciled, paying to the King many thouſand marks. Pledges of London depoſed.

Anno reg. 7. On holy Rood day was great Thunder and lightning throughout all England, and ſuch great ſhoures of water followed, with great winds and tempeſt, which continued till Candlemas, that the yeere following wheate was ſold for twelue ſhillings the quarter. Tempeſts and dearth.

On Saint Andrewes day a great Thunder ouerthrew Churches, Caſtles, and houſes, ſo that ſcarſely any body eſcaped free from harme by this Tempeſt. A knight and his wife, and eight men of his houſhold, with the fall of his houſe were ſlaine, in Pilardſtone a village in Warwickſhire. Great ruine throwe Churches and Caſtles

King Henry kept his Chriſtmas at Oxford, and after returned to London: In a councell holden at London the Archbiſhop of Canterbury and other the Nobilitie and Barons of the Realme, required the King to confirme the Liberties, for the which the warre was moued againſt his father, and that himſelfe at the departing of Lewis out of England, ſware to obſerue: whereupon forthwith the King ſent his Letters to all the Sheriffes of the Realme, commanding them to inquire by the oathes of twelue lawfull men in euery County, what Liberties were in England in the time of King Henry his Grandfather, and to ſend the inquiſition ſo made to London 15. dayes after Eaſter. 1223.

As the Biſhop of Ely was giuing orders, at Barnewell in the firſt weeke of Lent, there roſe ſuch a Tempeſt of raine and Thunder, that all in the Church were readie to fall to the ground, and ſuch flaſhes of lightning entred the Church, that each man thought it had beene ſet on fire, and ſuch a filthie ſtench aroſe withall, that many of the companie fell ſicke thereof, and hardly eſcaped death. Likewiſe whileſt the Biſhop of London was at Chelmiſford giuing orders, a great Tempeſt of winde and raine annoyed ſuch as came thither at that time: whereof it may bee gathered (ſaith mine Author) how highly GOD is diſpleaſed with ſuch as come to receiue orders, to the end they may liue incontinently, and at eaſe, of the ſtipends appointed to Church-men, and the offerings of the faithfull, giuing themſelues to banqueting, and vncleanneſſe, and ſo with vncleane and filthy bodies (but more vncleane ſoules) preſume to miniſter vnto God the Author of all purity and cleanneſſe. King Henrie kept his Chriſtmas at Northampton, with the Archbiſhoppe, and a great number of Knights, but the Earle of Cheſter with other conſpirators againſt the King, kept their feaſt at Leiceſter, threatning the King and his Iuſticiars, for the cuſtodies of lands and Caſtles, which the King required of them. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury and his ſuffragane Byſhops, excommunicated all the diſturbers of 1224. Diſturbers of the King excommunicated.

or the King and Realme.

The Castle of Chester and his complices perceiuing that the King had a greater number of men of armes then they, and also fearing the excommunication, came to the King at Northampton, yeelding their Castles and honours which appertained to the Crowne. Then the King layd siege about the Castle of Bedford, that Falcasius had long kept by strength, which siege hee continued by the space of eight weekes, and tooke the Castle on the fifteenth of August, on which day hee caused to bee hanged to the number of eighteene two men of armes and other Souldiers. Falcasius de Brent, who was fled into Wales, hearing that the Castle was taken, and his men slaine, vnder the conduct of the Bishop of Conentie, came to Bedford and fell at the Kings feete, requiring mercy. The King deliuered him to Eustace Bishop of London, and the Castle was made an heape of stones. There was granted to the King throughout England two shillings for euery carucate of land.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Winchester, from whence hee removed to Marleborow, where hee was taken with grieuous sickenesse, and lay there many dayes like to dye.

In the meane season, while the King at Marleborow recouered his sickenesse, there came to him William de Longa spata, bastard sonne to King Henry the second, that by gift of King Richard had married Ela the daughter and heire of the Earle of Salisbury, who after long and dangerous trauailes on the Seas, had with much adoe arriued in Cornewall: hee being ioyfully received of the King, made a grieuous complaint of the Iusticiar Hubert de Burgo, because, whilest hee was in parts beyond the Seas in the Kings seruice, the said Iusticiar had sent a lewde man, of base Birth, and euill race, to haue committed fornication with his wife, and would by force haue contracted an adulterous marriage with her. He said further, that except the King did throughly punish the Iusticiar for that fact, hee himselfe with disturbance to the whole Realme, would seeke to reuenge it.

Grieuous complaint made against the Iusticiar.

The Iusticiar being present, confessed his fault, and with great gifts, and other costly gifts, obtained the Earles fauour, so that hee badde the said Earle to a dinner, in the which (as men thought) the Earle secretly poysoned, went to his Castle at Salisbury, where hee lay sicke, and dyed, and was buried in the new Cathedrall Church of new Salisbury, with this Epitaph.

Also Geffrey de Burgo Bishop of Ely deceased, he gaue two hundred acres of meade in the Marsh of Wisbich to the augmentation of the Priorie of Ely. In whose place succeeded Hugh Norwold Abbot of S. Edmundsburie.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Orford, the Nobles of the Realme being there present, where there came vnto him the Archbishop of Burdeaux being sent from the Nobles of Gascoigne, Aquitaine, and Poytow, whom the King received honourably: there came also other solemne Embassadors out of Normandy of the like errand, that was to solicite the King on the behalfe of the Noblemen of those parts, that he would vouchsafe to come thither in proper person, promising him that they would all come to him with horse, harnesse, and all other furniture, and that all the people of those Countries should stedfastly abide by him, by whose helpe he might get againe all his inheritance. The King taking no other counsell then only Hubert de Burgo his Iusticiar, gaue them answer, that he would deferre that matter till he saw a better time, and so sent away the Embassadors.

Robert de Bingham, was made Bishop of Salisbury, who did stoutly (by the helpe of God, the King and good people) prosecute the building of the new Church, which his predecessor Richard Poore lately translated to Durham, had begun.

B. Henry dubbed Knight, Iohn the sonne of Hubert de Burgo Iusticiar of England, Richard Wethersef, alias Richard the Great, Deane of Paules, was made and consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury.

This yere the Vniuersity of Paris endured great afflictions and iniuries at the Cittizens and lay-mens hands, whereupon the King wrote his Letters to the Masters and Scholers, that if they would come into England and there continue their study, he would appoint them Cities and Townes with priuiledges and liberties for their abode, as should be to their contentations, 16. of July.

About the feast of S. Michaell the Archangell, the K. gathered together at Portsmouth, all his nobility of England, Earles, Barons, and Knights, with so great a power of horsemen and footmen, as neuer any of his predecessors at any time had the like, where there came vnto him out of Ireland, Scotland, and Galloway, that the number was marueilous, thinking to haue transported ouer such a power as were able to haue won againe into his dominion all those lands that his father had lost: but when they came to take shipping, they wanted carriage for halfe the armie; wherof when the King vnderstood, he imputed all the fault to Hubert de Burgo Iusticiar, and openly called him old traytor, casting him in the teeth, that he had taken fiue thousand markes of the Queene of France, to hinder his purpose, and in his rage, drawing out his sword, would haue slaine the Iustice, had not the Earle of Chester and other runne betweene, and conueyed him away till the Kings wrath was appeased.

Great preparation on to small purpose.

Hubert de Burgo goeth the Kings displeasure called old traytor.

At that time in the same hauen arriued the Earle of Britaine, who by oath was bound to conduct the King into his land: but the said Earle and other perswaded the King to deferre that matter till Easter following, and the Iusticiar was made friends with the King.

An. reg. 14

King Henry kept his Christmas at Poyke with the King of Scots, whom he had bidden to that Feast, the Archbishop of that Citty being present, with the Earles and Barons, and a great family. This feast was royally kept three dayes: and on the fourth, when the Sermon was ended, the KING of Scottes returned homeward with diuers rich guifts, and King HENRY hasted towards London.

1230. King Henry feasted the K. of Scots at Poyke.

hopeth thereof: for light on the Church, that the same was therein as though it would haue fallen, and out of a darke cloud came such lightnings, that all the Church seemed to be on fire, and such a thunder that all men thought they should haue dyed. Thousands of men and women came out of the Church, and being astonished, fell upon the ground voide of all vnderstanding, none of all the multitude tarried in the Church, saue the Bishop and one Deacon, which tried still at the high Altar watching the will of God. And when the ayre was cleansed, the multitude came into the Church againe, and the Bishop made an end of his Masse.

Anno reg. 15. King Henry sailed into Britaine, but lost his time in no good effect.

King Henry with a great army sayled into Britaine, where, after he had ranged the Countrey, and made many spoyles, besieged the City of Nannes, and did nothing but spend great summes of treasure, the Earles and Barons also, seeing that Hubert the Iusticiar would not suffer them to doe any thing against the enemies, they made banquets and feasts as they were wont to doe in England, and tended nothing but eating and drinking: but the power fort of men, to maintaine themselues, sold all that they had, and beggered themselues for euer.

King Henry returned out of Britaine with great losse.

King Henry returned out of Britaine, and so take shipping, and on the 15. of October landed at Portsmouth, hauing spent and wasted an infinite summe of money, and giuen ouer vnto death an innumerable number of Noble men, or at the least brought them low with sickneſſe and extreame pouerty. But Gilbert Clare Earle of Glocester dyed by the way as he came homeward, & was buried at Teuksbury, whose lands and honours the King granted vnto Hubert de Burgo the Iustice.

1235. Subsidie demanded and denyed.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Lambeth, where Hubert the Iusticiar pounded all things for the Feast, which being ended, the King called the Prelates and Nobles of the realme to a Councell at Westminster, where he demanded of them a great Subsidie, which would not be granted.

Richard the Kings brother married Isabell Countesse of Glocester, late wife to Gilbert Earle of Glocester lately deceased, and sister to William Marshall Earle of Pembrooke: and the Marriage being scantly finished, the said William dyed, and was buried in the new Temple at London by his Father. His brother Richard succeeded him in the Earledome.

Oxford and Cambridge-men their rents.

The third of May, the K. sent his Letters to the townesmen of Oxford, and Cambridge, rebuking them for their ouer high renting of their houses vpon the Schollers of the Vniuersities: commanding them therefore to temper themselues in their said rents, and that the same be rated according the auncient customs of the said Vniuersities by two Masters, and two Burgesses. Likewise the King hearing that the Vniuersities were pestered with many that fained themselues to be Schollers, the which were none indeed, he commanded the Sherriffes of Cambridgeshire, and Oxfordshire to make proclamation, that no Clarke should abide in any the said Vniuersities, except he liued vnder the discipline and tuition of some Maister of a Schoole, vpon paine of imprisonment of all such as should so remaine in any of the said Townes aboue 15 dayes after the proclamation.

Iewes Synagogue.

The Iewes builded a Synagogue at London very curiously, but the Christians obtayned of the King that it should be dedicated to our blessed Lady, and was since by the same King Henry granted to the brethren of S. Anthony of Vienna, and so called Saint Anthonies Hospitall in London, and since annexed to Windsor Colledge, by Edward the fourth, about Anno 1485. Shortly after which time, the same Church of S. Anthony was new builded by Iohn Tate Maior of London.

King Henry being informed of the hard dealing of the townesmen of Cambridge against the Schollers, in rating their houses rents, directed his Writ to the Maior and Bayliffes, remembring vnto them the multitude of Scholleers repairing to their Towne for cause of study, aswell from diuers parts beyond the seas, as at home, whereof themselues ought not to be a little ioyfull, considering also that himselfe and his whole Realme receiued thereby great honour and commoditie: And therefore in the end commanded them to measure themselues more temperately in rating their said houses, to be rated by two Masters, and two Burgesses, according to the auncient customs of the Vniuersity, behauing themselues in such wise as no further clamour came to him for that businesse.

1258. King Henry kept his Christmas at London with great solemnitie.

For so much as the King had oftentimes promised the restitution of certaine ancient lawes which he neuer performed, the Lords murmuring against him, held a Parliament at Oxford, which was after called the mad Parliament, because many things were there enacted, which turned to the death of many nobles. In confirmation of these acts were chosen twelue Peeres, which had authority to correct the breakers of them: the king his brother, the Noblemen and Barons, taking their oath to see the same obserued. Shortly after, they banished William of Valence, Galfride, Guydon and Aymer the elect of Winchester, all foure brethren to the king on the mother side, and other strangers.

Strangers banished.

Great dearth followed the wet yeare passed. A quarter of wheat was sold for 15. shillings, and 20. shillings, but the worst was, there could be none found for money, whereby though many poore people were constrained to eate horses flesh, and barkes of trees, but many starued for want of food: 20000. in London as it was said.

This yeare great strife befell at Cambridge betweene the Schollers and townesmen: and likewise betweene Schollers and Schollers of the North, and South parts. Wherefore the K. sent thither Walt. Giles of Argenton, Ma. Henry of Wotham and Walt. Laurence Broke the twenty fourth of November, authorized by his Commission to appease those tumultes: lest they vsing ouermuch extremitie to one part, and fauour to another, that Commission was shortly after reuoked, and a new charge giuen to Walter Nicholas at Tower, and Nicholas Handlo, two of his Iustices Itinerants for ceasing of those debates. The contention still continuing at Cambridge betweene the schollers and the townesmen in most hatefull manner, many of the Scholl[illegible] by agreement among themselues, departed to Northampton, and there raised a new Vniuersity by y kings consent, which continued not aboue 4. yeares, before it was altered, and the Vniuersitie returned home to their old place at Cambridge.

Vniuersitie of Cambridge remoued to Northampton.

In the Moneth of Februarie contention continuing betweene the schollers of Cambridge, and the townesmen, many of the scholl[illegible] agreed among themselues to depart frō thence, to the Towne of North-hampton, and there to raise a new Vniuersitie. Whereunto the K. gaue his consent, and granted them passport, but it was not long ere the Vniuersitie returned to the old place.

King Henry comming to the Tower of London, fortified it greatly, and caused the gates of the Citie to be warded, sending forth commandement to his Lords to come to the Tower, and there to hold a Parliament, which they denyed to doe.

Ann. reg. 46. The Barons discharged Sir Hugh Spencer, of his office of chiefe Iustice, and placed in his roome, Sir Philip Basset without the Kings consent.

The Barons discharged the Sheriffes and Iustices which the King had appointed, and they placed other in their roomes.

1262. King Henry with his Queene and Councell, kept his Christmas in the Tower of London.

On the second Sunday in Lent, K. Henry caused to be read at Paris Cros. a Bull obtained of Pope Vrbane the fourth, as an absolution for him, and for all his that were sworn to maintaine the articles, made in the Parliament at Oxford: then he with the Queene sayled into France, to make a finall concord betweene him, and the King of France for Normandy, where the composition was, that Normandy should remaine to the King of France, paying to the King of England and his heyres yearely 3 0000. pounds Tournois, which is 3000. pound sterling.

The barons of England (Simon de Mountfort being their cheefetain) armed themselues against the King, and all this yeare houered about London, and other places, without any notable act of rebellion, sauing that they robbed aliants, and such other persons as they knew to be against their purpose, especially they slew the Iewes in all places. There was slaine Iewes at London to the number of 700 the rest were spoyled, and the Synagogue defaced, because one Iew would haue forced a Christian man to haue paid more then two pence for the vsury of xx.s. a weeke.

In this meane while, the King and Quéene remained in the Tower of London, and when the Queene would haue gone by water vnto Windsore, the Londoners getting them to the bridge in great numbers, vnder the which she must passe, cryed out on her, vsing many vile reprochfull wordes, threw dust and stones at her, that she was constrained to turne againe to the Tower. The Citizens fortified the Citie with yron chaines, drawne ouerthwart their streets, munited the Citie, and did marueilous things.

The Queene chased. Nich. Trineu.

There was a Peace concluded betwirt the King and the Barons, with these conditions, That Henry, son to the King of Almaine, that tooke the Barons part, and was in Prison, should be deliuered, that all the kings Castles through England should be put into the Barons hands, that the prouisions of Oxford should be kept, and that all strangers within a certaine time should depart the land, those except, whose abode the faithfull persons of the Realme with one assent should accept: lastly, that the English men borne, and such as were faithfull men to the Kingdome, should order and rule the businesse of the Land vnder the King. But this notwithstanding, certaine knights of the kings part fortified the Castle of Windsore with victuals and armour. Edward the Kings son came to Bailow, where discord rose betwirt his knights & the townesmen, so that the Townesmen were minded to haue besieged the Castle: which when Edward vnderstood, he sent for Walter Bishop of Winchester that tooke the Barons part, that in his company he might goe to the Court of his Father, promising to perswade his father to peace. Hereupon going forth with the Bishop, till they came to Windsore, hee entred the Castle, to the great mistiking of the Bishop: but Edward shortly returned, and went to meet Simon Earle of Leicester, who with his adherents were comming to besiege Windsore castle. Edward the Kings son met with the said Simon about Kingstone, and offred meanes of peace: but Simon trusting to Bishop Walters counsell, detayned Edward with him, and would not suffer him to depart till the castle was yelded, they that were within, hauing liberty to depart whither they would: and the Strangers that minded to passe the Seas, had safe conducts granted them. Lewlin Prince of Wales confederate with Earle Simon, in the meane time wasted the country of Chester, and the marches of the same, and ouerthrew to the ground the castles of Diffard and Gannoke. After this a Parliament was holden at London, in the which, many that had held with the Earle, went to the Kings part, as Henry of Almaine, Sonne to Richard King of Romans, and other. The Kings part being increased, hee went to Douer, and endeauoured to haue gotten that Castle out of the Earles hands, but he trauailed in vaine.

Lewis King of France, through procuring of Boniface Archbishop of Canterbury (who in politike Sermons at Paris, as well at the Fryers preachers, as minors, declared the doings betwirt the K. of England, and the Earle of Leicester) toke vpon him to make a peace betwixt them: whereupon the K. of England, with his sonne Edward, and diuers other of the English nobilitie, came to Paris about the twenty two of January, but the Earle of Leicester, fearing the French kings displeasure for his Mothers sake, or some other cause not knowne, staied at home in England and proceeded in his businesse: wherfore Roger Mortimer began to destroy the possessions which the Earle of Leicester held, against whom the Prince of Wales went, and besieged the castle of Radnore, and brought it to yeld.

The Schollers go and Burgesses fight one against another.

Edward the Kings sonne, after his returne from Paris, about Lent, take his iourney toward the March, and passing by Oxford, the Burgesses shut vp their gates against him, whereby he was forced to lie at the Kings hall without the Towne till the next morrow and then departed. The Schollers of Oxford being shut within the Towne, brake vp the gate that leadeth toward Beaumont, for which deed the Maior sent some of them to prison: and not long after, while the Schollers were at dinner, the Maior and Commons with banners displayed, thought to haue spoyled the Clarkes ere they had beene aware, but being espyed, the schollers ranne together, and with bowes and other weapons, slew and wounded the Burgesses and Commons, brake vp many houses, spoyling the goods, and set the houses of the Poytriues (William Spicer and Geffrey Hencley) on fire, on the South side of the towne. Moreouer, because the Maior (Nicholas Kingstone) was a Vintener, they brake vp the Vintrie, drawne the wines, and spoyled them, for the which fact the King caused the Clearkes and Schollers to be banished the Vniuersitie.

was taken betwixt the Barons in the towne, and the Kings sonne in the Castle: but shortly after the Barons fled, and the Burgesses submitting themselues, were some of them hanged, the residue cast in prison, grieuously ransomed, and the towne destroyed, from whence the Kings sonne departed, spoyling and wasting the country (contrary to his oath made to the Barons) till he came to Oxford, where he lodged in the house of the Frier preachers, and ioyned his power with the king his father who was lately come thither to make his offering to Saint Frideswide (not fearing the superstitious opinion, that if any king entered that towne, the virgin there would be auenged on him.) The King hauing now with him his brother Richard king of Almaine, his sonne Edward, William de Valence his brother on the mothers side, and Iohn Cumyn of Scotland, with a multitude of Scottishmen, Iohn de Bailliol Lord of Galloway, Robert le Bruse Lord of Anandale, Roger de Clifford, Philip de Marmion, Iohn de Vallibus, Roger de Laborne, Henry Percy, Philip Basset, Roger de Mortimer, with an armie went and besieged Northampton, & the 29th of Aprill breaking the wall, tooke the towne, and in it fifteene knights bearing banners, Simon Mountfort the yonger, William de Ferrers, Peter de Mountfort, Baldwine Wake, Adam de Newmarch, Roger Bartrand, Simon Fitz Simon, Berengario de Wateruile, Hugh Gubion, Thomas Maunsell, Roger Bonteuileyn, Nicholas Wake, Robert de Newenton, Philip de Derby, Grimbald de Pauncefoote: of whom Simon the yonger was sent to Winchester, the residue to other places to be safely kept. Other knights of meaner degree were taken to the number of sixtie, and not a few Esquires: from thence the King went toward Nottingham, wasting with fire and sword the Shyre places of the Barons, and there he gathered his Lords and great men.

Northampton besieged.

Earle Simon went to London, & from thence to Rochester, which Iohn Earle Warren defended, the bridge and first gate whereof when he had won, being informed that the K. was comming towards London, he left the siege and went backe to meet him: but the King turning his way from London tooke the castle of Kenington or Kingston, which was the earle of Glocesters, and then going to Rochester, chased away some that remained at the siege, but slew many moe: from thence he went to Monbzidge, the castle whereof he tooke, and ỳ countesse of Glocester within it: leauing a garrison there, he went to Winchester, where he receiued them of the 5. ports to his peace, and passing further to Lewis, was receiued into the priory, and his sonne into the castle, where whiles he remained, the Barons writ to him Letters, as ye may reade in Mathew Paris, & Nicholas Triuet: but they taking no effect, the Barons in armes approached towards Lewis, minding the Kings people that were gone forth for forrage, whereof the King being warned, hasteth forth to meet them with his Armie diuided into three parts: The first was led by Edw. the Kings sonne, hauing with him William de Valence Earle of Pembzoke, and Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey and Sussex. The second was guided by Richard King of Almaine with his sonne Henry. The third the king himselfe had in gouerning. The Barons army was diuided into foure wards. The first led Henry de Mountfort, with the Earle of Hereford. The second led Gilbert de Clare with Iohn fitz Iohn, and William de Mountchance. The third in which the Londoners were, Nicholas Segraue. The fourth Earle Simon himselfe led with Tho. de Pelueston. Edward the Kings son with his battell beate on his enemies, ỳ made them to giue back, of whom many were drowned.

The Londoners were put to flight, whom whilest the Kings sonne pursued for the space of 4. miles, he made great slaughter, but being separate from the rest of the armie, he weakened his part soze.

In the meane time many of the kings battell were slaine, and the King of Almaine take in a Wind-mill by sir Iohn de Beuis, so was Robert le Bruis, and Iohn Cumyne, which had brought the Scots. King Henry also hauing his horse slaine vnder him, yeelded to the Earle of Glocester, who sent him prisoner to the Priory. Edward returning, is receiued with sharpe battell, and the Earle Warren, William de Valence, Guy de Lusignan, the Kings halfe brethren, Hugh Bigot, with men of armes to the number of 400. harbergeons got then the castle of Pemsey, and when many were slaine on eyther side, the Lord Edward riding about the Towne, found his Father in the Priory.

Three K. of Almaine taken.

King Henry taken.

In the meane time an assault being giuen to the Castle, which was valiantly defended, the Barons withdrew them: whereupon the Lord Edward being greatly incouraged, and hauing gathered his people about him, would haue made a new battell, so that the Barons sued for peace, which by the meanes of the Fryers preachers and Minors, was brought to passe, that on the Friday following, the Lords Edward and Henry, for their fathers, of England and Almaine Kings, deliuered themselues to Earle Simon, vpon hope of quietnesse & peace that might be concluded. On the Saturday the king licenced them that were about him to depart to their houses, and writ vnto them that were in Monbzidge Castle, that they should not molest ỳ Barons, as they returned homewards: but they notwithstanding being in armes, when they heard that the Londoners which were fled from ỳ battell were receiued into Croyden, they hasted thither, and sleeping many of them got great spoyles. From thence they went to Bistlowe, where they remained till Edward the Kings sonne was deliuered. There were slaine in the battell at Lewes, (which was fought on the twelfth of May) about 4500. men. About that time a great part of Westcheape in London was brent by treason.

King Henry kept his Christmas at Woodstocke, and Simon Earle of Leicester kept his Christmas at Kenilworth.

The first of February, the King reuoked his graunt of the new Vniuersitie of Northampton, by reason of great discommoditie thereby ensuing to the Vniuersitie of Oxford, whereof all the Bishops of the Realme had giuen him aduertisement by their writing.

The Earle of Glocester forsaketh the Earle of Leicester.

Betwixt Simon of Leicester, and Gilbert of Glocester strife arose, for that Simon not onely kept the King and other as prisoners, but also to take to himselfe the reuenues of the Kingdome, &c. which should haue beene equally diuided amongst them, so that Gilbert of Glocester departing, ioyned to him in league the noble Knights of the Marches, whom Earle Simon had commanded to auoyd the Realme: but Iohn de Warren Earle of Surrey & Sussex, and William de Valence Earle of Pembzoke, had brought a great power by Sea in the West parts of Wales, and arriuing at Pembzoke, Earle Simon leading the King with him, went to Hereford, where he gathered a great power, to oppresse the said knights: but while the Prelats laboured for peace, Edward ỳ Kings son being in the castle of Hereford, is permitted to exercise himselfe on horsebacke in a meadow without the citie by his keepers, where after he had wearied diuers horses, and mounting on a freshe appointed for that purpose, hee rode quite away, and passing the riuer of Wey, with two Knights and foure Esquires, was followed hard by his keepers: but when they were aduised of the Standarts of Roger Mortimer and Roger Clifford comming to his reliefe, they returned, and he escaped to Wigmore. And this chanced in the Whitsun weeke. Lord Edward being thus escaped, gathered an army, confederateth and submitteth to him the countries of Hereford, Worcester, Salop, and Chester, with the townes, cities, and castles: he also winneth by force the Citty of Glocester, which Earle Simon had lately fortified, the Townesmen fled to the Castle, who 15. dayes after yeelded it, and departed. The Earle of Leicester wonne the castle of Monmouth, and layd it flat with the ground, and entring into the land of the Earle of Glocester called Glamorgan and meeting with the Prince of Wales comming to his ayde, they destroyed all with fire and sword.

Castle of Monmouth raced.

Edward the Kings son hearing that many of Earle Simons partakers were come to the castle of Kenilworth, taking with him ỳ earle of Glocester, he departed from Worcester, and came vpon them at a sodaine, where he take the Earle of Oxford, Sir William Mountchalsie, Sir Adam Newmarch, Sir Walter de Solenie, and other: and Simon the sonne of Earle Simon hardly escaped in the castle. The Earle of Leicester hating the king with him, returned out of South Wales, & on Lammas day came to Kemsey, a place of the Bishop of Worcester, and there tarried the next day: Edward the Kings son returned from Kenilworth to Worcester, whose returne being knowne, earle Simon departing from Kemsey by vnhappie chance stayed in the towne of Euesham, for on the morrow being the second of August, Edward the Kings son departed from Worcester, passing the River more to the towne called Clue, closed vp the passage betwixt Earle Simon and Simon his sonne, who was at Killingworth. In the next morning L. Edward approached neere to Euesham on the one side, and Gilbert Earle of Glocester on the other side, and Roger Mortimer on the two other sides, whereby Earle Simon was so enclosed, that he must either fight or yeld: on Friday therefore the fift day of August, their armies encountred each other in a large field without the towne, where the Earles part had the worst: The Earle was killed in the field, and Henry sonne to Earle Simon, Peter de Mountfort, Hugh Spencer Iustice of England, William de Mandeuile, Ralph Basset, Walter Creping, William de Yorke, Robert de Tregoze, Thomas de Hostile, John de bello-campo, Guydo de Baylolle, Roger de Roulens, with Sir John de Saint John, Sir William de Verence, Sir John de Inde, Sir William Troffell, Sir Gilbert Einefield, and other of meaner sort in great number, especially of Welshmen, for almost none of them escaped

1 parliament at Winchester.

A parliament was holden at Winchester, where all the statutes made at Oxford, were disannulled, and all the goods of them that were against the king, seised. London was in great danger to haue beene destroyed by the King, for displeasure he had conceiued against the citizens, but the citizens wholly submitted both liues and goods vnto him. Eight persons carrying the same submission toward Windsore, met sir Roger Lesborn knight at Colbrooke, who turned them backe againe, and after they had discoursed the whole matter vnto him, he willed them to deliuer to him their submission and he would meete the King in it, which thing they did. After fiue dayes this knight returned to the City, and said the King had receiued their writings, willing them first to take away all the chaines that were in y streetes of the citty, and pull the posts out of the ground that the same were fixed in, and bring both chaines and postes to the Tower of London: then the Maior with fourty citizens should the next day following attend vpon the King at Windsore to confirme their writing, and they should goe and come safe: in witnesse whereof he deliuered them the kings letter and seale, for y space of foure dayes. The next day the Citizens being at Windsor, attended at the gate vntill the K. came from hunting, at which time he would not once looke on them. After the King was entred, they would haue followed, but they were forbiden: shortly after they were called into the Castle, where they were locked vp in a tower with homely entertainment: the next day the king gaue vnto Prince Edward the Maior, and foure Aldermen, there left were committed to seuerall prisons.

King Henry with Queene Elianor his wife, Richard King of Almaine, and Ochobone the Legate, kept his Christmas at Northampton.

King Henry came to Westminster, & there gaue vnto diuers of his houshold seruants about the number of three score housholds and houses within the Citie, so that the owners were compelled to agree & redeeme their houses and goods, or else to auoyd them: then he made Custos of the Citie, Sir Othon Constable of the Tower, who chose Bayliffes to be accountable to him, Iohn Adriar, and Walter Harny. After this the king tooke pledges of y best mens sonnes of the citty, the which were put in the tower of London, and there kept at the costs of their parents. By great labour & suite made at the foresaid persons which were in Windsor Castle, eight onely except, were deliuered, and the king agreed with the Citizens for 20000. markes to be paid, for the leauying of which fine, were taxed as well seruants as houholders, and many refused the liberties of the citty to be quit of the charge.

The Castle of Deuer was yeelded to Edward the kings sonne, into the which her put Guy de Mountfort to be kept.

The Countesse of Leicester, wife to Simon Mountfort, yeelded the castle of Pemsey to K. Henry her brother, who forthwith banished her the realme of England for euer. About Alhalowntide the Queene of England returned from beyond the Seas, with her came the Legate, named Ochobone, who shortly after his comming, in councell holden at Northampton accursed all the Bishops and Priests that had ayded Earle Simon against the K. especially he cursed by name Walter of Worcester, Henry of London, and Stephen of Chechester, and the Bishop of Lincolne. Worcester shortly after deceased, the other three went to Rome, and were assoiled. The Legate also published the Popes bull, for the tenthes of Churches to be payd to the King for three yeere. Sir Simon the younger fled from Kenilworth castle to the disherited knights, who then were in the Ile of Ouholme, where he remained not long, for through messengers with faire promises, and hostages giuen by Edw. the kings sonne, hee forsaking them went to London to the K. and his Nobilitie, but being priuily warned of their guile, he made an escape and got ouer into France.

King Henry banished his brother.

the Tower of London, from whence but lately he had beene deliuered. Henry Hastings and his company comming to Kenilworth, found there Sir Iohn de Emuil, and many other valiant knights. Sir William de la Knowe, and Sir Iohn de la Ware, had well stored the Castle of all things necessary. King Henry hasting thither, began his siege the morrow after Midsommer day, which siege continued till Christmas after, for they within the Castle, not fearing his force which was great, set open their gates, and neuer closed them day nor night, come who so would they came to their roll, so that many a man was slaine on both sides, and many were taken and ransomed. At length the Legate, the Archbishop, and two other Bishops, came to make accord betweene the King and the disherited, and also them of the Castle: but the disherits, nor they of the Castle would grant to the Kings will, wherefore the Legate accursed them, and all that were of their accord: but they of the castle not regarding the Legate nor his cursing, in mockage therof, clothed a priest their surgeon, Philip Porpeis, in a coape of white, and setting him on the Castle wall, as a white Legate against the red, made him to curse the King, the Legate, and all their partakers. Whiles this businesse lasted at Kenilworth, the disherites take the Isle of Ely, and strengthened it in such wise, that they held it long: they robbed Norfolke, Suffolke, and Cambridge-shire, they spoyled the citie of Norwich, and ransomed y rich men at their pleasure. At Barthol-mewtide the K. held a Parliament at Killingworth, wherein by his Barons were chosen 6. persons, which being sworne, chose to them other fiue, these fiue, to make an accord betweene the K. and the disherites: the first fiue were, Walter Gifford Bishop of Bath, Nicholas of Ely, Bishop of Worcester, and Walter bishop of Ereseter, Roger de Sumercote, Robert Walrond, and Alaine de la Souch. Barons: these fiue chose to them Gilbert Earle of Glocester, Humfrey Earle of Hereford, the Bishop of S. Dauids, Sir Iohn Baylol, Sir Philip Basset, and Sir Waren de Basingborne: if these fiue could not agree, the Legate, and Henry forne to Richard King of Almaine should be Umpiers, these met and agreed at last.

The Legate accursed those in Kenilworth castle, and they in the castle accursed him.

The city of Norwich spoiled.

On Saint Markes day, or the 25. day of April, at Carnaruan in Wales was borne the Kings sonne named Edward vpon this occasion: King Edward albeit he had brought all Wales vnder his subiection, & a statute made at Ruthland, in the twelfth yere of his raigne, incorporated and united the same vnto England, yet could he neuer win the good wils of the common people of the Country to accept him for their Prince, vnles he would remaine himselfe in that country among them, neither could he bring them to yeeld obedience to any prince, except he were of their owne nation. For the Welshmen hauing experience of the gouernment of the English officers, and knowing that the King would rule the Countrey by his Deputies, could not abide to haue any Englishman to be their ruler: wherefore oftentimes, vpon the Kings motion they answered, that they were contented to take for their Prince any man whom he would name, so he were a Welshman, and other answer could he neuer get of them by any meanes. Whereupon, hauing secretly sent for the Quéene being then great with childe, caused her to remaine at Carnaruan: and when she was nigh her time of deliuerance the K. being at Ruthland, sent for all the Barons and best men of Wales, to come to him to consult concerning the weale publike of the Country; and when they Edward the first borne at Carnaruan.

Policie of king Edward to win the Welshmen

they were come, he deferred the consultation, vntill he were certified that the Quéene were deliuered of a sonne: Then sending certaine Lords to the chiefetaines, he called the Welshmen together, declaring vnto them, that where as they were oftentimes suters vnto him to appoint them a Prince, he now hauing occasion to depart out of the Country, would name them a Prince, if they would allow and obey him whom he should name. To the which they answered, that they would so doe, if he would appoint one of their Nation. Whereunto the King replied, that he would name one that was borne in Wales, and could speake neuer a word of English, whose life and conuersation no man was able to detect. And when they all had granted, that such a one they would obey, he named his owne sonne Edward borne in Carnaruan Castle, a few daies before. Then the King hauing the Country at his will, gaue Lordships and Townes in the middest of Wales vnto English Lords, as the Lordship of Denbigh to Henry Lac. William Wales which had oft times set Scotland in great trouble, was taken and brought to London with great numbers of men and women wondring vpon him: he was lodged in the house of William Delecé a Citizen of London, in Fanchurch street. On the morrow being the Euen of Saint Bartholomew he was brought on horseback to Westminster, Ioan Segraue and Geffrey, knights, the Maior, Sheriffes and Aldermen of London, and many other both on horse-backe and on foote accompanying him, and in the great Hall at Westminster, he being placed on the South bench crowned with Lawrell, for that he had said in times past, he ought to beare a Crowne in that Hall (as it was commonly reported) and being appeached for a traytor, by Sir Peter Mallore the Kings Iustice, hee answered that he was neuer traytor; to the K. of England, but for other things whereof he was accused, he confessed them, and was after headed and quartered. There was opened to the king a conspiracy, wrought by the Archbishop of Canterbury and diuers Earles and Barons against him at such time as he was in Flanders. The Earle Marshall being examined of this, and being not able to purge himselfe, made the King his heyre, and put him in possession of his Lands to haue his grace, and thus doing, the King gaue him againe 1000. pound land by yeare during his life. Robert Bruse an Englishman, presuming by the right of his wife to vsurpe the Kingdome of Scotland, called a Parliament of the Nobles of Scotland within the Church of the Friers Minors in Dumfries, where he slew Iohn Comin, because he would not agree to his treason: and shortly after, to wit, in the feast of the Annunciation of our Lady, in the Abbey of Scone, he caused himselfe to be solemnely crowned King by the Bishops of Glasco and Saint Andrewes sirst, and the third day after by the Countesse of Bowan, because her brother the Earle of Fife to whom by right of inheritance that office belonged, was then absent in England.

This yere 1306. vpon sundry complaints of the Clergy and Nobility resorting to the City of London, touching the great anoyance, and danger of contagion growing by reason of the stench of burning Sea-coale, which diuers fire makers in Southwarke, Wapping, and Sea coale forbidden to be burned within London or neare London.

Cast Smithfield now vsed to make their common fires because of the cheapnes thereof, ꝫ to forbeare the burning of barnes, and fire coale.

1306. The K. expressly commanded the Maior and Sheriffs of London forthwith to make proclamation, that all those fire makers should cease their burning of Sea coale, and make their fires of such fuell of wood, and coale as had bin formerly vsed. Thus much I found in the Record, the which I thought very necessary to set downe, to shew the difference of former time, with the necessity of that fiering to be now so generally vsed, which at y time was so much misliked and annoyed, not onely of the better sort, but euen of the common people, whereas at this day, viz. in the yeare 1612. and the 10. yeare of the raigne of King James, at which time I wrote this booke, the foresaid Sea coale, and pit coale is become the generall fuell of this Britaine Iland, vsed in the houses of the Nobility, Clergy, and Gentry, in London and in all the other Cities, and Shires of this kingdome, as well for dressing of meat, washing, brewing, dying as otherwise. The greatest ruine and destruction of wood, in this Kingdome, hath beene the late making of Iron, and Glasses, besides the iust occasion of spending timber in building extraordinary Ships as well in number as in bignesse, besides the vnspeakable daily increase in building of houses boats, Barges, Waggons, coaches, carts, and many other things for houshold vses, the which together with the want of conseruation and planting of Woods within these last fourescore yeares, are the true reasons of the great scarcitie of Timber and sweet fuell in England.

In the feast of Pentecost king Edward honored his eldest sonne Edward of Carnaruan with the degree of Knighthood, and with him also moe then a hundred noble young men, at Westminster.

About the feast of the Natiuity of our Lady, the King went againe into Scotland with a great army, hauing sent his son Edward with Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Robert Clifford, Henry Percie, and many other noble knights and Gentlemen, at Whitsuntide before, also he sent before him his iustices Traylebaston of Traile Baston, two and two together, into euery city and place into which he would come giuing them power to kill traytors, draw and hang periured persons, burne such as woorke deceit, destroy the wicked, and set Englishmen in their places: and there were taken by them in the space of two months by inquisition of Iuries, hundreds & thousands, breakers of peace and conspirators, amongst the which Nigellus de Brotherton brother to Robert de Brute was drawne through Berwike and hanged: moreouer [illegible] and John Seyton brother were hanged: y Countesse of Boloan was closed in a Cage, whose breadth, length, height and depth, was eight foote, and hanged ouer the walles of Berwike: the Bishop of Saint Andrewes and of Glasco with the Abbot of Scone, were sent to seuerall prisons in England.

King Edward besieged Simon Frisell in Lisiche, and take him and sent him to London Tower, where he found many Scottish Lords in fetters of yron, amongst whom was Thomas Morham, with Herbert his son, and Thomas Roys his Esquire, who were all beheaded: Simon Frisell was hanged, drawne and quartred: Earle Iohn de Athol because he was of the Kings blood and an Englishman, was not drawne, but hanged and headed: Sir Iohn Wallers was sent to the Tower of London ꝫ after hanged and headed: Laurence de Megos Esquire was taken at Dower and there beheaded. The Earle of Stratherne yeelded to king Edward who condemned him to remaine during his life in yron fetters in the Castle of Rochester.

At this time and long after, King Edward had Scotland in such good obedience, as hee gaue of the lands thereof to his seruants and subiects in England, with Markets, Fayres, and Marcns: amongst others I haue seene vnder the broad seale of the said king Edward a manno⁊ called Kethes in the County of Ferfare in Scotland, and neere the furthest part of the same nation Northward, giuen to Iohn Eure and his heires, ancestor to the Lord Eure that now is, for his seruice done in those parts, with Market euery Sunday, Fayre for three dayes euery yere, at the feast of Saint Michel and free Warren for the same, dated at Lancercost the 20. day of October, Anno reg. 34. Exchequer roll. Lord Eure.

This yere Margaret Queene, second wife to Edward the first, began to build the Quire of the church of the grey Friers in London, to the building whereof in her life she gaue two thousand markes, and an hundred markes by her Testament: Iohn of Bayraine Earle of Richmond builded the body of the church: Lady Mary Countesse of Pembroke, Gilbert Clare earle of Glocester, Margaret Countesse Lady Elianor le Spencer, & Lady Elizabeth de Burgh, sisters to Gilbert de Clare, gaue great sums of mony towards the same: Richard Whitington, sometimes Alderman & Maior of London, founded the Library there, in Anno 1421. King Edward held his Christmas at Carlile, with a great number of English people, and in the moneth of January next following, he called a great Parliament to be holden at Carlile vpon the Octaues of Saint Hillary, to treat of matters concerning the state of Scotland, whereunto were summoned many Lords both of the spirituality and temporalty, who either appeared in person or else by proxie. 1307. In this Parliament many complaints were made of the oppression of Churches and Monasteries, by the Popes Chaplaine named William Testa Archdeacon of Traine in the Church of Couentrie. The same Clarke was forbidden to vse any more such extortions, and diuers Statutes were ordained touching Religious persons which had their principall houses in other Realmes.

There came to this Parliament, sent from the Pope, a Cardinall called Petrus Hispanus, to treate of a marriage betwixt Edward Prince of Wales, and the French Kings daughter.

The course of Fleet dike at London foze decayed, which sometime bare ships of small burthen to Holbourne-bridge, to the great commoditie of the Citie in that West part. T. Walsingh.

And amongst many other suites made there, Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne complained, that whereas in times past, the course of water running at London vnder Holborn-bridge, and Fleet-bridge into the Thames, had borne of such large breath and depth, that tenne or twelue ships at once with Merchandises were wont to come to the foresayd bridge of Fleete, and some of them to Holborne-bridge: now the same course (by filth of the Tanners and such other) was foze decayed. Also by raising vp of Wharffes, but especially by turning of the water, which they of the new Temple made to their milles without Baynards castle, and diuers other perturbations, the sayd Ships now could not enter as they were wont, and as they ought; wherefore he desired, that the Maior of London with the Sheriffes, and certaine discreet Aldermen might be appointed to see the course of the said water, and that by oath of honest men all the foresaid hinderances might be remoued, and to be made as it was wont of old time, &c. Which was answered and recorded, that Roger le Bramzon, the Constable of the Tower, with the Maior and Sheriffes are assigned, that taking with them other honest and discreet men, they make diligent search and inquirie, how the sayd Riuer was in old time, and that they leaue nothing that may hurt or stop it: and to keepe it in the same state that it was wont to be.

King Edward remaining all the winter and summer at Carlile, disposed many things of Scotland at his pleasure: but in the meane time Robert le Bruse going about the Countrey, slew many that would not obey him, and he sent with part of his army two of his brethren, Thomas that was a Knight, and Alexander a Priest. Deane of Glasco into another part of the Countrey, that they might allure the people vnto them by gentle perswasions, which (by the comming of Englishmen vpon them) were taken, led to the Justices, condemned, hanged and headed at Carlile.

Ioane of Acres Countesse of Glocester deceased.

King Edward sent messengers into England commanding all that ought him seruice to be ready at Carlile, within three weekes after the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist: but himselfe being vexed with the bloody flixe, bee sent vnto his sonne that he should come with speed, to heare his last wozdes, whom, among other thinges he did counsell to be mercifull, iust and constant in all his wozds and deeds: hee commanded him not to be too hastie to take vpon him the Crowne of England, vntill he had reuenged the injuries done by the Scots, but rather lay in those parts, and to cause his fathers bones (being closed in a chest) to be borne about with him, till he had gone throw all Scotland and ouerrome his aduersaries. He also commaunded him to honour his Mother, and loue his two Brethren, Thomas Earle Marthall, and Edmond Earle of Kent. Moreouer, he charged him on his curse, that he should not presume to call home Pierce of Gauestон, by common decree banished, without common fauour: He declared to him also, that he had taken on him the Crosse, for the seruice of the Holy land, to the which hee had determined to haue gone in person, but troubled with the new and diuers attempts of Robert le Bruse, he was hindered of his purpose, and was constrained, omitting that businesse, to turne the warre into Scotland, 32000. poumds of siluer (sayd hee) I haue prepared for the charges of an hundred knights to goe honourably thither with their retinues, because it is not my hap to perfoome in proper person what I intended, let them yet take my heart and carry thither; which if they doe, I trust in my God that all things shall prosper with them. Therfoze (saith he) doe straightly commaund thee in paine of my curse, that am thy Father, that the sayd money be not otherwise spent.

The King also called vnto him Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne, Guy Earle of Warwick, Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, and Robert Clifford Baron, desiring them to be good to his Sonne, and that they should not suffer Pierce of Gauestон to come againe into England, to set his son in ryot; and the seuenth of July he departed his life at Burgh vpon the sands, in the yeare 1307. when he had raigned 34. yeares 7. moneths, and odde dayes, and was 68. yeares of age, he was buried at Westminster. W. Packingt.

He had issue by his first wife Elianor, daughter to the King of Spaine, fiue sonnes, to wit Henry, Iohn, and Alionse that dyed without issue, Edward that succeeded him in the Kingdome, and Henry that dyed without issue, and tenne daughters, to wit, Elianor Countesse of Barre, Ioane of Acres Countesse of Glocester, Iulian that dyed young, Margaret Dutchesse of Brabant, Alice that dyed young, Elizabeth Countesse of Hereford, Elizabeth Countesse of Holland, Mary that was a Nun at Ambresbury, Beatrice that dyed young, Blanch that dyed young; He had issue by Margaret daughter to Philip King of France his second wife, two Sonnes, to wit, Thomas of Brotherton, and Edmond of Woodstocke Earle of Kent, and one Daughter, named Elianor that dyed young.

THE

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King EDVVARD of CARNARVAN.

Ex. Reg. Ia.

EDVVARD the second, son to the first Edward, borne at Carnaruan, began his raigne the seuenth day of July, in the yeare of Christ 1307. he was faire of body, but vnstedfast of manners, and disposed to lightnesse, haunting the company of vile persons; and giuen onely to the pleasure of the body, not regarding to gouerne his common weale by discretion and justice, which caused great variance betweene him and his Lords. He tooke to be of his Councell Patricke Earle of Lincolne, and Ochode Gransone with other. He ordained Walter Reignald to be his Chancellour, and caused Walter Langton Bysshop of Chester, Treasurer of England, to bring the Kings his Fathers body from Carlile to Waltham Crolle, and then to be arrested by Sir Iohn Felton Constable of the tower, and sent to Wallingford, there to be shut vp in prison, and his goods confiscate, because in his fathers lifetime he had reproued him of his insolent life, &c. Hee also called out of exile Pierce of Gauestон a Granger borne, which lately in his fathers dayes, had for certaine causes beene banished this land. He gaue to the said Pierce the Earledome of Cornwall, the Ile of Man, and the Lordship of Wallingford, otherwise assigned to Queene Isabell.

After the Epiphany of our Lord, all the templers in England were apprehended and committed to prison in diuers places.

The king went ouer into France, and married Isabel the daughter of Philip the faire king of France, at Boloigne, the 22. of January. There were present at that marriage Philip king of France, his son King of Nauarre, the King of Almaine, and the King of Sicile, with many other. And on the 24. day of February King Edward with his Queene were crowned at Westminster, by Henry Bysshop of Winchester, being admitted so to do by Robert Archbishop of Canterburie. The King offred first a pound of gold made like a King holding a ring in his hand, and after he offered a mark of gold which is 8. ounces, made like a pilgrime putting forth his hand to receiue the ring. Sir Iohn Blackwell knight, was drawn to death at his Coronation.

King Edward ordained.

The king gaue vnto Pierce of Gauestон all such gifts and iewels as had bin giuen to him, with the crownes of his Father, his ancestors treasure and many other things, affirming that if he could, he should succeed him in the kingdome, calling him brother, not granting any thing without his consent. The Lords therefore enuying him, told the king, that the father of this Pierce was a Traytor to the King of France, and was for the same executed, & that his mother was burned for a witch, and that the said Pierce was banished for consenting to his mothers witchcraft, and that he had now bewitched the King himselfe. They besought the king to heare therefore their petitions, which should be both for his owne honor, and for the wealth of his people.

Chron. Dun. Pierce of Gauestон called vnto the King at his pleasure

First, that he would confirme and vse such ancient Lawes and customes, as are contained in the Charters of the kings his predecessors: and for that they would grant him the twentieth part of their goods, and be his true subjects. 1

Secondly, that hee would take nothing of any man, but at the price of the owner, & same to be paid for to the vttermost. 2

Thirdly, that whatsoeuer was alienated from the crowne since his fathers death, might be restored thereunto againe. 3

Fourthly, that he would obserue the oath he made before his Father, as of the reuoking of Peirce Gauestон, the prosecuting of the Scottish warre, and that all that was amisse should be amended, lest his enemies reioyce at it, &c. 4

That Iustice and Iudgement might bee done in the Land, as well to the rich as to the poore, according to the antient and old approued Lawes and Customes of England, and that no man should be restrained by the kings Writ, from prosecuting his right, or defending himselfe by law. 5

Then the King taking counsell of Pierce, Hugh Spencer the Treasurer, the Chancellor, and others, he appointed to answere the Barons at the Parliament on Hoctay. The Barons being departed out of London, the Citty gates were shut vp and chained, great watch kept, and Hugh Spencer made Constable of London. The King with Pierce of Gauestон went towards Wallingford castle with a great company of Soldiers, as well Strangers as English, and Hugh Spencer tarried still at London. The Parliament on Hoctay was kept, the King and Barons being there when they decreed that the same Pierce should be banished the land to depart on the morrow after Midsummer

Hugh Spencer Constable of London.

Midsommer day neuer to returne again. The king gaue him two and thirty Mewnes, and so many Castles in Gascoigne, and great sums of money out of the Earledome of Cornwall during his life. The king accompanied him to Bullow, sent him into Ireland, assigning him the whole gouernment and reuenues of that country.

The manner of the puppefition of the Knights templers in England and Ireland: and the confirmation of the new order of Knighthood.

It is ordayned by the king and his counsell that vpon wednesday next after the Epiphany all the brethren of the order of Knights Templers in euery Shire of England should by the Sherifs of ỹ same countries be attached by their bodies, and that all their lands, tenements, & goods, as well Ecclesiasticall as Temporall should be seised and taken into ỹ kings hands, with all their charters, and writings to them belonging, and their persons to keepe in safe custody, although not in vile and hard prison, vntill the king shall otherwise ordaine, which ordinance the king caused to bee executed in this manner: first of all he directed Writs to all the Sheriffes of the seuerall Counties in England, that they should warne a certaine number of free-holders in their seuerall Counties, viz. ten or twelue in euery Shire to bee at a certaine place within the said County vpon paine of forfaiture of all they had which they might forfeit to the king, and that the Sheriffe, in proper person, should be there present in the same place, vpō penalty of the same forfaiture: viz. vpon Sunday, after the said feast of the Epiphany, pretending some matter touching the Kings peace, and whatsoeuer else the Sheriffe should find contained in the said writ: and after that the king sent two or three Clarkes together with the said writs containing the former decree, to take an oath of the said Sheriffs before they should breake open the said writs, and whatsoeuer they should find contained in the said Writs they should not make knowne vnto any, vntill the execution of the said writs were to be performed: and also to take the like oath of those 10.0312. persons before mentioned, viz. that they should not discouer the premisses, vntill the time of execution, and then to doe it sodainly, and the K. also commanded, that the like execution bee fully done in Ireland, so as all the brothers which should happen, to be found in Ireland, should be attached by their bodies in one day, by the Iustices of Ireland and by the treasurer of the Exchequer at Dublin, and that all their lands and tenements, should be taken and seased into the kings hands, the execution thereof was done, in manner and forme as it was done in England: these writs beare date at Bitart, the 20. of December 1307. being the first yeare of king Edward the second.

An. regni 2.

And in the 17. yeare of this Edward the 2. it was ordained, by the king and the Parliament of England, that the knights of the order of Saint Iohn of Jerusalem, lately called the knights of Rodes, should haue all the lands of the late Templers, in such sort as the Templers had them, read the records.

In the feast of Saint Michael, Gilbert de Clare Earle of Glocester tooke to him to wife Maud, daughter to Richard Brugh Earle of Vlster, at Waltham: the same day Iohn de Brugh, sonne to Earle Richard was made knight by the king, and tooke to wife Elizabeth sister to the said Earle Gilbert, in the same place.

1309. K. Edward kept his Christmas at Windsore with great solemnity.

The king sent William Lord Latimer with an hundred horsemen, to fetch Henry Lacy Earle of Lincolne; but he being forewarned, kept himselfe in his Castle, and so preuented their purpose, onely the Lord Latimer and his talked, and so departed.

The king intended to giue Gascoigne to the French king, Scotland to Robert Bruse, Ireland and Wales to others, hoping thereby to haue ayd against his Barons.

King Edward against his Barons.

Robert Archbishop of Canterbury returned from Rome, and was restored to all his goods.

The king sent for Pierce of Gauelston out of Ireland: he landed at Carnaruan, on ỹ Euen of Saint Iohn Baptist, the king met him at the Castle of Flint with great ioy: and gaue to him the Earle of Glocesters sister in marage, they were maried at Barkhamsted, which caused him againe to rise in pride, scorning the Nobles of the Realme, and to abuse the king, as before he had done, in conueying the treasure of the realme into forraine countries, amongst the which treasure, he conueied the table and trestles of gold from the treasure of Westminster, and deliuered them to one Armery of Frisconband to be conueied into Gascoigne. The Barons therefore declared to the king, that except he would expell ỹ said Pierce from his company, they would rise against him as against a pertined Prince: whereupon by ỹ aduise of Pierce of Gauelton, the king sent for ayn into Gascoigne, to the Earle of Fois, and the Vicount of Henoy, and they came with 3. hundred horsemen through France, but Philip the French king imprisoned the chiefe, and slew and hanged the other. Also, the King of England had word from Robert Bruse of Scotland, and from Robert fitz Thomas of Ireland, that they would not take part with the King against his Barons, whereupon the King being wroth, fortified Windsore castle, and began to build Towers and other strange things.

The Abbot of Saint Denis in France, being sent Legate from the Pope to demand the Legacy that king Edwards father gaue to the holy land, did earnestly request king Edward to remoue from him Pierce Gauelton, with whose conuersation all the world was as it were infected. The ỹ king appointed a Parliament at Northampton, determining from thence to passe into Scotland: the Barons came to this Parliament well furnished, but the King sent word he would not come there, yet at the last he came to Stone Stratford, whither were sent to him by the Barons, the Earles of Warwik and Clare, who requested him to come for his own profit & the cōmodity of of the realme: at length he went in the habit of a squire, and the Barons met him without armor, and in the end they louingly embraced and were made friends, and the voyage to Scotland was rejourned till another time. After Michaelmas the Parliament was holden at London vnto the which Parliament came Lewes the French kings brother, with the Bishop of Poytow from the king of France, to intreat vnity between the king & his Lords: and there were diuers good ordinances made. And once againe though sore against the Kings mind, he caused Pierce to abiure, vpō condition added by the Barons, that if he were found again in any land subiect to the kings dominion, he should be taken as a common enemy, & condemned. Thus being done, he passed into Flanders, and from thence to other countries, seeking rest which he could not find.

Pierce of Gaueston abiured the land.

1310. The king kept his Christmas at Windsor, where Walter Langton Bishop of Chester, and the Bishop of Saint Andrewes in Scotland were released out of prison.

Annal. 4. Tempest at Middleton.

The second day of September at night, an horrible Tempest of Thunder hapned, so that hedges and trees lost their greennesse, & the Church of Middleton in Dorsetshire, with the Steeple, Bels, Ornaments, and all other monuments of that place, were consumed with the lightning, the Monks being at Mattens.

Henry Earle of Lincolne, Constable of Chester, and Custos of England, died at London, in his house called Lincolnes Inne, in Holborne: he was buried in the new Wirke (whereof he was founder) of Saint Pauls. Church, betwixt our Ladies Chappell, and S. Dunstans Chappell, where a faire monument of stone was raised for him, with his Picture in armour crosse legged, as a Templar bowed for the defence of the holy Land, and Citty of Jerusalem.

R. Rouse, Templers condemned, Tho. Dele.

A Prouincial Councell was holden at London against the Templers in England, vpon heresie and other articles, whereof they were accused, who denied the fact, saying one or two of them: notwithstanding all did confesse, that they could not purge themselues, & therefore were condemned to perpetuall penance in seuerall monasteries, where they behaued themselues very well.

Pierce of Gaueston returned into England.

At Paris in France, 54. of the Templers were brent, by the iudgement of Philip the French king.

Pierce of Gauelton conceiuing an affiance in the fauour of king Edward, & of the young earle of Glocester, whose sister he had maried, taking with him many strangers, returned into England, & a little before Christmas came to the Kings presence, whom the king, forgetting all oathes and promised pacts, receiued as a heauenly guift.

1311. K. Edward kept his Christmas at Yorke, where Pierce of Gauelton was present with his Outlandish men, the king rejoycing, and being in a great iolity because he had receiued him in safety, all the Court and Queene being sorrowfull, because they saw the king not very found. The mighty men of the land therefore sought how they might set an end to the trouble at hand, for they feared to raise warre, and durst not disquiet the king, yet the peril being weyed, they found that so long as Pierce liued, there could be no peace in the Kingdome nor the king to abound in treasure, nor the Queene to enioy the kings true loue. Thus after they had long considered the perils past, present, & to come, they determined rather to try all extremities, then to be despised and set at naught by a Stranger: they chose a Captaine then for their busines to come, Thomas of Lancaster, noble in lineage, valiant in armes, excellent in fame for his manners and iustice, he was son to Edmond Earle of Lancaster, and therefore by inheritance earle of Lancaster, Leicester, & Ferrers. In proces of time he married the only daughter of the Earle of Lincolne, to wit, Henry Lacyes daughter, wherevpon after the Earles decease, of a great man he was made a greater, for he was earle of Lincolne, and of Salisbury, besides the liberties of Pickering, and the honor of Cockermore, and other great lands in Wales, and the earledome of Artoys in France.

Anthony Beke Patriarch of Jerusalem, and Bishop of Durham, deceased at Eltham, on the 28. of March: after he had sate Bishop 28. yeares, and was buried at Durham. He encalculated the ancient manno; place belonging to the Bishops of Durhā at Aukland, he made there the great hall, wherein be diuers pillers of blacke marble, speckled with white, and the great chamber with other buildings there, he also made the exceeding goodly Chappell at Aukland of well squared stone, & founded there a Colledge with a Deane and prebends, and a quadrant in the Southwest side of the Castle, for Ministers of his Colledge: he builded or repaired castle Barnard, Gainsforth and Cunclife: he also builded Somerton Castle in Yorkeshire, which castle he gaue to the K. and the manno; of Eltham in Kent, which he gaue to the Queen. The king shortly after gaue the Castle of Somerton to Henry Beaumont. The castle of Alnwike which William de Veley had giuen vnto him by the said Bishop, trusting in him, that he would preserue it to the vse of the bishops yong bastard, and deliuer it to him, when he came to mans estate, he tooke money therefore, and sold it to Henry Percy; he had the Isle of Man during his life by the Kings grant: Kellow was elect Bishop of Durham.

King Edward with Pierce Gauestō his cōpanion went to Yorke, where the King was lodged in the pallace of the Archbishop, and Pierce in the Castle: they caused the City to be fortified, and the walles to bee repaired, and sent to Robert Bailliol of Scotland for aide against his Lords, but Robert made answer he would not forth of Scotland, neither would he disquiet any man: the like answere was made by the Welchmen. The earles assisted at Bedford, Gilbert the younger Earle of Glocester being one of them, was made Custos of Lib. Roffensis. Gaveston taken. Gaveston Pierce of Gaveston taken.

After Easter Barram nephew to Pierce Gaveston was taken in Cornewall with great treasure which he had conveyed out of ỹ kings Treasurie: his ship being tossed with tempest on the Sea, was driven where it was taken, & the treasure was brought to London in Carts.

About this time king Edward for his recreation took the sea, leaving Pierce of Gaueston at Yorke, whereupon the Barons brought their power, and therewithall entered the Citty of Yorke, but Pierce fled to Scarborough: then the Barons besieged Scarborough, where they tooke him, and committed him to the custody of Aymer de Valence earle of Pembroke, who brought him to the mannor of Deddington which is betwixt Oxford and Warwike, and there left him to be kept safe, but the next day in the morning Guy earle of Warwike with a company of armed men tooke him from thence, & brought him to Warwike castle: after deliberation taken the earles of Lancaster, of Warwike and of Hereford, caused in their presence in a place then called Blacklow, since Gaversheath, the 19. of June, his head to bee stricken off: his body by the Frier preachers was conveyed to Oxford and there kept more then two yeares, till the king caused the same to be translated to his mannor of Langley and there in the Fryers church (which he had builded) to be buried.

K. Edward kept his Christmas at Windsor. The Knights of the order of Saint Iohn Baptist, called Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, put the Turkes out of the Isle of Rhodes, and after that won vpon the said Turkes daily for a long time after. This religion was greatly preferred by the fall of the Templers, whose possession was given to them by a councell holden at Vienna.

Thola More. Hugh Spencer the younger.

Robert de Bruse got againe almost all Scotland, the Castles with munitions (the English Garrisons being cast out) he tooke againe into his power. This yeere therefore by consent of the Prelates, and certaine Nobles, Hugh Spencer the sonne was appointed the Kings Chamberlain in place of Pierce of Gaueston, whom they the rather preferred, because they knew the King hated him: neuertheless not long after, by his great diligence, he brought himselfe into the Kings fauour. The father of this Hugh being olde, was yet living, a Knight of great vertue, in counsell wise, in armes valiant, whose confusion and shamefull end he won vnto himselfe by naturall lone though disordinate towards his son, who was in body very comely, in spirit proud, and in action most wicked, whose couetousnes and ambition, by the disheriting of Widowes and Strangers, brought the death of the Nobles, the fall of the King, with the vtter destruction of himselfe and his father.

1313. King Edward kept his Christmas at London.

King Edward gathering a great power, marched towards Scotland, to breake the siege of Striueling Castle, and lodged himselfe and his people thereabout in the field on the Euen of S. Iohn Baptist: neuer afore that time was seen the like preparation, pride and cost in the time of warre, as affirmeth Robert Patton, a Carmelite Frier, being present, and taken of the Scots, which he sorrowfully bewailed in his Heroicall Verse whiles he was prisoner. The first night (saith he) ye might haue seene the Englishmen bathing themselues in wine, and casting their gorges: there was crying, howling, wallaling, and drinking, with other rioting far aboue measure. On the other side, ye might haue seene the Scots, quiet, still, and close, fasting the Euen of Saint Iohn Baptist, labouring in loue of the liberty of their Country. On the morrow, the Scots hauing gotten the most conuenient place in the field for victory, made ditches in the ground three foote deepe, and the like in breadth, from the right wing of the Armie, vnto the left, covering the same with weake twigs or Yerdles, and againe ouer with the Turfe and grasse, which was not of strength to beare horsemen. The army of the Scots being diuided into certaine troupes, stood not far off from this dike, which was betwixt them & the Englishmen. On the other side, the army of the Englishmen comming out of the West, the Sunne rising, casting his beames on their golden Targets, bright helmets, and other armour, gaue such a reflection, as was both wonderfull and terrible to behold. In the first ward were the light horsemen and heauy coursers. In the second, were the Archers and other footemen, who were appointed for the chase of the aduersaries. In the third was the King with his Bishops, and other Religious, amongst whom was Hugh Spencer. The horsemen of ỹ first front making vpon their enemies, foundered with their forefeet into the ditch, & there tumbling, abiding the cruelty of the Scottes, who comming vpon them, slew some, and tooke a great many rich men for ransome. There was slaine Gilbert de Clare Earle of Gloucester, (whom the Scottes would gladly haue kept for ransome, if they had knowne him, but he had forgotten to put on his coat of armes:) with him was slaine sir Edmond Manly, sir Robert Clifford, sir Paine Tipcoft, sir William Marshall, sir Giles Dargenton, and many other Knights, and Esquires.

Tabula More. Robert Bruse. Gilbert Earle of Gloucester, and other Gentlemen slaine in Scotland.

There was taken Humfrey de Bohun earle of Hereford, Iohn Segraue, Iohn Clauering-ham, William Latimer, sir Roger Northbrooke, bearer of the Kings shield or Seale: but sir Ralfe Mountchermer that had married Ioane of Acres Countesse of Gloucester, the Kings sister, being taken, found such fauour that his ransome was pardoned, and he returning into England, brought backe with him the Kings shield or Seale: but sir Edmond Manly the Kings steward drowned himselfe in Banockesborne.

Almost

Almost three hundred men at armes were slaine in that place, our Archers killing many of them, who seeing the Scottes cruelly bent vpon our Horsemen fallen into the Ditch, shot their Arrowes with a high compas, that they might fall betwixt the armour of their Enemies, which was all in vaine: and when they shot right forth, they slew some of the Scots, by reason of their armed breasts, but many of the Englishmen, by reason of their naked backes.

The King with the Bishoppes, and Hugh Spencer betooke themselues to flight; in which danger of flying, the King vowed to GOD, that hee would build vnto the poore Carmelite Friers an house, in the which hee would place twentie foure brethren, to the Students in Diuinitie, which he afterward performed in Oxford.

White Friers in Oxford.

Robert de Bruse caused his prisoners to be ciuilly intreated, and honorably kept, he sent the bodyes of the earle of Glocester, and of the Baron of Clifford to the King of England remaining then at Wetwike, to be buried at his pleasure, demanding no reward for restoring of them. The earle of Glocester was buryed at Tewkesburie, his inheritance was diuided betwixt 3. sisters of the sayde Earle; the first whereof Hugh Spencer had to wife, the second Hugh Audley (whom Pierce Gaueston before had maried) the third Roger de Tamary (whom before Iohn de Bon had and heire, to the heyre of Vlster in Ireland had married) and so the inheritance of that Noble Earledome was deuided into three Baronies.

The King calling to him the Archbishop of Canterburie, 4. other Bishops and manie Abbots and ecclesiasticall persons, hee caused the body of Pierce of Gaueston to be translated and honorably buried at Langley, but yet there were not many of the Nobles at his buryal.

This yeere 1314. Margaret Countesse of Holland was brought to bed of three hundred thirtie foure and three children, all beyng alme of the biggenesse of new hatched Chickens, they were all baptized & then died: this Countesse was proud and scornefull by nature, shee daily mocked such women as had more then one child at a birth, saying, who so brought forth more then one childe at one birth, the rest had seuerall Fathers. And vpon a time a poore woman that had foure children at a burthen humbly prayed her charity, vnto whom she answered, goe get thee hence thou harlot, thou shalt neuer make me beleeue, but those thy brattes had foure Fathers, thou inhabitate frumpet: whereat the poore woman being sore vexed, kneeled downe and with feruent agony of spirit, prayed God that she might bring forth as many at one burthen for her euerlasting shame, as many children as there be dayes in the yeare: of this you may reade more in Guy de Bardon, and many other authentike authors, & also to this day there remaines a memorable monument of her in Holland.

A Countesse brought to bed of 365. children. They were baptized by a Bishop. Pope to the reformation of shamefull abhominable fruition.

The morrow after Candlemas day there assembled a Parliament at London, to treate of the state of the Kingdome, and how to bring downe the prices of victuals, that were now growne to be so deare, that the common people were not able to liue. It was therefore ordained, and the Kings Writs were published for prices of victuals, that no Ore stalled ox corne-fed, be sold for more then foure and twenty shillings: no grasse fed Ore for more then fiftene shillings: a fat stalled Cow at twelue shillings: another Cow at ten shillings: a fat Mutton corne-fed, or whose wooll is well growne, at twenty pence: another fat Mutton thorne, at fourteene pence: a fat Hegge of two yeares old, at three shillings 4. pence: a fat Goose, at two pence halfepenny, in the Citie at three pence; a fat Capon at two pence, in the Citie two pence halfe peny: a fat Hen at one peny, and in the City three halfe pence: two Chickens a peny, in the City three halfe pence: foure Pigeons for one peny, in the City three for foure Pigeons for a peny; foure and twenty egges a peny, in the Citie twenty egges a peny, &c. The ſame yeare the King tooke of euery towne in England, a man to ſerue in his wars of Scotland, and foure markes of money towards his charges, hauing no reſpect to the greatnes or littleness of any towne, which ſeemed to be vndiſcreetly done.

There arriued in England by the Kings requeſt Gauſtelinus and Lucas de Fliſco, two Cardinals, to make peace betweene the realmes of England and Scotland, and to reconcile vnto the King Thomas Earle of Lancaſter. They brought Bulls from the Pope to excommunicate the Scottes except they returned vnto peace with the King of England. Theſe Cardinals went into the North parts, to eſtall Lodowick Beomond, to whom the Pope (at the Kings inſtance) had giuen the Biſhopricke of Durham: and when they came neere vnto the Towne of Derington, certaine robbers breaking out of a valley, Gilbert Middleton and Walter Selby being their Captaines, ſodainely ſet vpon the familie of the Cardinals and of Lodowick, on Wigelſeden Mooze, robbed them of their treaſure, and carried Lodowicke Biſhop of Durham to Mooreth, where they conſtrained him to pay a great ranſome: They brought Henry Beomond his brother to the caſtle of Kintford, and there kept him till he had payed a great ranſome: but the Cardinals came to Durham, where they tarried a few dayes for anſwere of the Scots, and ſo vnder the Kings conduct they returned to Mooke, and left their buſineſſe which they came for vndone. Gilbert Middleton after many damages done to the Priorie of Tinmouth and other, was taken in his owne caſtle of Pitford, by William Felton. Thomas Hetton, and Robert Horneclife, carried to London, and there in the preſence of the Cardinals drawne and hanged.

1320. King Edward kept his Christmas at Westminster with great honour and glory.

The Earle of Hereford bought of Sir Will. Bruse knight, a portion of land in the Marches of Wales called Gowers.

Roger Mortimer the vncle, and Roger the Nephew, not knowing of the foresaid bargaine, had also bought the said ground of the said William Bruse. Also the Lord Mowbray who had married the Daughter and heire of the said William claimed it by inheritance of his Wife. Last of all, Hugh Spencer the younger had bought that land, and put them all out, wherethrough the foresaid Nobles were sore moued, and chiefly Earle of Hereford complained to Thomas Earle of Lancaster, which two Earles allured almost all the other Earles and Barons to take their part. Thomas Earle of Lancaster being their Captaine, they came to Sherborne, and from thence with Banners displayed to Saint Albanes: from thence they sent to the King being at London, requiring him to banish the two Hugh Spencers, which were condemned by the communalty in many articles: which when the King would not grant, the Barons came to London, where at length the King granted their petition, so that Hugh Spencer the elder was banished, but the younger Hugh fell to spoyling on the Sea, taking out of two Dromidos about Sandwich, goods to the value of 40000. pounds.

About the feaſt of the Purification of our Lady, Andrew de Harkley late made Earle of Carlile, vnder colour of peace, fayned that he would marry Robert Bruſe his ſiſter. Whereupon the King reputing him a Traytor, cauſed him to be taken by his truſty friend Sir Anthony de Lucie, who ſent him in yrons ſtraight to London, where he was iudged before Sir Anthony de Lucie, in this manner. He was led to the Barre as an Earle worthily apparelled, with his Sword girt about him, hoſed, booted, and ſpurred, &c. Vnto whom Sir Anthony ſpake in this manner. Sir Andrew (quoth he) the King, for thy valiant ſeruice hath done thee great honour, and made thee Earle of Carlile, ſince which time, thou, as a traytour to thy Lord and King, ledeſt his people that ſhould haue holpe him at the battell of Beighland, away by the Country of Copland, and thoughe the Earledome of Lancaſter, by which meanes, our Lord the King was diſcomfited there of the Scottes, thoughe thy treaſon and falſeneſſe, whereas if thou hadeſt come betimes, hee had had the victorie: and this treaſon thou committeſt, for the great ſumme of gold and ſiluer that thou receiueſt of James Dowglaſſe, a Scot, the Kings enemy. Our Lord the King will therefore, that the order of Knighthood, by the which thou receiueſt all thine honour and worthip vpon thy body, be brought to nought, and thy ſtate vndone, that other knights of lower degree, may after thee beware, and take example truely to ſerue. Earle of Carlile degraded.

Then commanded he to hew his Spurres from his heeles, then to breake his ſword ouer his head which the K. had giuen him, to keepe and defend his land therewith, when he made him Earle. After this, he let vncleath him of his furred Tabard, and of his Hood, of his Coat of armes, and alſo of his Cirkle: and when this was done, ſir Anthony ſayd vnto him, Andrew (queth hee) now art thou no knight but a knaue, and for thy treaſon, the King will that thou ſhalt bee hanged and drawne, and thine head ſmitten off from thy body, thy bowels taken out of thy body and burned before thee, and thy body quartered; and thy head being ſmitten off, afterward to bee ſet vpon London bridge, and thy foure quarters ſhall be ſent vnto foure good townes of England, that all other may beware by thee. And as Anthony Lucie had ſayd, ſo was it performed and done in all things, on the laſt day of October. Anarg. 2?

In the moneth of May, the Maior and communalitie of Cambridge, roſe in great multitude againſt the Scholliers: In which tumult diuers Scholliers were maymed, and ſome ſlaine, and the Charters of their Priuiledges torne and thꝛowne into the mire in miſerable ſort: whereupon the King ſent thither Maſter Henry Spigernell, Maſter Robert de Malberthorpe, and others, with commiſſion to punniſh the offence.

The 2. day of Auguſt, the two Mortimers were adiudged to bee drawne and hanged at Weſtminſter, for diuers robberies and murthers which the King layd againſt them, but no execution of that iudgement was done, by reaſon of a writ that the King ſent to Sir Richard de Swardſtone then Conſtable of ſ Tower, to ſtay the iudgement, and the K. granted them their liues, to be in perpetuall priſon. The two Mortimers condemned to priſon.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Yorke with great glory.

The 30. day of April Aymer de Valence Earle of Pembroke, Hugh Spencer the younger Robert Baldocke Archdeacon of Lincolne, sir William Hart knight, William de Ayremin Chancellor, Goffride de Scroop, were for King Edwards England sent vnto Newcastle vpon Line, where they met with William Bishop of St. Andrewes, Thomas Randall Earle of Murray, Ioan de Mowbray, Robert de Lundey, y father, knights, and maister Walter de Troyne Clearke, for the King of Scotter, there to talke of a finall peace: but when that would not be, they fell to a truce, which they agreed vpon for thirteene yeares, which was proclaimed about the eleuenth of June, dated at Thorpe neare vnto Pomfret.

Peace with Scotland.

This yere Philip King of France, died, and his brother Charles succeeded him.

About the beginning of August, K. Edward being at Pocklington, there came Ambassadors from the new French King, the Lord Beaumont and sir Anselme de Florence, to cite the King to come to doe homage for Gyen, Aquitaine, and other lands (which) he held of him: and though Hugh Spencer the sonne, Lord Chamberlaine, and Robert Baldocke Lord Chancellour, had procured the said Ambassadors, not to declare their message vnto the King, yet when they should depart, they did it, admonishing him to come.

And the said sir Andrew de Florentia being a Notarie, made a publike instrument of the said citation and admonition.

Reginald de Asser Bishop of Winchester, deceased, and Iohn de Stratford succeeded in that Bishoprick.

The French King made a processe against the King of England. And Charles de Valois vncle to King Charles of France a mortall enemy to Englishmen, did raise on the Lake-dome of Angolesme, the county of Poyctiers to the vse of his nephew the King.

At the time in going forward to the towne of Vyall, he to whom it well belonged by Edmond of Woodstock Earle of Kent, before whom a fine truce being taken, to continue vntill such time as it should be determined between both the Kings as concerning peace, and the towne being yeelded vp, both y armies departed home.

1324. King Edward kept his Christmas at Nottingham castle with great magnificence, glory and ioy of people.

The next Lenten a Parliament holden at London, Adam Tarleton Bishoppe of Hereford was accused of treason, but by the Archbishoppes of Canterbury, Yorke, and Dublaine, and their suffragan Bishoppes, he was taken from the barre and had away: notwithstanding inquisition being made by lawfull men of that Countrey, they found that he had ayded the Mortimers with horse and armour against the King, whereupon all his temporalties were seized into the Kings hands.

Hen. Blanford, Parliaments, London.

In this Parliament the King granted a petition of the Prelates, that all the bodies of the Nobilemen that were hanged on gallowes, should be taken downe, and buried in Ecclesiasticall sepulture.

The King also asked a subsidie of the clearge and people, for the redeeming of Iohn Brytaine Earle of Richmond.

Adam Tarleton Bishoppe of Hereford, being depriued of all his temporall goods, did hate the Spencers deadly, so did Henr. Burwash of Lincolne (whose temporalities by the space of two yeres had beene detained in the Kings hands) of whom and of other were made these verses.

In this Parliament, the lands, Lordships, and possessions of the Templers were giuen to the Hospitallers of Saint Iohn of Ierusalem, though the whole realme, to be by them possessed for euer, for the defence of Christendome against the Infidels.

Mortimer. Mortimer his imprisonment both out of the Tower.

In Lammas day, Roger Mortimer of Wigmore, by making a solemne banquet to sir Stephen Segraue constable of the Tower of London, and the other officers, and giuing to his keepers a dope-drinke, escaped out of the Tower, breaking through the wall, and comming into the kitchin were adorning to the Kings lodgings, and getting out of the coppe thereof, came vnto a warde of the Tower, and so with the cords knit ladder-wise prepared afore hand by a friend of his, got to another warde, and so with great feare got to the Thamis, and with his helper and 2. more of his counsell passed the ruer, and auoiding the high wayes came to the Sea, and there finding a ship at Pocheseller, he passed ouer into Fr. nce to the king there, where he tarried long, hoping when he might be reconciled to the K. of England: his vncle Roger being still kept in filthy prison, the space almost of fiue yeres very vnmercifully, at length he dyed, and was buryed at Bathlowe: for the escape of the younger Mortimer, the King being sore offended, put sir Stephen Segraue out of his constableship of the tower. About the feast of S. Martine where the Burgesses of London and of other townes attached by a clarke named Thomas Nebiggin g. who purchased a commission of the King, and by force thereof accused many, obiecting against them, that they hadde conference with sir Roger Mortimer, maintaining and sustaining him, on the other side the Sea, and that they aided and counselled him to escape out of the Tower, of which indisements indisements the good people did purge themselues, by all the course of law, before the Kings Iustices, whereby that Clearke was counted a wicked man, and imprisoned as a false traytor. The K. & Q. sent Ambassadors 1325. to the French King, the Bishoppes of Winchester and of Norwich, with Iohn of Brytaine Earle of Richmond, to take order for the Dukedome of Aquitaine, who after long debatings take a certaine forme of peace with the King.

King Edward kept his feast of Christmas at Nottingham very nobly and roiall. After that the truce had bin confirmed at Pocklington betwixt the Englishmen and the Scots, by the graue and wise persons of both the realmes.

The Queene sent into France.

King Edward sent the Queene his wife vnto to her brother the French King, to stablish the peace, who went ouer with a small company. By her mediation a peace was fully finished, to wit, that the King of England should giue vnto his eldest sonne Edward the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and the Earledome of Pontiue, & that the French King should receiue homage of him: whereupon Edward the kings sonne went ouer with a competent houshold about the feast of Saint Mathew and did homage vnder certaine protestations, to his vncle the French King.

King Edward ratified his Queene and their sonne.

Whiles the Queen with her sonne remained in France longer then the Kings pleasure was and would not come again without Roger Mortimer and other Nobles that were fled out of England, and especially for the paine she bare to y two high Spencers, the Kin displeasure banished them both, and all other that did their parts: whereupon many fled ouer the seas to the Queene, amongst y which was one, a subtill knight, sir Roger Waspre who flaying the Constable of Cosse Castle, broke from thence, where he had long laine prisoner.

Oliver Ingham. An. reg. 18 An. reg. 19

Sir Oliver Ingham knight, a man of the yong Duke Edward had made keeper of Aquitaine, gathered a great army, and that y the Prince of Aniow (which the French King contrary to couenants did withheld) and brought it wholly into the Dominion of England.

Moreouer, the kings nauy take 100. ships of the Normans and brought them into England, for which cause great hatred grew betwixt the two Kingdoms and their realmes.

The Queene perceiuing that the nobles of France were corrupted with guifts sent out of England so that she could trust none of them, secretly conueyed her selfe and her sonne to the Earle of Haynalde, desiring ayde of him: who receiued and intreated her very honourably, so long as she remained there.

1326. William Stratford and others beheaded.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Saint Edmundsbury, sore afraide of the Queenes returne and of those exiled persons that were with her, left they should with a power of Aliens put him downe from his kingly dignity, wherefore he ordained his Castles as well in Wales as in England, to be furnished with munitions, and meanwhile also let more his riuers and coasts of y sea, whereof the men of y Cinque ports take the charge to defend. He also commanded that in euery City, borough, towne corporate, hundred and liberty of England, musters should be made, and their men to be exercised in armes both on horseback and on foote, to that they might at all times be ready when any hue and cry should be made, to pursue the Aliens if any came into England. And to this purpose, he ordained Bekenings or Beacons to be set vp, that the same being fired might be seene farre off, and thereby the people to be raised.

Bekenings set vp.

Also the Queene made a marriage betwixt her eldest sonne Edward, and Philip the daughter to William Earle of Haynald, & then with her sonne Edward, Edmond of Woodstocke Earle of Kent, the Kings brother, Roger Mortimer, and many other noble men that fled out of England, & tooke brother to William Earle of Haynald being Captaine, with stipendary Knights out of Almaine and Haynald, she tooke the seas with all her power, which were to the number of two thousand seuen hundred fiftie and seuen men well armed, and arrived at Orewell or Odwell hauen besides Harwich in Essex, about the Epiphanias, whither immediately the Earle Marshall, the Earle of Leicester, the Bishops of Lincolne, Hereford, and Dunelme, and Ely came, and being ioyned to the Queene, made a great army: the other Bishops specially of Canterbury, ayded her with money. When she had refreshed her army at Saint Edmundsbury, she went forwards pursuing her enemies, whose goods she applied to her owne vse.

An. reg. 20 Queen Isabel returned.

The King requested aide of the Citizens of London, who made him answere they would with due obedience honour the King & Queene and their sonne, who was lawfull heire to the realme, and that they would shut their gates against all forreine Brayters of the realme; but they would not goe out of their Citie to fight, except they might accepting to their liberties, returne home againe the same day before the Sunne set: which when the King heard, he fortified the Tower of London, & left there his yonger sonne Iohn of Eltham: he caused also to be proclaimed that euery man should resist them that were arrived, and to murder them to the vttermost of their powers (the Q. & the Mortimers with her sonne Edward, and the Earle of Kent his brother onely excepted) and whosoeuer could bring the head of Roger Mortimer, should haue 1000. pounds.

Wherefore in a darke night, the Keepers of Edward conueyed him thence to Barkeley.

Offences of K. the second.

These tormentors of Edward exercised towards him many cruelties, vnto whome it was not permitted to come, vnlesse it were by night, neither to see any man or to be seene of any. When hee rode, they forced him to bee bareheaded: when he would sleepe, they would not suffer him, neither when hee was hungry would they giue him such meate as he desired, but such as hee loathed: euery word that hee spake, was contraried by them, who gaue it out most slanderously, that hee was madde. And shortly to speake, in all matters they were quite contrary to his will, that either by cold, watching or vnwholesome meates, for melancholy, by some infirmity he might languish and die. But this man being by nature strong to suffer paines, and patient through Gods grace to abide all griefes, he endured all the deuises of his enemies, for as touching poysons, which they gaue him often to drinke, by the benefit of nature he dispatched away.

Edward the second crowned with hay.

These Champions hying Edward towards Barkeley, being guarded with a rabble of hellhounds, along by the Grange belonging to the Castle of Bullowe, where that wicked man Gurney making a crowne of hay, put it on his head, and the Souldiers that were present, scoffed and mocked him beyond all measure, saying, That auaunt sir King, making a kinde of noise with their mouthes, as though they had farted: they feared to be met of any that should know Edward, they bent their journey therefore towardes the left hand, riding along ouer the Parish grounds lying by the riuer of Seuerne. Moreouer, deuising to disfigure him that hee might not bee knowne, they determined for to shaue as well the haire of his head, as also of his beard: wherefore, as in their journey they trauailed by a little water which ran in a ditch, they commanded him to light from his horse to bee shauen, to whom, being set on a moale hill, a Barber came vnto him with a bason of colde water taken out of a ditch, to shaue him withall, saying vnto the king, that that water should serue for that time. To whom Edward answered, that would they, nould they, hee would haue warme water for his beard, and, to the end that hee might keepe his promise, hee began to weepe, and shed teares plentifully: At length they came to Barkley Castle, where Edward was shut vp close like an anchorite. Isabell his wife taking it grieuously that her husbands life (which they deadly hated) was prolonged, made her complaint to her Schoolemaster Adam de Orleton, fayning that she had certaine dreames, & interpretation whereof she misliked, which if they were true, she feared least, that if her husband be at any time restored to his old dignity, that hee would burne her for a Traytor, or condemne her to perpetuall bondage. In like sort the Bishop being guilty in his owne conscience stood in the like feare. The like feare also stroke the hearts of other for the same offence, wherefore it seemed good to many of great dignity and blood, as well spirituall, as temporall, both men and women, that all such feare should bee taken away, desiring his death: whereupon there were letters colourably written to the Keepers of Edward, greatly blaming them, for looking so kinderly to the King, suffering him to haue such liberty, and nourishing him too delicately.

Moreouer, there is a privy motion made vnto them, but yet in such sort, as it might seeme halfe done, that the death of Edward would not be misliking vnto them, whether it were naturall or violent. And in this point, the great deceit of Sophisters stood in force, set downe by the Bishop who wrote thus.

Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est,
Kill Edward doe not feare is a good thing:
Or thus:
To seeke to shead King Edwards bloud
Refuse to feare I count it good.

King Edward mured.

Which sophisticall saying is to be resolued into two propositions, whereof the first consisting of three words, to wit, Edwardum occidere nolite, doe not kill Edward, and the second of other three, that is, timere bonum est, feare is a good thing, doe seeme to perswade subtilly from murthering of the King: but the receiuers of these letters, not ignorant of the writing, changed the meaning thereof to this sence, Edwardum occidere nolite timere to kill Edward doe not feare: and afterwards these words, bonum est, it is good, so that they being guilty, turned a good saying into euill.

The Bishopp being thus determinately purposed touching the death of Edward, and warily pronuding for him selfe, if by any chance hee should bee accused thereof, craftily wresteth that the authozitie which hee gaue by writing, might seeme to bee taken erpcellely contrary to his meaning, by reason of accenting and pointing of the same.

To conclude, the murtherers of Edward, hoping to haue found both Isabell and the Bishopp to bee their trustie friends, they found them earnest persecutours of their enterprise quite denying whatsoeuer they had deuised against Edward, yea, they were greatly buised in deuising most cruell death for them, so that the murtherers being quite dismayed, wist not what to doe: but shewed the Letters of Isabel, the Bishoppe, and other conspiratours, being confirmed with their owne handes and seales, which the Bishop refused not, but confessed to be his and others, but construed them to another sence, accusing them to be false interpreters of his Letters. & of his owne clwne authority threatned them, vntill he forced them to runne away. Thus much touching the Letters.

Now when King Edward was brought vnto the Castle aforsaid, he was courteously receiued by Thomas Barkely then Lord of the fee, who was allowed 100. shillings the day for the time: But after the tormenters had receiued their letters of gouernment ouer the Castle, the said Thomas is commanded to vse no familiaritie with Edward: wherefore Thomas Barkeley with heauy cheere departeth thence to other his dwelling places: And Edwards persecution continuing to his death began to take effect. For after this he was shut vp in a close Chamber, where, with the stench of dead carkasses, lading a Cellar vnder him, he was miserably tormented many dayes together, in such sort that he was well nigh suffocated therewith. And that the paine was almost intolerable vnto him, it appeareth by the complaint he made on a certaine day at the chamber windowe, certaine Carpenters then working on the right side thereof, hearing the same. But these tirants perceiuing that this terrible stench was not of a sufficient force to cause the death of this valiant man Edward, one night being the twenty two of September, they came rushing in vpon him sudainly, as he lay in his bed, with great and heauy featherbeds, being in weight as much as 15. strong men could beare, wherewith they oppressed and strangled him by smothering. Into whom also they thrust a plummers soldring yron being made red hot, vp into his bowels, through a certaine Instrument like to the end of a Trumpet or glisterpipe, put in at the fundament, burning therby his inward parts, prouiding thereby least any wound being found in the Kings bodie, might cause his tormentors to answere for committing open treason, and therefore suffer iust punishment. In this sort was this stout knight oppressed, crying out with a lowd voyce, so that many as well within the Castle, as without, heard it, perceiuing it to be the cry of one that suffered violent death, which caused many of Berkley, and also of the Castle (as themselues affirmed) to take compassion thereof, and to pray for the soule of him that was then departing the world. And thus was the end of Edward of Carnarnan, being betrayed as is aforsaid: but to colour the matter that they might seeme guiltles in this case, Isabel and the Bysshop of Hereford laboured to cleare themselues by banishing and outlawing of Thomas Gorney, and John Maltrauers, laying as it were all the fault vpon them.

This Thomas Gorney flying to Parris, and there lying hid priuily the space of three yeares, was at length espyed and taken, and as he was brought towards England, for to haue receiued iust worthy punishment for his deserts, he was beheaded on the sea, fearing y^t he had bin brought into England, he would haue accused diuers other great personages. The other, to wit, John Maltrauers, liuing in great contrition and repentance, spent a long time in Dutchland. Thus farre out of Thomas de la More, a worshipfull Knight, that then lined and wrote in the French tongue what he saw with his eyes, or heard credibly reported by them that saw, and some that were actors. All which was (at the said sir Thom. de la Mores request) translated, and more orderly penned in the Latine tongue, by Walter Baker, alias Swinborne, Canon of Oseney besides Oxford.

Now to conclude this History, of the raigne and end of King Edward the second, called of Carnaruan, for that he was borne there: he was deposed on the twenty fiue of Januarie, in the yeare of Christ 1326. when he had raigned nineteene yeares, fiue moneths and odde dayes, and was murthered on the twenty one of September next following, being the Feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, in the yere of Christ 1327. whose death was not published till after the Feast of all Saints, and he was buried at Gloucester on the Feast day of S. Thomas the Apostle, or 21. of December. He had issue by Isabel his wife, Edward, which was elected King: and to whom he resigned in his life: John of Eltham Earle of Cornwall that died at the Towne of S. Iohn in Scotland without issue: Ioane of the Tower, Queene of the Scots, and Elianor Countesse of Guelder, that died young.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF King EDVVARD the III.

King. 1.

EDVVARD the third born at Windsor, about the age of 14. yeares, after the deposing of his father, began his raigne the 25. day of January, in the yere of our Lord 1326. after the account of the Church of England. He was crowned at Westminster, on the first day of February, by Walter Reignalds Archbishop of Canterburie. This Prince was endued with passing beautie and fauour, of wit prouident, circumspect, and gentle of nature: of excellent modestly and temperance. He aduanced such persons to dignities, as did most excell other in innocency of life. In feates of armes he was very expert, as the noble enterprises by him atchieued doe well declare. At the beginning of his raigne he was chiefly ordered by his mother Isabel.

Regist. of Bury John Prigon, & Abbey of Bury spoyled.

The inhabitants of the Towne of Bury in Suffolke, assembled themselues in warlike manner on S. Lukes day last before passed, in the twentieth yeare of Edward the second, and besieged the Abbey of Bury, brake the gates, braue and wounded the Porters, bare out of the Abbey all the gold, siluer, ornaments, bookes, Charters, and other writings, with the assay of their coine, stampes, and all other things pertaining to their Mint: and all other goods, as Vessell, Pewter, Iron, Lead, &c. They also bent many houses about the Abbey, and in the Towne, pertaining to the Abbot, with his Manors in Berton, Packenham, Rugham, Mildhall, Horningbury, Newton, Whipsted, Westle, Risby, Ingham, Fernham, Redwell, Haberdon, and others, with all the coyne in the same Manors, and drawe away the horses, oxen, kine, swine, sheepe, &c. They drew the Monkes out of their Abbey and put them in Prisons, and after brought them againe to their Chapter house, where they forced them to seale Charters at their pleasure, &c. For the which facts, the Malefactors were this yeare by vertue of the Kings Commission directed to Thomas Earle of Norfolke, Marshall of England, Thomas Berdolfe, and others, apprehended and conuicted: nineteene of them were hanged, and one pressed to death. After this, the whole inhabitants of the towne, for to that they had not stayed the Malefactors of their enterprise in the beginning (as they might haue done) were amerced to pay the Abbot toward his damnages 140000. pound. Nouertheless the Abbot and Conuent at the Kings request (who was there present with his Nobility) forgaue and remitted to them 122333. pound, fiue shillings eight pence of the summe, and for the rest shed such fauour, that if they truely paid 2000. markes in twenty yeares following, and obserued their couenants for good order and quietnesse, they forgaue them all the rest.

Record. Eccles. Christ, Cant.

About this time, the like stirre was made against the Monkes of Canterbury: whereof I find recorded as followeth.

King Edward prepared an army into Scotland, commanded the Bailiffes and Citizens of Canterbury, to furnish him twelue Horsemen, and send them to Newcastle, toward which charge the Citizens required ayde of the Monks: who answered them, that without the assent of the King and their Archbishop, they would not agree thereunto, for so much as the Kings of England had founded their church in free and perpetuall almes. Whereupon William Chilham Bayliffe, and many Commons of the Citie, assembled themselues in the Preaching Fryers Churchyard, conspired and sware against the Monkes as followeth.

1 That they would ouerthrow the pentises, windowes, and mine, belonging to the Monkes.

2 That no Citizen should dwell in any house belonging to the Monkes.

3 That all rents belonging to the Monkes of Canterbury, should be gathered to the vse of the Commons.

4 That no man should send or sell to the Monkes any victuals.

5 That they should sell all the horses and beastes that came into the Citty with carriage to the Monkes.

6 That all such Monkes as came forth of their house should be spoiled of their garments.

7 That a trench should be made to stop all men from going in or comming out.

8 That euery Pilgrime should at his entring, sweare that he should make no offering.

9 Also, that euery of those commons aforesaid should weare on their finger a ring of gold of those that belonged to Thomas Becket.

Sir John the Earles brother of Henault, came to helpe Edward the third against the Scots, with fiue hundred men of armes: which Henawders and the Englishmen fell out by chance on Trinity Sunday at Poyke, where eighty of the Lincolneshire men were slaine, and much of the Citty of Poyke was burned: and the Englishmen slaine were buried vnder a stone in Saint Clements Churchyard in Folegate.

Queen Q.

The King went against the Scots that were entred England, as farre as Stanhope Parke in Wardale, where they were besieged three dayes, but they escaped. James Douglas one night secretly entring the English Campe, came neare to the Kings tent to haue taken or slaine him, but his Chaplaine being a bold man and well armed, with some other being slaine, he with much adoe got backe vnhurt.

Yorke the Scotland.

This yeare also King Edward the second was murdered on the 22. of September, as is before declared.

This yeare died Charles King of France the third brother, which was brother to the Ladie Isabel Duerne of England, mother to King Edward the third: by whose death the succession of the Kingdome of France came to the said Edward, but it was usurped and possessed by Philip de Valois vncle to the said Charles, who did intrude himselfe by force.

King Edward married Philip daughter to William Earle of Holland and Henault, at Yorke the fine and twentieth of February: she was sisters daughter to Philip de Valois aforesaid.

A Parliament was holden at Northampton, in which a shamefull peace was made betwixt the Englishmen and Scots, so that Dauid the sonne of Robert Bruse, scarce seuen yeares old, married Ioane of the Tower King Edwards sister, at Berwike the twelfth of July. Also the King made the Scots Charters, the tenour where of was vnknowne to the Englishmen: but all was done as it pleased the old Duerne, Roger Mortimer and James Dowglas. The Scots made many taunting rimes against the Englishmen, for the fond disguised apparell by them at that time vsed: amongst the which this was fastened vpon the Church doores of Saint Peter toward Stangate.

Thomas de Cobham Bishop of Worcester, also deceased, to whom succeeded Adam de Orleton, in that Bishopricke.

Parliament at Salisburie.

In a Parliament at Salisburie, the King made three Earles, Iohn of Eltham his brother, Earle of Cornewall, Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and Iames Butler of Ireland Earle of Ormond. From this Parliament the Earle of Lancaster, the Lord Wake, Henry Beamond, Earle Marshall, and other Noble men did absent themselues, not being farre off from thence in armour, for the which the King was highly displeased: Notwithstanding in Sommer following, they submitted themselues vnto the Kings mercy, seeking his fauour.

Certaine men of this land, to the intent to try what friends they had in England, craftily deuised, that Edward the second K. of England was aliue in the castle of Corfe, but not to be seene in the day time, and therefore they vsed many Knights to make shewes and masking with dancing vpon the towres and walls of the Castle, which being perceiued by people of the Country, it was thought there had beene some great King vnto whom they did these great solemnities: this rumor was spred ouer all England; to wit, that the old King was aliue: when it came to passe, that the Earle of Kent sent thither a Fryer preacher, to try the truth of the matter, who (as it was thought) hauing corrupted the Porter of the Castle with rewards, is let in, where he lay all the day in the porters lodge very close: and when night was come, hee was willed to put on the habite of a Lay man, and then was brought into the hall, where he saw (as hee thought) Edward the father of the king sitting royally at supper, with great majesty. This Fryer being thus perswaded, returned againe to the earle of Kent, and reported as he thought what he saw: whereupon the Earle said and affirmed with an oath, that he would endeauor by all the meanes he could to deliuer his brother from prison.

Parliament at Winchester.

The same yeare at the earnest request of some, the King held a Parliament at Winchester, where, by the procurement of the old Duerne, and Roger Mortimer the sayd Earle of Kent, and many other Noble men and religious persons, to wit, the Prouincials of the white Carmelite Fryers, and of the blacke preaching Fryers, and Fryer Richard Wilton were accused of conspiracy, touching (as it was said) the delinery of the Kings Father: Which matter although it were but deuised fantasie and a meere lye, yet the sayd Earle for certaine confessions which he made and for certaine Letters which were found about him, was there beheaded. The other, to wit, the Prouincials of the Predicants and Carmelites, were banished: but the Bishop of London was set at liberte. Robert de Hauston Priest, and foure certaine Carmelite Fryers and Predicants, were condemned to perpetuall prison. The death of the said Earle was the lesse lamented, because his families and seruants had aboue measure afflicted the Commons, in taking vp things (as they trauailed) at the kings price, paying nothing or very little for it.

Earle of Kent put to death by the king's procurement.

Anno reg. 2.

There was a Parliament holden at Nottingham, where Roger Mortimer was in such glory and honour, that it was without all comparison. No man durst name him any other then Earle of March: a greater route of men waited on his heeles, than on the Kings person: he would suffer the king to rise to him and would walke with the King equally, key by key, and chaire by chaire, neuer preferring the king, but would goe foremost himselfe with his officers: He greatly rebuked the Earle of Lancaster, cousin to the King, for that without his consent he appointed certaine lodgings for Noble men in the Towne, demanding who made him so bolde, to take vp lodgings so nigh vnto the Quene: with which iniuries the Constable being greatly feared, appointed lodging for the Earle of Lancaster one mile out of the towne: and likewise were lodged the Earle of Hereford, Iohn de Bohune of Essex, high Constable of England, and others. By which meanes, a contention rose among the Noblemen, and great murmuring among the common people, who said, that Roger Mortimer the Quenes Paragon, & the Kings Father, sought all the meanes he could to destroy the Kings blood, and to vsurpe the Regall Majestie: Which report troubled much the kings friends, to wit, William Montacute, and other, who for the safegard of the King, sware themselues to be true to his person, and drew vnto them Robert de Holland, who had of long time beene keeper of the Castle, vnto whom all secret corners of the same were knowne. When vpon a certaine night, the King lying without the castle, both he and his friends were brought by torch-light through a secret way vnder ground, beginning farre off from the sayd Castle, till they came euen to the Quenes chamber, which they by chance found open: They therefore being armed with naked swords in their hands, went forwards, leauing the King also armed without the doore of the Chamber, least that his Mother should espy him: they which entred in, slew Hugh Turpinton knight, who resisted them, Maister John Neuell of Hoine, by giuing him his death wound. From thence, they went towards the Queene mother, whom they found with the Earle of March ready to haue gone to bed: and hauing taken the sayd Earle, they ledde him out into the Hall, after whom the Quene followed, crying; Bel filz, bel filz, ayes pitie

Then are the keyes of the Ca-stle sent for, and euery place with all the furni-ture is yeelded vp into the kings handes, but in such secret wise, that none without the Ca-stle, except the kings friendes, vnderstoode thereof. The next day in the morning verie early, they bring Roger Mortimer, and other his friends taken with him, with an horrible shout and crying (the earle of Lancaster then lead, being one of them that made the shout for hope) towards London, where hee was committed to the Tower, and afterward con-demned at Westminster, in presence of the whole Parliament on Saint Andrewes euen next following, and then drawne to the Elmes and there hanged on the common Gallowes, whereon hee hung two dayes and two nights by the Kings commandement, and then was buried in the Gray Friers Church. Hee was condemned by his Peeres, and yet neuer was brought to answere before them, for it was not then the custome, after the death of the Earles of Lancaster, Winchester, Glo-cester, and Kent: wherefore this Earle hadde that law himselfe, which hee appointed for o-ther.

The causes of his death laide against him, were these:

First, that he was consenting to the mur-dering of the kings father:

Secondly for that he hadde receaued a great summe of money, whereby the kings honour was greatly abated at Stanhope Parke, where hee gaue a signe vnto the Scots that they should flee.

Thirdly, for that hee caused certaine auncient bookes and Charters to be burnt, wherein the king of Scots stood bound vnto the King of England: and especially for that hee had caused a contract to be made betwixt the Kings Sister, and David the sonne of Robert le Bruse.

Fourthly, for that hee hadde vnprofitable continued a great deale of treasure which hee found in the kings treasurie, and in the treasu-rie of the Earle of Winchester and Glo-cester.

Fiftly, for appropriating vnto himselfe the wardes and marriages of all England.

Sixtly, for being an euill Counseller to the king, and to the Queene mother, and for be-ing ouermuch familiar with her. There dyed with him his friends Simon de Bartord knight brother to sir William Burford that was Iu-stice, and Iohn Deuerell Esquire, who was desirous to haue made open confession of the Kings fathers cruell death, but he could not bee suffered so to doe. Iohn Maureuers was attaint for the death of Edmond earle of Kent. Thomas Gurney, William Ogle, for murthe-ring King Edward the second. King Edward, the Bishop of Winchester, William Mountacute, and verie few others passed ouer Sea, like as they had beene Per-chants, hauing with him scarce fifteene Horse-men. Hee left Iohn of Eltham his brother, Protector of the Realme. He returned againe about the beginning of Aprill, and then held a great Turnament at Dertford in Kent. The fifteenth of June was borne vnto King Edward his first sonne at Woodstocke, who was after named Edward the blacke Prince. The King tooke into his hands all the lands assigned to his mother, and onely left her a thousand pound the yeere. About the feast of Saint Mar-tin, there was very solemne Iusting of all the stout Earles, Barons and Nobles at London in Cheape, betwixt the great Crosse, and the great Conduite nigh Soper lane, which lasted three dayes, where the Queene Philippe, with many Ladies sell from a stage, notwith-standing they were not hurt at all: where-fore the Queene tooke great care to saue the Carpenters from punishment, and through her prayer (which shee made on her knees) he pacified the King and Councell, where-by shee purchased great loue of the peo-ple.

An. reg. 5. 1331

In the beginning of August, Edward Bailiol, sonne and heire to Iohn King of Scots, came into England which Edward hadde beene be-fore that time banished out of Scotland. At his comming, he declared what right he had in the kingdome. Henry Beamont Earle of Bohune, Gilbert Vmfreuill Earle of Angus Dauid earle of Athels, Richard Talbot, Ralph Baron of Stafford, Fulk Fitz Williams, with many other noble men, affirming they had right of inheritance in Scotland, desired licence and ayde of the King of England, to recouer the saide kingdome and landes due to them, but the King hauing regard of the peace lately made, and also for his sisters sake queene of Scotts, would not suffer them to leade an armie through his land, wherefore the saide Lords getting a fleete of shippes, entred the sea, and sayling towards Scotland, landed at Kinkhorne, where the earle of Fife and Ro-bert Bruse, bastard son to Robert Bruse, with ten M. Scots resisted them neere vnto Dun-fermeling: but the English-men put them to flight, and slewe manie. Afterwarde, to wit, on Saint Laurence day, they hadde a fore conflict conflict at Old-dismore, where two thousand Englishmen ouercame fourty thousand Scots. By reason of the great tyding of the multitude amongst themselues, fiue Earles, and many o-ther were thronged to death. On the morrow, the Englishmen tooke the towne of Saint Johns with furnished with victuals.

An. reg. 6. 1332.

The King of England gathered a great po-wer, and besieged Berwike, which at length was yeelded for want of victualles. During this siege, the Scots sought many wayes to remoue the same, leauying a great Armie ouer all Scotland, but comming to the siege they could not bring their purpose to effect, yet still prouoking the Kings Army to battell: where-vpon at length the two Armies appointed to fight, and setting out vpon Halidowne hill, there commeth forth of the Scots Campe a cer-taine stout Champion of great stature, who for a fact by him done, was called Turnebull: he standing in the midst betwixt the 2. armies, chalenged all the Englishmen, any one of them to fight with him a Combat: at length, one Robert Viuile Knight, a Scottish man, requesting licence of the King, being armed, with his sword drawne, marcheth toward the Champion, meeting by the way a certain black mastiffe Dog, which waited on the Champi-on, whom with his sword he lodainly strake, and cut him off at his ioynes, at the sight wher-of the Master of the Dog slaine, was much abashed, and in his battell more warie and fearefull: whose left hand and head also after-ward, this worthy Knight cut off. After this Combate both the Armies met, but they figh-ting scarce halfe an houre, certaine of y Scots being slaine, they closed their Armie (which was in three) all into one battell, but at length flying, the King followed them, taking and chasing them into lakes and pits, for the space of fiue miles. There were slaine of them 8. Earles, 1300. horsemen, and of common soul-diers 35000. at a place by Berwik, called Bo-thull neare vnto Halidown.

In the meane season the Scottes hadde be-sieged the Castle at Bambugh, in which at that time the Queene was: but when they heard of the victory aforesaid, they left the siege and fledde. The Towne-men of Ber-wike perceiued to the King of England both the Castle and the Towne, who placing garri-sons there, he sent Edward Bailiol, and other Nobles to keepe the Realme of Scotland. Earle Patricius in the next Parliament holden at Yorke, made fealty and did homage vnto the King by oath, who receiued of the King for yeel-ding vp of Berwike vnto him, many honours and preferments: notwithstanding this Earle returned againe to rebellion, who holding Dun-bar against the King, was besieged by William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Wal-lingford: and immediately after, the Queene was deliuered of a daughter named Isabell at Windsstocke.

Ann. reg. 7. 1333.

The King summoned a Parliament to bee holden at Yorke, the same to begin on Mon-day the second Weeke of Lent: to the which Parliament, the King of Scots (called Con-querour) although he were warned to be there, yet he came not, but sent Messengers to excuse him, to wit, Henry de Beliemount, & William Mountacute Earles, and certaine other Ba-rons and Knights, who signified, that the King of Scottes Conquerour could not bee there without great danger, for that certaine Scottes lay in the Ilandes readie to doe him damage.

Hee was condemned by his Peeres, and yet neuer was brought to answere before them, for it was not then the custome, after the death of the Earles of Lancaster, Winchester, Gloucester, and Kent: wherefore this Earle hadde that law himselfe, which hee appointed for other,

The causes of his death laide against him, were these:

First, that he was consenting to the murdering of the kings father:

Secondly for that he hadde receaued a great summe of mony, whereby the kings honour was greatly abated at Stanhope Parke, where hee gaue a signe vnto the Scots that they should flee.

Third y, for that hee caused certaine auncient deedes and Charters to be burnt, wherein the king of Scots stod bound vnto the king of England: and especially for that hee had caused a contract to be made betwixt the Kings Sister, and David the sonne of Robert le Bruse.

Fourthly, for that hee hadde vnprofitablie consumed a great deale of treasure which hee found in the kings treasurie, and in the treasurie of the Earle of Winchester and Gloucester.

Fiftly, for appropriating vnto himselfe the wardes and marriages of all England.

Sixtly, for being an euill Counseller to the king, and to the Quene mother, and for being ouermuch familiar with her. There dyed with him his friends Simon de Burford knight brother to sir William Burford that was Iustice, and Iohn Deuerell Esquire, who was desirous to haue made open confession of the Kings fathers cruell death, but he could not bee suffered so to doe. Edward Bohun drowned. About the Feast of Saint Martine, Edward Bohune a Noble man, was drowned in the Marches of Scotland: for as he was driuing a bootie of Cattell ouer a River, hee felt himselfe in danger, causing his guide to ride before him through the water, where though the smoothnesse of the stone whereon the water ran, his guide not being able to take sure footing fell downe, with his Master being armed, and before any helpe could come, they were drowned in the bottome of the Channell.

John Archbyshoppe of Canterbury went ouer the Sea to Philippe de Valoys King of France, requesting of him the continuance of Peace and amitie betwixt the two Kingdomes to be maintained.

Secondly, that all Townes and Castles taken before time by his Father, should be restored to the King of England.

Thirdly, that the said French King should sweare, neuer to giue ayde to the Scots against the King of England: vnder which conditions, the two Kings of both Realmes should prepare to trauaile towards the holy Land, and to fight against the enemies of Christ. But the French King accounted the King of England not worthy of his friendship, so long as he continued Warres against the Scots his friends, whom he said were iust men. Vnto the second petition he would not otherwise consent thereunto, than if all charges were repaid againe which his father Charles de Valoys layd out in the Warres of Gascoigne. Thirdly, he said, that he was a friend and louer of iustice and equitie, which he would neuer swarue from, neither for friendship, nor affinitie, but he would by all meanes he could, molest and vexe all breakers of the Peace of the Kingdome of Scotland: for (saith he) there shall neuer be perfect peace and quietnesse among Christians, before the King of France sit in place of Iudgement for the right of the Kingdomes of France, England and Scotland.

T. de la More. Ro. de Avesbury.

These bee the points agreed betwixt the Councell of the Kings of England and Scotland on the one party, and Alexander Mowbrey, Geffrey Mowbrey, Godfrey de Roos, William Bullocke, and Eustace de Loreyne, hauing full power from Dauid Seravulgi Earle of Dafeis, and Robert Steward of Scotland, to treate, accord, and affirme all points enterparled and to be enterparled betwixt the sayd Kings, and the Earle, and Steward, as appeareth by the Letters Patents of either partie.

First it is accorded that the said Earle Dafeis, the great men, and all other of the communalty of Scotland, which shall come in the same same conditions, shall haue life and member, Lands & tenements, Fees and Offices within Scotland, which they ought to haue by inheritance or right, those except, which shall be surpassed by common assent.

Item, that they shall be pardoned of imprisonment and of all manner trespasses by them in the Realmes of England and Scotland, from the beginning of the world, vnto the date of these presents.

Item, the Earle Dafeis, and Alexander Mowbrey, shall haue Lands, tenements, possessions, and fees in England, which they had at their departure, after the homage done at Newcastle vpon Tine.

Item, that the Franchises of the Church in Scotland, shall be maintained, after the auncient vsage of Scotland.

Item, that the lawes of Scotland in Borough Townes, and Shiriewikes, within the lands of the King of Scotland, be vsed after the ancient vsage and custome of Scotland, as they were vsed in the dayes of King Alexander.

Item, that the offices of Scotland be ministred by people of the same Nation, yet notwithstanding, that alwayes the King of Scotland may put such officers in as shall please him, of what Nation soeuer they be.

Item, that all those that within the conditions of the Earle Dafeis haue lands within the lands of the king of England in Scotland, shall haue againe the same Lands, Tenements, possessions, Offices and fees, as they had them at their departure, after their homage done at Newcastle vpon Tine, except those that shall be forepriued by common assent.

Item, that if they be impleded for their lands and tenements aforesaid, that they haue their defences and recoueries in Court where they ought to haue.

Item, as touching the demand which the Earle Dafeis claimeth, that the King of England ought to acquite his lands in England which he hath in gage for 8. hundred markes, the King neither ought nor will doe it; but as touching the Spanno of Byphingoone, which the said Earle sayd to pledge for two hundred and fiftie pounds, it is accorded that if the said Earle doe come within one yeare, after the date of these presents, and will acquite the Spanno, the king shall cause that he haue the same Spanno.

Item, as touching the Castle and lands of Chillam, it is accorded that the sayd Earle doe in the same point that he was before at his departure, and haue his recouerie by Law, and the King promiseth in good faith, that he will cause that hee may haue the Land, without delaying eyther partie. And touching the Lands which the sayd Earle claymeth to haue in Norfolke, of the which he hath Charters, it is accorded that his Charters being seene of the Kings Councell, he will doe reason.

Item, that in case any man surmise treason vpon the said earle, he may defend himselfe by his body, according to the lawes and vsages of Scotland, and on the Marches, and that all those that be within these conditions, haue the like grant.

Item, as to the pardon which William Ramsey knight demandeth for the trespasse by him done to William Lord Mountague, to wit, for beating downe his Castle of Haghtondowne, the same William shall be ready to doe according to that that shall be aduised by the Kings of England and Scotland.

Item, that the said Stacie de Loraine haue his Lands and tenements which hee ought to haue within the Realme of Scotland, and if any man haue trespassed towards him, hee shall haue his recouerie by law. Written at Saint Johns Towne in Scotland the 18. of August, Anno 1335.

seemed at the beginning to be nothing profitable, yet in short time the art of clothing increased so much thereby, that it was twenty times more vsed than before.

Also it was enacted that no man should after that time, buy any cloth that was made beyond the sea, and that none should weare any furres, but such as might dispend one hundred pound by yeare.

The 20. of March the King granted by his Letters Patents power to the Chancellor of the Vniuersitie of Cambridge, to receiue in his name yearely the oathes of the Maior, Bayliffes, Aldermen, and Burgeſſes of the Towne: which euer since hath so continued.

T. de la More. After the Feaſt of Saint Michael, a Parliament was holden at London, and a Conuocation was assembled by the Archbyshop, wherein the Clergie granted a tenth to three yeares, and the Commons a fifteenth, in consideration of the Kings warres which was not in Scotland, and also to resist the French King, who made great bragges, and shewed great cruelties; for he outlawed, slew, and imprisoned all Englishmen, and confiscated the goods and Cattels, of all that were found in his Kingdome of France, threatning that hee would bee reuenged for his Friends the Scots.

An. reg. 11. Moreouer, he let not to much as one towne or Castle in the Counties of Aquitaine, or of Poyters, that was not seized into his hands: whereupon King Edward sent into Brabant, to take vp all the wols which Merchants had brought thither, and made sale thereof for readie money. He also wrote Letters to the French King, exhorting him, that he would continue his old amitie. Sir Walter Many being the Ambaſsadour for the King of England, and desirous to reuenge the bloud of two Englishmen that were slaine comming aland for fresh water, in a certaine Iland, called the Ile of Agnes, nigh vnto Flaunders, he caused all that he found in that Iland to bee put to the sword, and take prisoner the Earle of Flaunders brother, who was Captaine of the Ile.

T. Walsingh. Certaine of the Iland men being fled into a Church, were burnt, to the number of three thousand, with the Church and all, by the Welshmen.

The warres being thus as aforesaid begun betwixt the two kingdomes, the rumour thereof came vnto the Court of Rome, whereupon the Pope sent two Cardinals for the reformation and ordering of the Peace betwixt the two kingdomes: who comming to Westminster, declared before the King the cause of their comming: whereunto the King answered, that although without all reason they did seeme to restraine him of right and equitie, for that he ought to succeed into the kingdome of his foreFathers, the which his aduersarie Philip de Valois did deny him, expelling, murthering, and imprisoning his people, and taking away the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and Earledome of Poyters without cause, maintaining the Scots and other Rebels against him, yet those iniuries notwithstanding, he was content if they could take order for the quiet enioying of Aquitaine, and other fees belonging vnto him, which his Predecessours did injoy.

Moreouer, for the dismissing of all ayde that the French King should giue vnto the Scottes at any time of rebellion, for the which he offered his money, and also the marriage of his eldest sonne, and also to resigne all such rites and interest that he had to the Kingdome of France.

The Cardinals being greatly comforted with this answer, departed, hoping that all warres were now ended. They tooke with them Iohn the Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bishop of Durham, and Geffry Lord Scrope, who altogether went on message with y kings answere to the French king, hauing full authoritie to treat and conclude a peace.

These being to reasonable offers, could not pacifie the furious mind of the French King, who reposed great trust in the Scots, hoping by them, and through their meanes, quite to dispossesse, and to disinherit the King of England of all the title he had.

This yeare on the 7. of October, K. Edward began the foundation of his Colledge in Cambridge, that since was called the Kings Hall, but now with Michael house, and Physicke house, all made into one by King Henry the 8. is called Trinitie Colledge. Kings Hall Cambridge.

Also this yeare because of the warres with France, King Edward caused to be confiscated all the goods of the Priories aliens in England, that is to say, such Priories as were Celles to any Monasteries in Fraunce. He let out the Priories to Farme, with all their lands and tenements, and rented them at his pleasure, for the space of three and twenty yeres: in the which time diuers of those priories were purchased of the King, made free, and againe (as it were) new founded by Englishmen, as Tiburie in the Castle, and other: the residue not changed were in the fiue and thirtieth yere of King Edwards raigne againe restored to their lands: as shall be shewed when I come to it. Priories aliens in England their goods confiscate. An. reg. 12.

The King tooke Woll, to a certaine number of sackes, at a low price in euery Country: the number that was set vpon Staffordshire was 6. hundred sackes, price nine markes the sacke of good Wooll: but nothing was payd. First, the Woll was vniuersally taken. Secondly, for the halfe, in whose hands soeuer it were found, as well Merchants as other. And the third time the King tooke a fifteenth of the Communaltie, to be paid in woll, price of euery stone (containing fourteene pound) two shillings. 1338.

The King appointed also all the come and glebe lands to serue for his warres.

About S. Margarets day, King Edward, with Quéene Philip his wife, and a great Armie passed the seas with a Nauy of 5. hundred saile K. Arthure.

South-hampton & Sandwich and other by the French Pyrats. The fourth of October, fifty Gallies well manned and furnished, came to South-hampton about 9. of the clocke, and sacked the towne: the townesmen running away for feare: by the breake of the next day they which fled, by helpe of the countrey thereabout, came against the Pyrats, & fought with them: in the which skirmish were slaine to the number of three hundred Pyrats, together with their Captaine a young Soudier, the King of Scils sonne. To this yong man, the French King had giuen whatsoeuer hee got in the Kingdom of England: but hee being beaten downe by a certaine man of the country, cried Rancon, notwithstanding the husband-man laid him on with his club, till he had slaine him, speaking these words: yea (quoth he) I know well enough thou art a Francon, and therefore shalt thou die, for he vnderstood not his speech, neither had he any skill to take Gentlemen prisoners, and to keepe them for their ransome: wherefore the residue of those Gennowaies, after they had set the Towne a fire and burnt it vp quite, fled to their gallies, & in their flying certaine of them were drowned. And after this the inhabitants of the towne compassed it about with a strong and great walle.

The King still maintaining his warres in France, on Sunday in the Annunciation of our Lade, 11. gallies approaching to the towne of Harwich, they cast fire therein: the force whereof, by a contrary wind was stayed, so that no great harme was done thereby. Furthermore, in the same yere about the feast of Pentecost, certaine Pyrats of Normandy & Genoa (shipped in gallies & Pinnaces) made a shew on the sea about South-hampton, as they would haue come aland, & threatned soze to spoyle the town againe, but perceiuing the townesmen readie to resist them, they returned to ẏ Ile of Wight but entred not, being put backe by the inhabitants: whereuppon they sayled about the Sea coastes seeking to land in places lesse defended, and after came to Hastings, where they burnt fishers cottages, with their boats, & slew many men. Also they made great shewes many times against the Ile of Thanet, Douer, and Fulkestone, but in those places they did little harme, except to poze fishermen: thence they sailed about to the hauens of Cornewall and Deuonshire, doing in all places much harme to the fishermen, and such ships as they found vnmanned, they fiered. At length they entred Plimmouth Hauen, where they burnt certaine great shippes, and a great part of the towne: these were met by Hugh Courtney Earle of Deuonshire, a knight of fourescore yeres old, being accompanied with many souldiers of his countrey, who hauing lost at the first front a few of his men which were slaine by the quarels of the French, ioyned to fight with them hand to hand. and slaying many of the Pyrates vpon dry land, chased the residue which fled to take their gallyes, and being not able to come nigh them by wading, they were drowned in the sea to the number of 500. Mewes being brought to the Ile lying in Brabant, that diuers Poores of England were spoyled with the Pirates, he declared to his friends, to wit, the Marquis of Iuliacense, and a certaine Cardinall, what great causes he had to reuenge himselfe vpon them, and in the end, was answered by the Cardinall as followeth. The French men spoyle the Isle of Wight.

The kingdome of France (said he) is compassed about with a hedge of Silke, which cannot be broken, by all the strength of the kingdome of England, wherefore my Lord King you must stay for the comming of the Dutchmen, and other your friends and confederates, the greater part whereof you now lacke. The King taking great disdaine, hereat, staying nothing at all, sayd; That he would ride into the land of France with banner displayed, and that there he would loke for that mighty power of the French-men, and that he would either winne the same against any man that should withstand him, or else honestly dye in the field.

King Edward wintered at Antwerpe, where Quéene Philip was deliuered of her third Son Lionel, after Earle of Ulster. The King tooke vpon him to be Lieutenant of the Empire from the Duke of Bauare, who held himselfe as Emperour. K. Edward made Vicegerent of the Empire.

The first day of the assumption of our Lady, a suddaine inundation of water at Newcastle vpon Tine, surmounted the wall, and bare downe a peace of the Towne wall, a fire peaches in length neere to a place called Walinew, where 160. men, and seauen Chaplens and women were drowned. Li. C. Matth. ebor. Rich. South. Newcastle drowned.

In the Vigil of S. Matthy, King Edward began to ride with banner displaied, and twelue thousand men of armes, against the French king, burning townes and castles where soeuer he came. In the first night being very darke, Geffrey Lord Scrope one of the Kings Iustices, ley one of the Cardinals, to wit, Bertrand de Mount Faventine, of the title of our Ladie, vp into an high Tower, shewing him the whole land about toward France, for the Compasse of fiftene leagues, to be in euery place on fire, (saying these words,) Sir, doth not this fiftene shard where with France is compassed, seeme to you to be broken? the Cardinall answering nothing, fell downe as dead for sorrow and feare. An. reg. 13 King Edward inuadeth France. 1339

In this sort King Edward made iourneyes into France daily; continuing the space of 5. weekes, and caused his armie to trauell in such sort, that they destroyed the whole Countrey of Cambray, Mourney, Vermoden, and Landenelw, excepting those Cities which were swone to him, with Churches and Castles. The inhabitants of the Countrey fled, neither was there any man that durst resist his enterprises, although the French King had gathered great armies within the walled Cities, himselfe lying in the strong towne of Saint Quintines, what time the Brabanders had determined to returne home againe, and were entred into their iourney, being forced thereunto, partly for want of victuals, and partly by the coldnesse of Winter which grew on fast.

The French King vnderstanding thereof, began to moue himselfe with his army toward the Campe of the King of England, who gladly looking for his comming, called backe againe the Brabanders, and hauing receiued Letters from the French King, that hee would ioyne battell against him, he sent him word backe againe, that hee would stay for him three dayes, wherefore on the fourth day the King looking for the French Kings comming, which would come no nearer then two miles off, breaking bridges, and felling of trees that the King of England might not follow him, hee fledde to Paris, whereupon King Edward returned by Hanonia into Brabant, where hee continued almost the whole Winter.

William de la Poole made knight banneret by the good fortune of the King. Record.

This William was father to Michaell Lord Wingfild earle of Suffolk and Knight of the Garter, who had issue Michaell Earle of Suffolke, who died at Bartelew 1415. left issue two sons Michaell earle of Suffolke that died at Angecourt the 3. of Henry 5. without issue & William L. Marques and afterward Duke of Suffolke beheaded the 26. of Hen 17 the 6.

This thirteenth yere on the seauenth of September King Edward, at Marteine in France, gaue vnto William de la Poole for the succour of money frankely by him lent, and freely brought vnto him in the coasts of Brabant, so as thereby his honour was preserued, which otherwise was in danger greatly to haue bene embased, to bee honoured with the Militarie girdle, appointing him to keepe, and continue the state and honour of a Banerett: and he gaue him the mannors of Burstwike, and Skyp, with the appurtenances of two hundred and fozty markes, in part of fiue hundred markes Land-yere-ly, more conuenently to maintaine the same estate. And 200. Parkes, yearely to be receiued of the Customes in the port of the towne of Kingstone, vntill he were prouided of two hundred and thzescore markes land of yeerely reuenue. Finally, because William had deliuered him, laying his owne goods and lands in gage, for recouering the Kings right in France, the King graunted, that if he recouered the rights of inheritance in France, he would further within the realme of France (in some competent place) giue to him and to his heyres, a thousand Parkes sterling by yeare.

In this Winter time, King Edward grew into great friendship with the Flemings, who prepared at all times to shew their selues as good Subiects vnto him, swearing to doe homage and fealtie, vpon condition that hee would call himselfe King of Fraunce, and in token thereof, would from thenceforth giue armes with Flowerdeluces, for otherwise they durst not obey him, for feare of the Popes curse, which was to be layd vpon them, if at any time they rebelled against the King of France. Wherefore by the counsell of the Flemings, and consent of his Noblemen, he agreed thereunto, and tooke vpon him both the Name and Armes of the King of France. Hee also tooke Flanders vnder his gouernment, the people whereof long after in all matters were to him obedient, as vnto the King of Fraunce Conquerour. Touching the title and Armes aforesaid, the French King sayd to certaine Englishmen sent vnto him: Our cousin (quoth hee) doth wrongfully beare quartered the Armes of England and France, which matter notwithstanding doth not much displease vs, for that hee is descended from the weaker side of our kinne, and therefore as being a bachelour, we would bee content to graunt him license to beare part of our armes of France: but whereas in his Seales and Letters Patents he nameth himselfe as well King of England as of France, and doth set the first quarter of his armes with Leopards, before the quarter of Lilies, it doth grieue vs very much, making apparant to the beholders, that the little Iland of England, is to be preferred before the great kingdome of France. To whom Sir Iohn of Shoydich knight, made answere; That it was the custome of men in those dayes, to set the tytle and armes of their progenitors, before the armes and tytle of the right descending of their mother: and thus of dutie and reason (sayd hee) doth my Lord the King of England prefer his Armes.

Sir Iohn of Shoydich his answere to the French King.

King Edward being thus vsed, he kept his Christmas at Gaunt: The Mariners of the Cinque Ports, embarked themselues in Pinaces and small boates well appointed, who after the feast of S. Hillarie, arriued at Bononie vpon the Sea coast, the weather being so cloudie and darke, that they could scarcely bee perceiued to bee in the hauen: they bzent in the lower Towne nineteene Gallies and foure great Ships, and twenty small boates with all their tackling, and all such houses as were situate nigh to the Sea coast, amongst which was one great house full of Dares, sayles, weapons, and other necessaries, sufficient to furnish nineteene Gallyes, and men for them: at the length in a skirmish bitwixt the Townesmen and the Englishmen, many of the land men were slaine.

Wight on vpon Fraunce French.

About the beginning of Februarie, King Edward returning into England, came vnto Gaunt, where the Queene lay in Childbed of her fourth sonne named Iohn: he held a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Temporaltie granted him euery ninth sheafe of Wooll, euery ninth Lambe, and euery ninth sheafe of all sorts of Come, and the Clergie gaue him a new tenth.

Iohn of Gaunt Parliament Westminster.

Immediately after Easter, the Earles of Saliburie and Suffolke, being accompanied but with a few men gaue an allault vnto the Towne of Lile in Flanders, which Towne was confederate with the French King, but they chasing the Frenchmen to farre within the gates, the Portcolices being let fall, they were beset with a multitude of men of armes, and being taken, they were conueyed into France, fettered and hackled with yron, although they had sworne to bee true Prisoners: they were drawne in a Cart through the middest of euery Citie, Towne, village and hamlet, with great howles and cryes, raying on them: and at length being brought to the presence of the French King, he would haue most shamefully slaine them, had he not beene otherwise perswaded by the counsell of the K. of Bohemia.

The seuenth day of May the King gaue to William Marquesse of Iuliers, and to the heires of his body, the Earledome of Cambridge, with the Towne and castle, and twentie pounds by yare in fee, and created him at Westminster by the girding of a sword, whereof he also made him his charter with the gift of one thousand poundes yearely rent.

King Edward, kept his Whitsontide at Ipswich, for that he intended from thence to take his passage into Flaunders, but being certified that the French King had sent a great nauie of Spanish shippes, and also the whole fleete of France, to stoppe his passage, hee caused his shippes of the Cinque Ports and other to be assembled, to that he had in his fleete great and small two hundred and thzescore ships.

Wherefore on the Thursday before the Nativitie of Saint Iohn Baptist, hauing a prosperous wind he began to saile, and the next day in the euen of the said feast they descried the French fleete lying in Sloine hauen. Wherefore the King caused all his fleete to come to anker.

The next day being the feast of Saint Iohn Baptist, early in the morning, the French fleete diuided themselues into three parts, and remoued themselues as it were a mile, approaching towards the Kings fleete.

Which when the King perceiued, about nine of the clocke, hauing the wind and sunne on his backe, set forward and met his enemies as he would haue wished, wherewithall the whole fleete gaue a terrible showte, & a showe of arrowes out of long wooden bowes so powred downe on the French men, that thousands were slaine in that meeting, at length they closed and came to hand blowes, with pikes, polaxes, and swordes, and some threw stones from the tops of ships wherewith many were brained.

The greatnesse and height of the Spanish shippes caused many Englishmen to strike many a stroke in vaine. But to be shoze, the French shippes being ouercome, and all the men spent of the first part, the Englishmen entred and take them.

The French shippes were chayned together in such sort, that they could not be separated one from another, so that a fewe Englishmen kept that part of the fleete: wherefore they set vpon the second warde, and with great difficultie gaue the charge, which being done, was soone ouercome then the first, for that the French men leauing their shippes, many of them leapt ouer boord.

The Englishmen hauing thus ouercome the first and second part of the fleet, and now hauing night drawing on, partly for want of light, and partly for that they were wearie, they determined to take some rest till the nexte morning, wherefore that night thirtie shippes of the third ewe fledde away, and a great ship called the Iames of Dieppe, thinking to haue carried away a certaine ship of Sandwich belonging to the Prior of Canterburie was stayed, for the Sailers so stoutly defended themselues by the help of the Earle of Huntingdon that they saued themselues, and their ship from the Frenchmen. The fight continued all the night, and in the morning the Normans being ouercome and taken, there were found in the ship foure hundzeth men slayne. Moreouer, the King vnderstanding that thirtie shippes were fled, hee sent foztie shippes well appointed to follow them, ouer the which hee made Iohn Crabbe gouernour, but what good speede he had is not knowne.

In the first company of shippes that were taken they found these conquered shippes, the Denis the George, the Christopher, and the blacke Cocke, all which shippes were taken by the Frenchmen at Sluce, and caried into Normandie.

The number of shippes of warre that were taken, was about two hundzed, and thirtie barges: the number of enemies that were slaine and drowned were aboue fiue & twentie thousand, and of Englishmen about foure thousand, among whome were foure Knights Sir Thomas Mortimer the Kings cosin, Sir Thomas Latimer his sonne, Sir William Butler of Scotthorne, and Sir Thomas Poynings.

About the same time the Scots came with a great power into England burning & spoyling all the Parches by fire and sword, and when they were returning with a great bootie of cattell, the common people set vpon them, tooke their booty, slew many of them and tooke moze then fourescoze Scots of good reputation whom they kept for ransome, for the which fact the Noblemen of the Parches were highly displeased.

The French pyrates assault the Ile of Wight.

About Lammas certaine French pyrates gaue an allault to the Ile of Wight & Sodaine, ly entred it, but sir Peter Russell Knight, meeting them with the people of that Ile, put them back againe, and made them to flee, slaying many of them, in the which skirmish the said Knight was wounded, whereof he dyed. These pirats sayled thence toward the coasts of Deuonshire, and comming to Teignmouth, they set fire on the Towne and burnt it vp: from thence they sayled towards Plimouth, which towne was so defended, that they could not hurt it, but burnt the farmes and faire places nigh adioyning, and tooke a Knight prisoner, whom they tooke along with them.

King Edward besieged Cowrie.

The same yere King Edward besieged Courney, but vpon intreatie made by the French, a truce was taken from Michaelmas till Midsummer, whereofore the King coming to Gaunt in Flaunders, staied there looking for money out of England, which came not.

King Edward returned secretly into England, and remained there two Monthes.

King Edward with eight of his men, fayning that hee would ride abzoad for his pleasure, secretly came into Zeland, where taking shippe, after hee had sayled thzee dayes and thzee nights, on S. Andrewes day at night about the houre of the Clocke crowing, he entred the Tower of London by water, being waited on by the Earle of Northampton, Nicholas Cantilopo, Reignald Cobham, Cobham, Giles de Bello Campo, John de Bello Campo Knights, William Killesby, and Philip Welton preests: early in the morning he sent for his Chancellour, Treasurer, and Justices then being at London, and the Bishop of Chichester being his Chancellour, and the Bishop of Couentry his Treasurer, he put out of Office, mynding also to haue sent them into Flaunders, to haue borne pledges for money he owed there: but the Bishop of Chichester declared vnto him what danger might ensue to him, by the Canons of the Church: whereupon the King dismissed them out of the Tower: But as concerning the high Justices, to wit, Iohn Lord Stoner, Robert Lord Willowby, William Lord Scharshell, and especially Nicholas de la Beech, who before that time was Lieutenant of the Tower of London, and Sir Iohn Molens Knight, with certaine Merchant men, as Iohn Poulney, William Poole, and Richard his brother, and the Chancellours chiefe Clearkes, to wit, Maister Iohn de Saint Paul, Michaell Wathe, Henry Stafford, and certaine of the Exchequer, as Maister Iohn Thorpe, with many other more, the King commaunded to be imprisoned, some in one place, some in another, neyther would he suffer them to be discharged thence, vntill he were throughly pacified of his anger conceiued for not sending the money which should haue serued at the siege of Tourney.

Wil. Poole and Richard his brother.

This yeare about Christmas, Henry Bishop of Lincolne, and Geffrey Lord Scrope, chiefe Justice to the King and his chiefe Counseller, dyed at Gaunt.

Anueg. 15 King Edward kept his Christmas at Wilsford, and after that a great Justing at Reding.

Justing at Reading and at Langley.

Also at Candlemas, he kept a great justing at Langley, for the honour of the Noblemen of Walconia, which he trayned vp there in feates of warre. He made Robert de Bourlier knight, Lord Chancellour of England, and Robert Parnike knight Treasurer, the one to succeed the other. Also hee sent out Iusticiers that should sit in euery Shire, to inquire concerning the Collectors of the tenthes and fifteenths and of Woolles, and to ouersee all Officers. And because the Cite of London would not suffer that any such Officers should sit as Iustices within their Citie as inquisitors of such matters contrary to their Liberties, the King prouided that those Iustices should hold their Sessions in the Tower of London, to make inquisition of the damages of the Londoners: but because the Londoners would not answere there, vntill their Liberties were fully confirmed, neyther any such confirmation could be had eyther of the King, or his Chancellour touching Writs and Charters in the Tower, there rose thereof such a great tumult, that the Iustices appointed there to sit, 1341. fained that they would hold no Session, till after Easter. Whereupon the King being highly offended for the said tumult, and desirous to know the names of them that had raysed it, could not vnderstand but that they were certaine meane persons, who claymed their liberties: wherevpon the King being pacified of his troubled minde, forgaue all the offences committed by the Londoners, the Iustices breaking vp all their sitting touching the said place.

Justice of Cattle-bastion forbidden to sit in London.

This yeare within the quindene of Easter a Parliament was holden at London, where in the Carles and Nobles of the Realme, with the Commons requested, that the Charter called Magna Carta, and Carta Foresta, with all other Liberties belonging to the Church and Kingdome should be obserued, and that the Officers and chiefe Rulers of the Kings house should be chosen by the Peeres of the realme, in the Parliament: But these petitions the King would not confirme, nor could abide to heare talked of. Parliament at London.

About the beginning of the moneth of July King Edward, receiued Letters from Lodowicke Duke of Bauary, vsurper of the Romane Empire, in the which pretending friendship betwixt him and Philip the French King, hee signified that those warres which the King of England had begun in France did greatly mislike him, and therefore desired that there should be concord and amitie betwixt the Kings of both realmes; the which to be performed, he offered to bestow some labour, requesting King Edwards letters of authoritie thereof, to treate and to conclude a truce for one yeare or twaine, toward the end of which letter hee addeth these words: The deputation and lieutenantshippe which wee gaue vnto you, wee doe for diuerse and sundry causes reuoke againe. Dated at Frankford the fourteenth of June in the seuen and twentieth of our raigne, and of our Empire the foureteenth. To the which letters King Edward wrote an inscription, in soste as followeth.

To the renowned Prince Lodowike, by the grace of God Romane Emperour, alwaies Augustus, Edward by the same grace King of France and England, Lord of Ireland &c.

King Edward kept his Christmas at Kenington besides Lambeth. Anuegist 1342.

This yere Iohn Maluerne, Fellow of Oriall Colledge in Oxford, made and finished his booke intituled, The Visions of Pierce Plowman.

King Edward gaue the Earledome of Cambridge to Iohn of Henault, vncle to Queene Phillippe, and after kept his feast of Saint Katherine at Newcastle, and his Christmas also. Vntill this time Dauid King of Scottes threatned to leuie an armie, and to enter the land, whereupon King Edward entred Scotland, and followed after Dauid, who fledde before him beyond the Scottish Sea, wasting and spoyling all as hee went, except Castles and Parishes, in the which the Scottes together with Dauid their King hid themselues. And William Mountacute Earle of Salisburie, hauing gotten a great fleete, entred an Iland belonging to Scotland, where most victoriously hee conquered it, and the same Ile called T. de la Moor made Earle of Cambridge. W. Montacute Earle of Salisbury.

tailed the Ile of Man, the King gaue it to the Conqueror frankely and freely to be possessed, and caused him to be called and crowned King of that Ile. Then King Edward returning towards the South parts, kept solemne turnements at Dunstable, being accompanied with two hundred and thirty Knights. Conquered & crowned King of Man.

The same yeare was a Parliament at Westminster, wherein the Archbishop of Canterbury, was reconciled to the King, before whom the Archbishop swore, that although the King by his counsell and consent had done homage to the French King for the Dukedome of Aquitaine, and the Earledome of Poytow, yet he neuer consented thereto as to be any hurt or prejudice to the King, or that by his counsell he might incurre fauour, or seeke to please the French King, but for that present time hee thought it best to be done, both for the obtayning of peace, and also for the profit of the King and Realme. Parliament at Westminster.

After this Parliament the King commanded florences of gold to be made at the Tower of London, that is to say the peny of the value of fiue shillings eight pence, the halfe peny of the value of three shillings foure pence, a farthing worth twenty pence. Florences of gold.

In a Parliament at Westminster, in the moneth of May, the religious men that were possessours of Lands, granted to the King, towards the maintainance of his warre, all their Iewels and Plate, as well siluer as gold, horses carts and waggons, wherevpon the Kings treasure was notably enriched. Anuegist 1343.

The same yeare authority was giuen to the Kings Ecclesiastors, to enquire and certifie the Councell of all such persons, which held of the King any lands in capite, or by any other fee, to the value of one hundred shillings, and that the names of all such should be enrolled and giuen vp for record. Also certaine other were put in authority to signifie how many sufficient and able bowmen were in euery Shire: also to what other sufficient men were able to beare armour for the defence of their Country, and to see them practised with such kind of weapon wherein they had best skill: and being thus assembled in all parts of the Realme, specially such as were at lawfull age, commandement was giuen out, they should be ready at the Kings commandement to fight against their enemies. A generall Lore by the Kings prerogatiue of England.

King Edward and his nobles perceiuing the derogation that was done to the Realme by such reseruations, prouision and collations of benefices, as the Pope practised here in England, wrote to him, requiring that sith the Churches of England had beene founded and endowed by noble & worthy men, to the end the people might be instructed by men of their own land, and that he being so farre off, could not vnderstand the defaults, yet his predecessours, and he more then had beene vsed by diuers reseruations, prouisions, and collations made to diuers persons, some strangers, yea, and some enemies to the Realme, whereby the money and profits were carried forth, their cures not prouided for, according to the founders minds, they therefore vpon due considerations signified to him, that they could not suffer such enormities any longer, and besought him to reuoke such reseruations, prouisions and collations wholly to auoyd such slanders, mischiefes and harmes as might ensue, and that the ayres might be committed to persons meet for the exercise of the same, beseeching him further without delay to signifie his intention, with they meant to bestow their diligence to remedy the matter, and see that requeste might be had. Giuen in full Parliament at Westminster, the eight teenth of May, in the yeare of our Lord 1343. Pope Avesbu-Gualt Hegelword:

Many being called to ayde the King against the Scots, but not being ready, contributed their money, wherewith the King might hire Soudiers in place of them that remained at home. This yeare saith one written booke in French, King Edward held a great Feast at Windsor of 300. Knights, and as many Ladies, with great outrage of expences and costs.

King Edward caused to be called together a great many of Artificers, to the Castle of Windsor, and began to build an house which was called the round Table, the forme whereof, from the Center or middle point into the compasse, was an hundred foote, and the whole Diameter two hundred foote, and the circumference thereof is fiue hundred foote and three quarters. Anuegist 1345. T. Walsingham. Round table at Windsor.

The same time Philip de Valoys King of France, builded a round Table in his Countrey, to the end that he might allure the men of Warre of Germany and Italie, and so to keepe them from the King of Englands round Table. Round table in France. Sea. Abbey that land, the King of England had made a Generall ouer the Armie of the Englishmen, fought so long with hand stroakes in the field that day, that no man but a liar could giue anoze praise to the one then to the other. Three times that day they being wearied on both sides, withdrew themselues to take breath, and then fell to it againe with speare and shield, and sword and target: but in the end the right worthy and Noble Charles de Bloys, his men fleeing away, was also forced to yeeld himselfe, whereupon after many flame on both sides, the victory fell to the Englishmen.

King Edward in succour of Iohn Mountfort Duke of Britaine, and of his wife and children, who then remained in the Kings custody, sent the Earles of Northampton, and of Oxford, Hugh Spencer, and Richard Talbot knights, and Maister William Killesby Clarke, euery one of them hauing vnder them many men of Armes and Archers, into Britaine, who entred therinto, in despight of all their enemies which resisted them, making many conflicts. They tooke as well walled Townes as other, with diuers fortresses and Castles, both by assault and surrender, by which meanes they had the whole Countrey vnder their subiection, conquering till they came to the Towne of Nosiels, where Charles de Bloys met them with a great Army. Therefore in the champaine ground nigh vnto Nosiers, the two Armies made a great and most stout battaile, wherein the worthinesse of both sorts did full well appeare: for they fought so stoutly, that in the first conflict it chanced as the like had not beene seene: for the chiefe Captaines Charles de Bloys to whom the French King had giuen the Dukedome of that Countrey, and William de Bohurr Earle of Northampton, who for the defence of the right of Iohn de Mountfort, naturall heire and Duke of that T. de la Moor Battaile at Nosiers.

An. reg. 19 King Edward sent ouer Henry Earle of Derby, sonne to the Earle of Lancaster his cousin, with more then fiue hundred men of armes, amongst whom was the Earle of Pembroke, and Walter de Many, with many Archers into Gascoigne, with Ralph Baron of Stafford Seneschall of Gascoigne, who being come thither, the said Earle made fiftie Knights of his Army, and after won many walled Townes and Castles, making many worthy skirmishes, and at length won the Towne of Dagulowne by assault, to the keeping whereof they appointed Ralph Stafford, afterward they appointed three iourneyes toward other Townes, as especially to Bigorreche (so called for the strength thereof, and also called the Chamber of France) and also to the Towne of St. John de Laurell, and to many other great and strong Townes well fortified, which with great toyles and diuers dangerous assaults they won: where the Earle of Derby and his soldiers vndermining the Towers and Walls of the said towne were very soze assaulted by them which defended it.

R. Avesbury. 1345.

Thus he conquered Cities, townes, Castles and fortresses, to the number of one hundred and fiftie, bringing a great part of Gascoigne vnder subiection, euen to Tolouse, vnto the which City he did no damage, neyther to the inhabitants thereof, but that he made the wonderfully afraide: as certaine of them told me (saith mine author) their feare was such, that the religious people were constrained to beare armour, and the Prior of the Carmelite Friers of our Lady of Tolouse, hauing a banner of our Lady in gold set in a field of siluer, displayed the same, prouoking thereby many to take armour.

T. de la More.

About the second Sunday in Lent the Earles being fully fraught with botty, prisoners, gold and siluer, they returned towards Burdeaux, where John de Valois, eldest sonne to the French King, being accompanied with a great number of hired Dutch Souldiers, besieged the Towne of Agnilowne, and the Captaines thereof the Earle of Stafford and other, so entrenched the same Towne, that without great danger the Englishmen could haue no accesse vnto them, but the Earle of Derby beate away them that besieged the City and destroyed new victualled the same: notwithstanding they were not able to raise the siege, because they had so intrenched themselues without the Towne, who refusing to fight in the fields, would answere, they came not to pitch a field, but to besiege a Towne, wherefore they continued the same siege vntill the decollation of Saint Iohn, but vnderstanding then that the King of England chased his Father Philip very soze to Crecie, and fearing that he should come very late to the ayde of his Father, hee gaue vp the siege, setting all his Tents on fire, and fled in the darke, but the Earle of Stafford with his power pursued them, cut off their taile, took a great many of their horses, and returned.

After this certaine Botwmen are mustered in England, appointed to be sent ouer sea, who comming ouer are layd in garrison for defence of the Country. Also twentie thousand sacks of woollare granted to the King. Boyecour of Bouchegrau Geffrey de Harecourt a Normain, came to the King, requiring ayde against the French King, who wrongfully withheld his lands from him: at his first comming he did fealtie, and sweare homage to King Edward, but afterward he reuolted.

20000 sacks of wooll granted to the King.

Richard de Bury deceased at Aukland, when he hadde late Bishoppe of Durham eleuen yeares, two moneths, and odde dayes, and was buried at Durham: vnto whom succeeded Thomas af Hatfield the Kings Secretary, by meanes of the Kings letters to the Pope: And when certaine of the Cardinals said, that the said Thomas was a light person, and a lay man: the Pope answered, truely if the King of England at this time hadde made his request for an Asse, hee should haue obtained it. But Richard Bury in somewhat to bee remembred for example to other, hee was borne neare Saint Edmundsbury, by his Father Sir Richard Angarvill Knight, and his vncle Sir Iohn Willoughby his gouernour, hee was first set to Grammer Schoole, and after sent to Oxford, from whence he was called to teach Edward of Windsore then Prince: afterward this Richard was made principall receiuer to Edward the second in Gascoigne, at such time as young Edward with his Mother fled to Paris, whose expences beginning to faile, the said Richard came to them priuily with a great summe of money, for the which cause he was pursued to Paris, where he lay hid in a Steeple by the space of seuen dayes. After this hee was made Cofferer to Edward the third, then Treasurer of the Wardrobe, then Clarke of the Pinne Seale by the space of fiue yeares, in the which time, twice hee went to Pope Iohn. In the fiue and fortieth yeare of his age hee was consecrated Bishoppe of Durham, then was he made Treasurer of England, and after Chancellour, since the which time hee was sent thaile to the French King to claime the Kingdome of France, and after that, to Antwerpe and other places in Brabant in Embassage by the space of nine yeare he was greatly beloued in the company of Clearkes, and had alwayes many of them in his family, among whom were Thomas Bradwardine, afterward Archbishop

At other times he was occupied, either in seruice of God, or at his Bokes. Weekly he bestowed for the reliefe of the poze eight quarters of wheat made into bread, besides the ozdinary fragments of his house. Boyecour, in comming and going from Newcastle to Durham, he bestowed sometimes twelue Markes in almes, from Durham to Stockton eight Markes, from Durham to Auckland fiue Markes, from Durham to Sydeham an hundred shillings, &c. He was so delighted in Bokes, that he had more (as was thought) then all the Bishops of England besides, he bestowed many rich ornaments on the Church of Durham, he builded an Hall or house in Oxford, induing it with reuenewes neerhull for his Schollers. And also prouided in a Librarie great store of Bokes, for the vse of the whole Vniuersitie, as the said Bishop witteth himselfe in his booke entituled, Philobiblon, and appointed the Maisters of the Hall to attigne fiue Schollers for keeping of the common Library, &c.

Scots entred England.

This yeare the Scots, to the number of thirtie thousand, William Dowglas being their Leader, entred into Westmerland, and burnt Carleile, Penreth, with many other Townes, whereof the Bishoppe of Carleile, with Thomas Lucy, Robert Ogle, and a great number compassed them in the night season, and with lights and noyse so disquieted them, that they neuer durst goe out for victualles, nor giue their bodies to sleepe, but at the last Alexander Scragan stoutly prepared to goe out for victualls, whom the Bishoppe and Robert Ogle met, and with a Speare thrust him through the body, so that the Scottes were some after ouercome and slaine.

Chapleines to the Bishop of Durham, and their exercise.

1346. King Edward prepared to make a voyage into Normandy, his Nauy being ready to tran- spoze him from Portesmouth and Portchester, with the Earles of Northampton, Arundell, Warwike, Harecourt, Huntingdon, Drenford, and Suffolke, the Bishop of Durham, and Sir Walter William Killesby Clearke: euery one of these leading a great Army of Souldiers well appointed, were imbarqued, and waited for the Winde, from the first of June, to the fifth of July, and then hauing a good Winde, they began to make saile with the same number of one thousand Shippes of burthen and Pinaces, and on the thirteenth day of July, they landed at Hogges in Normandy, where on the Shoze of the Sea, King Edward, made his eldest Sonne Knight, and also Prince of Wales, and immediately the Prince made Knights, Mortimere, Montacute, Role, and other.

King Edward passeth into Normandy.

The Kings sonne made Prince of Wales is apparently by his Parent that he was made Prince of Wales and Earle of Chester the 3. yeare of this fathers raigne.

That night the King lodged in the Towne of Hogges, and the next day the Towne was burnt by the army.

Hogges in Normandy burnt.

The night following King Edward lodged in Percels, where he stayed fiue dayes, during which time, all the Country, with the Towne of Barbefleete, was by his men confumed with fire. From thence they departed to Meloigus, which they set on fire: then they went to Senetcomb de Mount, which is nigh the Sea, and to Garantam, thence to Serius and to Saint Lewes, passing along vnto the Towne of Tourney, wasting all with fire, and that night the King lodged at Carmaline; then to Cerine, being a Religious house belonging vnto Cane, leauing nothing behind them vnspoyled.

Afterward they made an assault and entred the City of Cane, making their entrance by a bridge which was strongly defended.

Cane in Normandy besieged by Edward the third.

There were slaine an hundzeth 3. and fourty Knights, among the which was taken the Earles of Eye, and Camberlin de Tankeruill, with diuers other captaines, and of them of the Citie, were slaine aboue one thousand three hundzed.

At this City the Army remayned 6. dayes, and the spoyle thereof they sold to those Marriners which followed the Coast as the R. went. Then they went to the Monasterie of Sprouard, a very strong thing and well defended. Afterward, they came vnto Argons by night, burning still as they went, till they came to the Citie of Litens, where they found the Cardinals of Clarimount, and of Naples, and one Archbishop, who offered the King a treaty of Peace, and there the king continued three dayes, refusing to treat of Peace. Then they went to Lakentnolaud, and to the Towne of Bzine, and lodged at New Burge, and after at Selesele vpon Sayne, and there the Wellshmen swum through the water of Segan, and being resisted by the inhabitants, they slew many of them. Then they passed nigh nigh to the towne and castle of Mount Darch, being strong places and not assaultable. This night he lodged at Ruy vpon Segan, nigh vnto the good Towne of Louers, which they vnburne. After, the passed by the Towne and Castle of Gaion, which they take, and burnt, and lodged at Lingeux, which is nigh the good Towne and Castle of Vernon, which they touched not, and there they first entred into France, and the same night they burnt the Castle of Roche-Blanch, which standeth on the other side of Segan, and lodged at Frenible vpon Segan. After that they passed by the Towne of Haunt, lodging that night at Dopme. On ynert day they passed to Frigmas, and the next day to the good Towne of Poeete, where being a bridge to passe ouer the Riuer of Segan, the French had spoyled it, but the King caused it to be redified: and the next day they came to Amias, where were thre Armies appointed to keepe the King from passing that way: but hee slew thre hundred of them at the first charge, put the residue to flight, and spoyled their tents, burning thre hundreth and two Carts and Wagons laden with Crosbowes, quarrels, Armour, and victuals: the King staying there two dayes, they went to Oresile nigh vnto Pountoys, then to Antell: the next day they passed by the Citty of Wenoys, which they touched not, and so by Trosolours at the water of Some, where they lodged.

The next day they won the towne of Poys, and burnt the Castle. From thence they went to Aregnus, then to Acyen, where they lodged. The next day they came to Doell vpon the sea side, the Frenchmen of Dabuile and the Countrey came to the fords side to hinder their passage, with whom the King had a sore conflict, but the enemies were put to the worse, and more then two thousand slaine, and the towne of Croytoy taken and burnt, and aboue thre hundred Germaines slaine.

The next day they followed the King on the Riuer of Some, and on the banks side (where the King with his horse were lodged) came trauailing Philip de Valoys the French King, with the Kings of Boheme and Malegre, leading an Army of men innumerable, diuided into eight great battailes. King Edward sent to the French King, offering him free passage ouer the ford, if he would come and chuse a place apt to fight a field in, but this Philip went to another place of passage.

On the morrow King Edward removed to Oresfield, where the army of the French king met him. The King therefore set his Sonne the Prince of Wales to gouerne the vaward. The middle ward the Earle of Noath-hampton. The third hee tooke to guide himselfe.

The Armie of the Frenchmen were diuided into nine Troupes. The vaward was committed to the King of Boheme. The French King commanded his banner called Auntiflame to be set vp, after which time it was not lawfull vnder paine of death to take any man to saue his life.

This banner, that it might differ from his standert, had in it Lilies of gold very broad.

On the other side, King Edward commanded his banner to be erected of the Dragon, which signified fiercenesse and cruelty to be turned against the Lillies.

These Armies being thus appointed, lay in the field from one of the cloche vntill the Euening. About the Sunne setting, after the Armies had ioined, they began by the sound of Trumpets to giue signe of battaile, but they themselues felt the force of the English Archers, and as for their quarrels, they fell short a great way. Moreouer, their footmen being placed among their owne Horsemen, were by them (when they were gauled with English shot of arrowes) ouerrunne and troden vpon, that a great outcry was made as it were to the starres, and the whole forme of the array was broken, and they fighting with the English armed men, are beaten down with polaxes.

In this so terrible a bickering, the Prince of Wales being then but fiue teene yeares old shewed his wonderfull towardnesse, laying on very hotly with speare and shield. This battell dured thre parts of the night, in the which time the Frenchmen gaue fiue great assaults against our men, but at the length they being conquered, ran away.

On the morrow there came foure Armies of fresh Souldiers to the French side, and making semblance as though their part had suffered no harme, they came against the Englishmen, and gaue them a freely battaile. On the other side, the Englishmen withstood them very stoutly, and after a sharpe Conflict they forced their foes to flye, and in chasing of them together with them that were slaine in the conflict, they slew thre thousand men in the said two dayes. There were slaine in the battaile of Cressie, the Kings of Boheme and of Majorica, the Archbishop of Zanrinus, the Bishop of Noyone, the Dukes of Loraine and Burbon, the Earles of Alanson, Harecourt, Awmarle, Sauoy, Nois, Pountbilliard, Niuars, and of Flanders, with the grand Prior of the Hospitall of France, and 4000. men of armes beside common Souldiers without number.

The third day after, King Edward passed by the Abbey of Pountney, and the next day they came to the towne of Pountney, and from thence to the Nunrie of Saint Ioice, and after they passed ouer a ford, and came to Newcastle, where they stayed two dayes, and from thence they came to Caleis, which presently they entrenched to besiege, being the fourth day of September.

The French King in this meane time sent a number of Genowayes, and other hired Souldiers, vnto David King of Scottes, earnestly requesting him, that hee would inuade England with all his force: wherefore about the 7. of October, hee with a mighty power entred England, passing along by Berwike, which was strongly defended by the Englishmen, and so ranging ouer the forest of Alnewike, they wonne a certaine Mannor place called Haden, belonging to the Lord Walter Mannie, who yeelded himselfe on condition to be ransomed, where (Selby a knight being seruous by law of armes to saue his life) he was taken, which when it was knowne to David, he commanded him to be slaine: but Selby intreated for him, that he might be brought aliue to the presence of David, who hauing obtained his request, hee falsely downe before David, requesting his life for ransome, but hee was againe adiudged to die. The malice of the tyrant was such, that hee commanded two of the children of the poore Knight to be strangled in the sight of their Father, and afterwards himselfe being almost mad for sorrow, was beheaded.

From thence the Scots passing forward, wasting along the Countrey, wherein were many Mannors belonging to the Bishoprick of Durham, and comming within two miles of Durham, they take certaine of the Monkes which they kept prisoners for their ransome, making couenant with the residue, for a certaine summe of money and corne to redeeme their Mannors from spoyling. The English men of the Marches hearing before the face of the enemy, William de la Zouch, Archbyshop of Yorke, Vicegerent to the King in the Marches, calling together the Bishop of Carleile, the Earle of Angusie, the Lord Mowbray, the Lord Henry Percy, the Lord Ralph Nevell, Roger Hastings, with all their ayde, together with the archers of Lancashire went towards the armie of the Scots, and on the Euen of Saint Luke, met them at a place called Newye Parke, neare Neuils Crosse. The Scottish nation not accustomed to fight, withstood them stoutly, and hauing head-peeces on their heads, and targets on their armes, passing fore vpon the Englishmen, they abode the brunt of the Archers: but the men of armes which were in the foreffronts, gaue their enemies many deadly wounds. The Marshall of the Scots, Earle Patrike, who had the charge of the rereward, when he perceiued his men to be beaten down, he fled away with other that were privy to his cowardlinesse: hee being fled, the residue of the Scottes continuing faithfully with their King, stood about him like a round Tower, keeping him in the middle, who so continued till there were scarce forty of them left aliue, of the which not one of them could escape aliue.

At length David their King valiantly fighting and sore hurt, an Esquire of Northumberland, named Iohn Copland stoke him, who with eight of his seruants rode Thwart out of the field with the King, and so rode fifteene leagues from that place, to a Castle called Dagraise, the residue about him being taken or slaine, the Englishmen pursued the chase after them which were fled, slaying and taking them as farre as Mardiholm and Cockridge. In this great battaile were taken David de Bruse King of Scottes, the Earle of Pentife, the Earle of Fife, the Lord Malcolin Flemming, the Earle Wirton, William Dowglas, William de Leminge stone, Walter de Halliburton, John Dowglas, David de Anade, John de Saint Clere, William Mowbray, David fitz Robert, William de Ramsey, Adam Moygne, John Steward, Roger de Kirkpatrike, John Hume, and William Morrey Knights, James Sudeiflowre, James Loren, Henry Delker, Baronets. There were slaine in this battaile, the Earle of Mosse, the Earle of Straterne, also Alexander Stragy, Iohn de Halliburton, Henry de Ramsey, Nasoe de Ramsey, Adam Nilkenfor, Thomas Boid, Iohn Stiward, Allan Stiward, David de la Hay, Edward de Keth, John Crawford, John de Kindesley, Philip de Maldren, Henry Ramsey, Alexander Morrey, Humfrey de Boys, Gilbert Inchmarter, Robert Maltallent, and his brother Humfrey, Kirkepatrike, John Stange, and Patrike Hearing Knights. There were many slaine in the chase, but there were no more coate armours found in the maine battell then we haue reckoned.

This battell was fought on the seauenteenth of October. The prisoners were conueyed to London about Christmasse, David de Bruse except, which might not trauaile by reason of two deadly wounds in his head with arrowes, but the second of January hee was brought vp, and conueyed from Westminster to the Tower of London, in sight of all the people, and there lodged in the blacke noake of the said Tower, neare to the Constables guard, there to be kept. About the feast of S. Mathew the Apostle, the Earle of Fife was at London drawne, headed and quartered, his head set on London bridge, his quarters set vp in foure parts of the Realme.

John Copland, that take David de Bruse King of Scots at the battaile of Durham (for so it is called in the Record) for his seruice King Edward made him a banneret, and gaue him for his maintainance in that state, fiue hundred pounds by yeare, after this manner: to wit, foure hundred pounds out of the Custome of the Citie of London, and one hundred pounds out of his custome of the Towne of Barwike vpon Twide, vntill such time as fiue hundred pound lands by yeare were giuen to him and his heyres for ever. And more for his good seruice with one hundred men of armes, one hundred pound the yeare out of the custome of the Kings port of Newcastle vpon Tine till the said Iohn had purchased for him and his heyres one hundred pound land by yeare.

While these things were done in England, the King was busied at the siege of Caleis, which Towne was situate in the Marches of Artoys, being closed about with a double Wall and a double Ditch, hard on the shore of the English Sea, right ouer against the Castle of Douer. And there is belonging to the same Towne an Hauen, wherein shippes may lie very safe without danger. This towne was sometime with the Castle thereof very stronglie built by the force and valauntnesse of the Romains, for after that Iulius Cæsar had brought all France vnder his subiection, hee built Calcis in Artoys, and the Castle of Chepstow in Venedocia, or Southwales, and the Castle of Douer in Kent, what time hee hadde conquered Brytaine, (as saith mine Author.) King Edwa dealt a Ditch about his Campe, and layd his Nauy of Ships against Calcis hauen, to the intent that the Frenchmen should make no inuasions vpon his Souldiers, neyther they within receiue any victuals by water. The Norman Pyrats at sundry times tooke fiftene of his ships, whereof some of them they carried away for their owne occupying, the other they burnt, and Sir Thomas Hacluit with Sir William Borton Knights, as they were sayling into England, were taken Prysoners on the Sea. King Edward hauing fortified the siege, lay without giuing any assault, knowing that it was not possible to fight with his enemies, without great losse of men, considering the depth of the Ditches, and height of the Wals, neyther would he erect any engines against the Towne, for they wanted firme ground whereupon to place them. Besides that, if hee should beate downe the Walles, yet were the Ditches so deepe, and full of salt water let in on euery side, that they were able to withstand all the world, with little strength and defence. On that side of the Towne on which the Souldiers were wont to victuall Calcis, that is along on the Sea side, and especially when the Shippes could not bee suffered to passe the Sea, but alongst the shore with small boates, the Earle of Northampton made a Rampire, wherewith hee kept away, and beate backe such boates; and afterward, when the Admirall of France hadde purposed to come with his Ships of Warre to fight against our English Shippes that lay at the siege, thinking that in the meane time whilest they were fighting, the small boates should passe to Calcis with victuals, the said Earle of Northampton meeting with him valauntly, put him to flight.

This siege during in such sort, from the feast of the Natiuity of our Lady, all the whole Winter, with a great part of the summer, and still waxing stronger and stronger. And monday next after the Feast of Saint Iames, the French King came to the Castle of Guisnes, with his eldest sonne Iohn, and the Kings sonne of Boheme: and a great power to haue remoued the siege from Calcis. Also the Emperour (promising by oath, that he would remoue the siege either by Warre or peace, or at the least, he would victuall them that were besieged) came with his Army towards the English Campe, and lodged scarce a mile from thence, requelling by Messengers a treatie of Peace. Hee sent the Duke of Detenes, and the Earles of Bulone and Darminake, who parlying with the Duke of Lancaster, the Earles of Northampton and Huntington, touching a truce, could not obtaine their consent, where, vpon after they had exercised a little warlike iusting, they returned to their Tents.

The French King came to raise the Siege of Calcis.

The second day following, the French king offered the king of England a day of Battaile, which the King on certaine conditions accepted very gladly. In the meane season, they which were besieged, made knowne their Rate to the French king by signes and tokens, for at his first comming, they within the Towne set vp his Ancient on the chiefest Tower of the Castle, and also they set out banners of the Dukes and Earles of France, and a little after the shutting in of the Euening, they made a great light on the top of one of the highest Towers, which was towards the Army of the Frenchmen, and therewithall they made a great shoute and noyse with Trumpets and Drummes. The second night they made the like, but somewhat lesse. The third night, a very small fire, giuing forth therewith a sorowfull voyce, signifying thereby that their strength touching the keeping of the Towne, was quite spent and done. And the same night they tooke in all their flags and Ancients, except their Standard. At the last, the day of battaile drew on, against which time, there came out of England and Dutchland, toward the helpe of King Edward 7000. fighting men, whereupon the French King betimes in the morning on the second day of August, making fire in his Tents, fled, whose taile the Duke of Lancaster and Earle of Northampton cutting off, they slew and take many of them.

When they of Calcis perceiued this, they take their Standard downe, and with great sorowe cast it from the Tower downe into the Ditch, and on the Saterday following, Iohn de Vienna their Captaine, a man very skilfull in warlike affaires, opening the Towne, came out to the King of England, sitting on a little Nagge, for that he being lame on his feete, could not well goe, with an halter about his necke, with the other Burgesses and souldiers following on foote, bare headed, and bare footed, hauing halters about their neckes.

The other how Calcis yeelded.

The Captaine comming thus before the King, offered him a warlike sworde, as vnto the chiefest Prince of armes amongst all Christian Kings, and as one that had taken that Towne from the mightiest Christian King by noble Chiualry. Then he deliuered to him the keyes of the Towne. Thirdly, he requesting of him pitty, asked pardon. and deliuered him the sword of Peace, wherewith he should giue right iudgement, spare and forbeare the humble and lowly, and chasten the proud hearted.

The King receiuing that which was offered him, sent the Captaine with fiftene Knights, and as many Burgesses into England, enriching them with large guifts. The common sort of people, and such as hee found in the Towne, being somewhat refreshed with the Kings almes, he commanded to be safe conducted to to the Castle of Guisnes.

After the taking of the towne of Calcis, the Souldiers at the kings commandement take the Hauen of Marke and of Hoy, and with great difficulty they built in them Forts, setting in other where walles wanted, Hoggesheads filled with stones against the enemies, whilest the wals were a building within. Immediately after the taking of Calcis, there began in those parts a generall pestilence of the fire, comming from the East parts, into many other parts of the world, whereupon it came to passe, that a great multitude of people dyed. This pestilence gaue occasion that certain Cardinals were sent on the behalfe of the French King, to craue a truce from that time, vnto the Feast of Saint Barnabe next following, which was agreed vpon on the eight and twenty of September.

Bloudy flixe.

The truce being taken as afore is sayd, King Edward built a Castle at Risbanke, betwixt the Towne of Calcis, and the Hauens mouth, to the intent to keepe off all the enemies force of Ships, from the said Towne: and he made Captaine of the towne Sir Iohn Mongomery. And thence comming the Quéene and his eldest sonne, with a great company of noblemen, he take his journey towards England by water, and being on the Sea, he was beaten with such a Tempest, that he lost many of his Shippes, and hardly escaped himselfe, notwithstanding hee came on land the fourteenth of October, and so to London.

King Edward returneo from Calcis into England, not without great danger of drowning.

An. reg. 22. This peace being made, it seemed through England as a new Summer had followed, because of the plenty of all things, for there was no woman of any name, but she had some of the prizes of Caue and Calcis, or of other cities beyond the Seas, whereof the matrons being proud did brag in French matrons apparell.

Commodities of Peace.

1348 At the Feast of Easter, Iames Dowglas, who was taken at Durham in the Warres, and brought to London with the King of Scots, was licenced to depart home againe, swearing to the King peace and fealtie, who afterward liuing peaceably in the Marches, and being requested by William Dowglas to ride a hunting with him, was by him comming behind his backe most trayterously slaine.

After Easter, the King held a councell, wherein it was decreed, that none of his seruants should take vp any victuals of any man against his will, nor but that he payd for it ready money, vpon paine to be punished and banished the Court. Richard Talbot high Steward of the Kings house, being appointed to see execution of that proclamation.

The Earle of Stents was racked, arraigned and conuicted, for that contrary to his faith and homage he swore to the King of England, he did against him beare armes against him, and for that fact he was drawne, hanged, and quartered. To this councell came two Earles, and two Clearkes sent from the Princes Electours, signifying that their Election was made to the King, for the dignity of the Kingdome of Almaine. These Messengers the King receiued with due honour, but answered them, that he would not take so great honour vpon his shoulders, vntill he had the Crowne of France, due vnto him, in peaceable possession.

The King Edward ejected King of Almaine.

A little after Easter, there were great Iusts Iusting at holden at Lincolne, by the Duke of Lancaster, Lincolne. father, where were present many Ladies, with the Countesse and also certaine Messengers sent from the King of Spaine, for the Lady Iane daughter to the King, that should be married to their master the Kings sonne, whom her husband meeting, the dyed of the great pestilence, so that he followed her to the graue.

The same yeare, King Edward with his eldest sonne, the Earle of Warwike, and the Bythop of Winchester, went to Calcis, from whence the King sent the Duke of Lancaster to Denemere, to receiue in his behalfe fealtie and homage of the Earle of Flanders, which thing was by the said Earle performed. Iohn Stratford Archbishop of Canterbury deceased vnto whom succeeded Iohn Vffard Doctor of Law.

There began amongst the East Indians and Tartarians a certaine Pestilence, which at length waxed so generall, infecting the middle region of the Ayre so greatly, that it destroyed the Sarracens, Turkes, Syrians, Iacobites, and the Gaetans, with a wonderfull, or rather incredible death, insomuch that those peoples being ereeedingly dismayd with the terrour thereof, consulted among themselues, and thought it good to receiue the Christian Faith and Sacraments, for they had intelligence that the Christians which dwelt on this side the Caspian Sea, were not so greatly (more then the common custome was) troubled with sickneese and mortality. At length this terrible slaughter passed ouer into those Countries which are on this side the Alpes, and from thence to the parts of France, which are called Hesperia, and so by other along into Germany and Dutchland. And the seuenth yeare after it beganne, it came into England, and first beganne in the Coastes and Ports ioyning on the Sea coasts, in Dorsetshire, where, euen as in other Countries, it made the Country quite voyde of inhabitants, so that there were almost none left aliue.

From thence it passed into Deuonshire, and Somersetshire, euen vnto Wilshire, and raged in such sort that the Gloucestershiremen would not suffer the Wilshire men to haue any accesse vnto them or into their Countrey by any meanes: but at length it came to Gloucester, yea and to Oxford, and London, and finally it spread ouer all England, and so wasted and spoyled the people, that scarce the tenth person of all sorts was left aliue: when Churchyards were not sufficient and large enough to bury their dead in, they chose certaine Fields appointed for that purpose.

haye, who serued in company of Henry Duke of Lancaster in his great acts of Gascoigne and Guyen, after this time made a Knight of the Garter in England, hauing a respect to the danger that might fall in time of this Pestilence then begun in England, if the Churches and Church-yards in London might not suffice to bury the multitude, he purchased a peece of ground called Spittle Croft (for that it belonged to the Master and brethren of S. Bartholomew Spittle) containing 13. acres and a rod, without the barres of West Smithfield, and caused the same to be inclosed and dedicated by Ralph Bishop of London, in the which place in the yeare following, was buried more then fifty thousand persons, as is affirmed by the Kings Charters which I haue seene, and also by an inscription fixed on a stone crosse in the same place. And in memory hereof, the same Gualter Mainy caused vpon the same ground a Chappell to be builded, and founded the same to be an house of Charter house Monkes, in the yeare 1371.

Also about the same time, one John Cory parsonne of Nicholas, Prior of the Church of the holy Trinity here vnto Aldgate, one foot of ground neare vnto Salt Smithfield, for the buriall of them that dyed, that it might be called the Church-yard of the holy Trinity, which ground he caused to be enclosed, and dedicated by Ralph Stratford Bishop of London, in the which place King Edward the third, by consent of the said Prior and Couent, founded the Abbey of S. Mary of Grace in the yeare 1359. placing therein an Abbot and Monkes of the order of Cisteaux, which were white Monkes, and named the place Tall minster.

Very few Noble men dyed, among whom departed Iohn Montgomery, and his Ladie: the Lord Clifford Captaine of Caleis dyed at Calcis, and was buried at the white Friers at London. Of the common people, together with Religious and Clearkes, there dyed an innumerable sort, for no man but God onely knew how many. There dyed from the first of January, to the first of July, in the City of Norwich 57104. persons, besides Ecclesiasticall Mendicants and Dominikes. There was buried in the Church and Church-yard of Parmouth, in one yeare 7052. men and women, before which time the Parsonage there was worth seuen hundred markes by yeare, and afterwards was scarce worth forty pound the yeare. This note was certified to King Henry the seuenth in the 22. of his raigne, and the same is written on the gates of the Church of Parmouth. This great pestilence began at London about the Feast of All Saints, in the yeare 1348. What time this Pestilence had wasted all England, the Scots greatly rejoycing, mocked and sware oft times by the vile death of the Englishmen: but the sword of Gods wrath slew and consumed the Scots in no lesse numbers, then it did the other. It also wasted the Welshmen, and within a while passed ouer into Ireland, where it destroyed a great number of English people that dwelt there, but such as were right Irishmen borne, that dwelt in the hilly Countries it scarcely touched, so that few of them dyed thereof. This Plague continued some time in one place, sometime in another, vntill the yeare of our Lord 1357. the same yeare for a [illegible] all peace to be concluded, the Bishop [illegible]rdwich, the Earle of Northampton, the Earle of Stafford, Richard Talbot, Walter Mayny knights, sayled ouer the Sea into France, whom the Frenchmen met peaceably, but they would not agree to a finall Peace, vnlesse that Caleis were restored to them againe, which would not be granted: and the Truce which was taken for a yeare was so continued. But the Earle of Flaunders, who would not in any case receiue conditions of Peace, vnlesse the French King were quite forsaken, notwithstanding his solemne oath, not long after entred into Flaunders with a great power of Frenchmen, burning and killing where euer he came: but the people of the Countrey with a few Englishmen withstood him stoutly, and gaue him a sore skirmish, in the which, beside that many Frenchmen were slaine, the Earle himselfe was forced to flye, for the which worthy act, many knights were made, amongst the which was Iohn de Filebert, an English man.

In the Feast of the Nativity of S. Iohn, the Queene was purified at Windsor, where were solemne Iusts, and running at the Tilt, at the which, Dauid King of Scots was present, and the Earle of Ewe, the Lord Tankervil, Lord Charles de Valois, and many other strangers captiues, who by the Kings licence were permitted to run also at the Tilt, at the which passtime, the praise of the field was adiudged to the Earle of Ewe. After in Summer season, these strangers passed their time in hunting, in the company of the King, and other Nobles of the realme, at Clarington in Wiltshire nigh Salisbury, and in diuers other Forests.

Whiles the King was thus occupyed, the Frenchmen notwithstanding the Truce, entred the Parishes of Brytaine, but the townes of Sabater, with a few other, who went out a foraging, tooke Thomas Dagworth knight, a man of great experience, who but with a few men, to wit, fifteene armed men entred the Wood against these Robbers, and inuaded them, slaying to the number of three hundred, but at the length being stricken fiue times in the face with quarrels, all his men being first slaine, he himselfe was thrust through the body with a sword.

About the Feast of Saint Michael, more then 120 persons of Scaland, and Holland, coming through Flaunders into London, sometime in the Church of S. Paul, sometime in other places of the City, twise in the day, in the sight of all the people, from the loynes vnto the heeles, couered in linnen cloth, all the rest of their

The same yeare the Earle of Lancaster, the Barons of Stafford and Greylocke, also the heires of the Lord Percy and Neuell, and the Lord Furnuall with Bartholomewe Burwash, and diuers other, about the feast of all Saints, passed ouer sea into Gascoigne to delay the furious proyse that Iohn de Valois son to the French King hadde made in that Dukedome, greatly spoyling and wasting the same. Also the Kings councell ordained, that none of the Kings iustices during the time of their offices, should receiue any fee, gift, or reward of anie man, except it were of the King himselfe.

Also this yeare in the Countie of Deuonshire nigh vnto a Towne called Chippingmorton, there was found a serpent hauing two heads, and faces like women, one being shaped after the newe type of that time: another after the manner of the ould attire, and it hadde greate wings, after the manner of a Flindermouse or Batte. Thomas Bradwarden Archbyshoppe of Canterburie deceased, Simon Islip succeeded.

Thee tenth of September this yeare 1349. there hapned a great Earth-quake in Italy: & other kingdomes, but especially in Ieal, where it was so violent, that in Rome it threwe down many houses, and part of castles, steeples, and Churches, and in Naples it threw downe parte of the Archbishoppes Church, and many other stately buildings of that citie, it also ouerthrew many strange Towers and goodly Pinnacleries, the citie of Aquila at this time was almost quite destroyed, by reason it ouerthrew most of their Churches, and chiefe buildings, and did therfore more slaughter of people then in any other particuler place, the citizens and strangers durst not stay day nor night in their lodgings nor houses, but kept themselues in the wide market-places, or open fields during the fury of this strange Earthquake, which continued full eight dayes space, and was oftentimes so extreame and terrible in diuers places, that people were not able to stand vpon their feete vpon plaine ground, it did so much spoyle vnto Churches, Castles, Towers, Pinnacleries, and other lofte buildings, that the ruines thereof in many Prouinces are very sufficient testimonies vnto this day. Also at this time there was an vniuersall Pestilent plague throughout the world, and such as were infected the eleuenth, began to spit and vomit bloud, and so dyed sodainely or within two or three dayes space: this cruell pestiferous mortalitie began in the yere 1346. and continued vntill the yeare 1350. this is the third vniuersall Plague that hath hapned since the deluge, as you may read a little before, and in the yere 1352. the famine began to be wonderous great in Barbary & Morocco, whereupon many Christian Nations vpon hope of inordinate gaines carried thither so much Coyne, that the famine became farre greater in Italy, France, Spaine, and other Prouinces of Europe, so as at the most there was but three ounces of bread a day to be allowed for a man. And presently after this, there hapned as well in many Christian Nations as otherwise, many Inundations, with strange flouds and tempests, and after vniuersall plagues vpon the world by sinne.

A great famine

Strange fruits and tempests.

This calamitable time was com monly called the Company, and one of the best conuersations was to France, Spaine, and Italy. and attempting English men to perfourme the like outrages in Lombardy, where they were ouerthrowne, Iohn Acute alias Iohn of the Gules, as the Italians called him, a famous man at armes was an Englishman, and one of their cheefe, valiantest and most expert Leaders. Of this time and of the valiant actes and fortunate Conquests of King Edward, and of his sonne the blacke Prince, the Chroniclers of Germany, Italy, France, and Spaine, haue written farre more plentifully and pleasantly then the English, expressing in grad termes the excesse of sinne of all kindes and of all degrees of people in France, as Pride, vsure, symonie, &c. and how GOD did therefore visite them with sundry punishments, as by Plague, famine, ciuill dissention, drought, and by bringing in vpon them a small Nation, to conquer and commaund them, when they held themselues secure, and in all conditions strong, and able to resist and inuade the whole world.

Wonderous dreadfull mortalitie of bleeding to death.

The French Chronicles record that this yeere 1349. at Auignon in France, there was so extreame, strange, and terrible mortalitie, that the people died bleeding at nose, mouth, and fundament, and the riuers ran with bloud, and that from the graues and Sepulchers of the dead there issued streames of bloud: this mortality and other Gods visitations for sin, was foretold thirtie yeares past by Fryer Robert a Iacobin, who plainely told them GOD would shortly punish the Cleargie, for their pride, symonie, sloath, and Courtoulines.

King Edward saileth towards Flaunders.

About the feast of All Saints, K. Edward being accompanied with the Earles of Lancaster, and Suffolke, and diuers others, passed ouer the Seas into Flaunders, and thence leading his army towardes France, the French men made meanes vnto him to renue their truce: and now the Earle of Flaunders submitted himselfe the third time vnto the Kings mercy and dominion. When the King returning toward England, to solemnizate the translation of Saint Thomas the Confessour and Bishop of Hereford, did with his presence and Nobilitie honour the same, to the great expences of Nicholas Carnulopus Baron, and cousin to the sayd Saint Thomas: during which feast and solemnitie, it was signified to the King by the Secretaries of Emericus of Padua, who was a fede man to the King of England, that on the fourteenth day of January next comming, Geffrey Charney Knight, and many other Frenchmen should be receiued into Caleis, vnto whom the sayd Towne was sold by the said Emericus: but the Towne being presently resaued by King Edward, the said Emericus of Padua with other Genowayes continued in Caleis, being maintained there at the costs of the French King against the King of England, when he besieged it, who also after the yelding of it to the King of England, being pardoned both of life and limbe, from thencefoth continued and dwelt as a fede man of the Kings in the said towne for the defence thereof. At that time the said Geffrey was L. of Patas, a man more skilfull in warfare then any French man in France. Wherefore he was greatly esteemed, euen to the time of his death. This craftie deuiser indeuoured by his letters, wherein he made promise of large gifts of gold, and other sophisticall perswasions, quite to subuert the faith and loyaltie of the said Emericus.

Caleis like to haue beene betrayed.

Finally, this craftie deuiser agreed with this false man, that for 20. thousand French Crownes he should let in the French men to the Towne, and as much as lay in him, deliuer vp to the French men both the Towne and Castle. This bargaine being most traiterously made, by oath and breaking of the Sacrament betwixt them, yet all this notwithstanding, he wrote letters vnto the King, touching the state of the whole matter, but very priuily, how that he was ready to shew friendship to the French men, yet meaning to make frustrate their purpose, whereby they should be conuicted of breaking the truce, and also many of them should be taken to be ransomed: wherefore King Edward sperily passed ouer, being accompanied with his eldest sonne, the Earle of Marth, and a few other, comming before the time appointed for the yelding of y towne certaine dayes. Therefore being come to Caleis, he layd certaine men of armes within the Vaultes which were betwixt the outter gate and the inner part of the Castle, building a thinne and slender wall before them newly set vp, noe made of playster, but of counterfeit matter, which ioyned to the other wall, craftily deuised and made like the old worke, so that no man would iudge that any were enclosed therein.

Also, he caused the maine postes of the draw bridge to bee sawed almost in sunder, yet in such sorte, that armed Horse men might ride ouer it: and for the purpose hee hadde a great stone, which was laide vppe in a hole made in forme of an Arch, being in the forepart of the Tower hanging ouer the Bridge, in which hee appoynted a faithfull Souldier should bee in due time to throwe downe the said stone vpon the bridge, that with the fall thereof, y Bridge being halfe cutte in two, should bee broken in sunder, and so that hole where the stone was laid, should be wrought in such sorte, that hee within should perceiue throughly the hole how many did enter in: fewe were made priuie to this practise, neither did many knowe of the Kings presence or of the Prince of Wales, who when they had wrought this feat, secretly conueyed themselues into the towne.

The day before the time of deliuerie of this Towne, Geffrey Charney sent fiftéene of his faithfullest men with the greatest parte of the goulde which was to be payde, who should also trie the faith of Emericus, and the order of the Castle; who searching euerie where, in euery Tower and corner which they could find open, could perceiue nothing contrary to their liking; whereuppon on the next day in the morning, they set vp the French Kings Standarde in the highest Tower of the Castle, and the ancients also of Geffrey, and of the Lords vpon the other Tower

Towers and places. Then the people of the Towne who kept common watch and ward, not knowing of this secret deuise, were greatly terrified therewith, in so much that they taking weapon in hand, began to giue a charge against the Castle: by and by the French men who had entred the day before, take Thomas Kingstone, then fleeing away, quite ignorant of that which was deuised, and forceably they set him in the stockes. Then certaine of them being sent out to the Frenchmen their companions and maisters, who lay without in ambushes, shewed them the auauncents and standard set vp, and all to be well, euen as they would haue it, hastening them forward to come to the defence of the Castle, against the townes men: wherefore they rising from their lurking places, aduanced themselues in pride and bragging, and came by heapes in at the gates of the Castle. The townes men perceiuing this, had much adoe to forbeare their handes from them, had not their cheefe leaders withdrawne them from it, least some danger should haue happened to them that lay hiddie and by those that lay hid closed vnder the Arshes of the walls, prepared themselues to breake out vppon their enimies. In like sort also he that with the great stone was shut vppe in the hole, after that he saw so many entred in, considering that his fellowes were sufficient to ouerthrowe them, with that great stone put to his cuttoby he brake the drawe bridge, by y which the enemies had entered in, but beeing once in could not goe that way out againe: when the stone was thus downe, and had discharged the thing for the which it was laid vp, the French men deceaued by that pollicie, they were inclosed safe enough. At the noyse of this stone, and the bridge that brake, these armed men of who before I spake, breaking downe their counterfaite wall, behinde the which all the deceite was hid, they presently set themselues in order to inuade the French men, bidden to a bitter breakefast. The conflict was sharpe for a good season, but at the length the enemies beeing ouercome, yelded them selues to the pleasure of the Conquerours. They which were without and had not entred, as soone as they perceiued their companions to be deceiued, fled, after whom the King with scarce fiftéene men of armes & as many Archers followed apace: the runawayes not knowing what company would follow them, many in this chase were wearied, and many more slaine, and in a small time the King ouercame dangerous and great labours: but at length, when it was vnderstood by them that fled, how fewe there were that chased them, fourescore armed men turned them against the King. I dare not ascribe this T. de la More. boldnesse of the King in chasing of his enemie, to his wisdome, but onely to the stoutnesse of his mind, the which is well knowne through Gods grace to be brought to good effect by his meanes, though y danger were neuer so great: for when he perceiued that the French menne had turned themselues to withstand him, hee cast away the seabard of his sword, and comforting his menne about him, setting them in good order, exhorted them to play the menne lustily. The Archers being placed in the marish against the sides of the enemies, stood on bye hilles, which were compassed about with quagge myres and foggie places, that neither Horse men nor foote men might approch them, but they should rather be drowned in mud then come neere to hurt them: these also did y King comfort, saying to them (doe well you Archers) play the men lustily, and know that I am Edward of Windsore. Then y presence of the king, and necessitie of the matter, stirred vp their hearts to doe well: the Archers vncouering their heads, stripping vp their sleeues, bent themselues to bestowe their arrowes in such sort that they might not bee lost: and as the French men drew towards them, they sauted them after with their arrowes. The armed men of both parts stood in order to fight vpon a long and narrowe causeway, y breadth whereof was not able to receiue scarce twentie men of armes in a front, hauing on both sides thereof the Marish, in the which the Archers were placed, who galled and wounded their enemies on the sides, fleeing as thicke as haile. The king and his men beeing with his archers on the side, slew and take a great manie: and manie of them stode stoutly to it, till at the length by the comming of the prince of Wales the French were put to flight: after a long chase in pursuing the enemyes, they returning backe againe to Caleis, numbred those which were fled, as well as those which were taken, and they found, that for the taking of the Castle (as the prisoners reported) there came a thousand men of armes, and fiue hundred armed men, but they which serued, were about three thousand: among them which were taken, was Geffry Charney, and his son, Edward de Renty, Robert Danquile, Otto de Grilo, the Baron of Stactingham, Baldina Sailly, Henry de Piees, Garinus Baylofe, Peter Renell, Peter Dargemole, Eustace de Riplemount, and many other, Lords, Knights, and Baronets, who were chased and ranne away with their auncients, as the Lord de Moonmarice, also Launday, who married the Lady Saint Paul Countesse of Pembrooke in England, also the Lord Fenas, the L. Plancke and another Eustace de Riplemount. There were slaine in the skirmish the Lord Henry de Boys, the Lord Archibald, and many others, whose names the Conquerours were not able to certifie. Thus by pollicie and deuised treason, the authors thereof came to death and destruction: neither Eustachius himselfe escaped scotfree from his snares, for hee within a while after being taken by the French men, was burned aliue with a hot yron, and degraded from the order of knighthood, by the cutting of his spurs from off his heeles, and depriuing of his tongue by abscision: afterward, hee was hanged vp, and last of all beheaded and quartered, receiuing iust punishment for his treason and false forswearing. An. reg. 24 1350 enterprise vpon his enemies, was taken prisoner in Gascoigne. Not long after King Edward prepared to make a voyage into France, but the Earle of Lancaster, returning out of Gascoigne, signified that there was a Truce taken by him, by reason whereof, the passage prepared by the King was laid aside.

In the Summer following, variance rising betweene the fleets of England and Spaine, the Spaniards beset the Britaine Sea, with 44. great ships of warre, with the which they smitten English ships comming from Gascoigne towards England, after they had taken and spoyled them, and thus their former iniuries being reuenged, they entred into Sluce in Flanders.

King Edward vnderstanding hereof, furnished his Nauy of fifty Ships and Pinaces, forecasting to meet with the Spaniards in their returne, hauing in his company y Prince of Wales, the Earles of Lancaster, Northampton, Warwike, Saltsbury, Arundale, Huntington, Glocester, and other Barons and Knights with their seruants and Archers, and vpon the Feast of the decollation of S. Iohn, about Euensong time, the Nauies met at Winchelsea, where the great Spanish vessels surmounting our Ships and Foysts, like as a Castles to cottages, tharpely assailed our men, the stones and quarels flying from the tops, sore and cruelly wounded our men, who no lesse busie to fight aloft with Launce and Sword, and with the forward manfully defend themselues, at length our Archers pearced their Kybalisters with a further reatch then they could strike again, and thereby compelled them to forsake their place, and caused other fighting from the hatches to shade themselues with tables of the Ships and compelled them y threw stones from the tops, to to hide them, that they durst not shew their heads, but tumbled downe: then our men entring the Spanish vessels with Swords and Halberds, kill those they meet, within a while make voyd the vessels, and furnish them with Englishmen, vntill they being beset with darknesse of the night, could not discerne the 27. pet remaining vntaken: our men cast anker, studying of the hoped battaile, supposing nothing finished, whilest any thing remained vndone, dressing the wounded, throwing the miserable Spaniards into the Sea, refreshing themselues with victuals and slepe, yet committing the vigilant watch to the armed band. The night ouerpassed, the Englishmen prepared (but in vaine) to a new battaile, but when the Sunne began to appeare, they viewing the Seas, could perceiue no signe of resistance, for 27 ships flying away by night, left seauenténe spoyled in the Euening, to the KINGES pleasure, but against their will.

Philip French king dyed

This yere Philip de Valoys the French King, deceased, and his eldest sonne Iohn was crowned.

Combat to fore King Edward.

Two hyred souldiers of the King of Armenia, came into England, into the presence of the King, where they shewed the letters of the foresaid King of Armenia, wherein it was signified that the one of them, to wit, Iohn de Viscount, a man borne in Cipres, had slanderously charged the other, that is, Thomas de la March, a French man borne, and Bastard sonne to Philip late King of France, saying that the said Thomas should haue receiued of the Turkes, a certaine summe of gold, for the betraying betraying the army of the Christians vnto the Emperour of the Turkes: and for the proofe of this slander, this Iohn challenged a combate with the said Thomas, to be tryed by the iudgement of Edward King of England, and that by him (as by a most worthy Prince) all strife should be ended. For this therefore were these 2. worthy souldiers appointed to fight, which they performed within the lists of the Kings pallace at Westminster, on mundayuent following after the feast of Saint Michael, where Thomas, in declaration of his innocency, in that he was accused of, ouercame his enemie, but yet killed him not, for he could not, because he was not able to wound him being so armed with any kinde of piercing weapon, except it were in his face, which was bare. For after that they had runne at the Tilt, and fought on foot, as they were running together on the ground with certaine pikes both short and sharpe, then called Gadlings, being closed in the ioynts of his right gauntlet, the said Thomas stroke the said Iohn in the face, and sore wounded him: but on the other side Iohn had no such short kinde of weapon, wherewith hee might hurt Thomas face, and therefore cryed out aloud most horribly, whereupon by the Kings commaundement the Combate was ended, and the victorie adiudged to Thomas, who gaue the said Iohn, being thus ouercome to the Prince of Wales for a Captiue, and offered vp his owne armour to Saint George, in Saint Pauls Church at London, with great deuotion. These matters being thus finished, the Cipres man is manumitted and set at liberty as a free man againe. And Thomas thinking boldly to goe into the presence of his brother the French King, tooke his journey thither, and at his comming, found the said King and the Nobilitie of France, greatly offended, and in indignation against him, for that hee agreed that the combate should be tryed before the King of England. Wherefore Thomas thinking secretly with himselfe how to winne the false friendship of his brother, being desirous to shew that therein hee had done well, among all other things he greatly praised the Nobility of Edward: his worthy fame spread ouer all the world, and also the iustice which hee vsed in iudging, not accepting the person of the man of Cipres, (yea though he loued the King himselfe very well) neither suffered him to bee preferred before mee, which am a French man, and brother, and friend to thee my Lord King of France, iudge ouer the said King Edward my aduersary. Also the Earle of Ewe highly praised the King of England, for that he had receiued great comfort and commodities at his hands during the time of his captiuitie in England, shewing also how farre that good King had banished enuy and hatred from his heart, who at a time of iusting, being in the field at that exercise, and the King also, was commanded by the K. himselfe to beare away the prize and pack from them all. These commendations did the French King enuie at, and for indignation, hee most wickedly commanded the setters forth of those praises to be beheaded. And for to colour the matter the better, hee fained that the Earle vsed too much familiaritie with the Queene his wife, and that his brother was guilty of treason against the King of France, because he committed his cause and the combate to bee thus tryed by the iudgement of the King of England. After hee had thus murthered his brother, he tormented his wife to death by famine, who was daughter of the Noble King of Boheme, lately slaine in battell by Geffrey.

Groates and halfe groats.

William Edington Bishop of Winchester, and treasurer of England, a wise man, but lo, using the Kings commodity, more then the wealth of the realme and common people, caused a new coyne called a Groate, and halfe Groate to be coyned: but these were of lesse weight then the pence, called Sterlings, by reason whereof victuals and merchandize became the dearer thorow the whole realme.

T. Walsingh. Historia Aurea

Parliament at Westminster. 1351.

After the Octaues of the Purification of our Ladie, in a Parliament holden at Westminster, Henry Earle of Lancaster was created Earle of Lincolne, Leicester, Derby, Grosmount and Ferrers, and Duke of Lancaster, vnto whom also was giuen great priuiledges, such as neuer any Earle had before his time. Also Lionel of Antwerpe the Kings sonne is made Earle of Vlster in Ireland, Iohn of Gaunt his brother is made Earle of Richmond, & Ralph Baron of Stafford, is made Earle of Stafford. Iohn Mautrauers, one of the murtherers of Edward the second, was this yere restored to his lands.

In the Lent following Walter de Maine, and Robert Herle Captaine of Caleis, rode into France, making great preyes and doing great damage, brought away great store of beasts, Sheepe, and Swine, so that at Caleis a fat Cow was scarcely sold for fiftene pence sterling. About Easter the Duke of Lancaster departing from Caleis marched alongst the sea coasts of Artoys and Picardie, burnt the suburbes of Bulloigne, but assaulting the towne he preuailed not, for that onely the ladders were too short. Therefore he wasted the Cities of Turwin, and the hauen, also the townes of Faconbridge and Staples, and in the same hauens hee brent about 120. Ships of diuers moulds. After this burning the Champion countrey, he rode vnto Saint Omers, and winning by force many fortresses, with a great prey and many prisoners he returned to Caleis. About the feast of Saint George things prospered well in Gascoigne, for the Marshall of Frauunce, with a great number of armed men spoyled the Countrey about Saint Dangel, where Edmond Rose a Norfolke man was Captaine, who with the Garrison, valiantly encountred the enemies, slew many of them, and take the said Marshall and many other Nobles of France, chasing aboue 400. knights.

A fat Cow fiftene pence.

The same yere the Spanish ships by a treaty of peace came into England, where the last yere they were restrained, but now a truce was was taken for xx. yeares, betwixt England and Spaine, and a time betwixt England and France for one yeare, which the Frenchmen brake, by reason of taking the Castle of Guisnes, as in the next leafe shall be shewed.

About this season the olde coyne of golde was changed into a newe, the olde Noble was worth much above the rated rate of the newe, and therefore the Marchants bought the olde and conueyed them out of the Realme, to the great losse of the king & kingdome, to the which there was a remedie pounded, by changing of the stampe.

Anno. 26. 1352. About the beginning of January, the French men being occupied about the repayring of the wals of Guisnes towne, being afore that time destroyed by the Englishmen, some menne of armes of Calais vnderstanding their doings, deuised how they might ouerthrow the worke, in this sort. There was an Archer named Iohn Dancaster, in prison in the Castle of Guisnes, before that time taken, who not hauing wherewith to pay his ransome, was let lose, with condition that hee should worke there among the Frenchmen. This fellowe chanced to eye where beyonde the principall ditch, from the bottome of the ditch, there was a wall made of two fote broade, stretching from the rampiers, to the brimme of the ditch, within forth, so that being couered with water it coulde not bee seene, but not so drowned, but that a man going aloft thereon, should not be wette past the knees, it being made for the vse of Fishers: and therefore in the maydest it was discontinued for the space of two fote: and the Archer (his Harlot shewing it to him) measured the height of the wall with a thread. These thinges thus knowen, one day slipping downe from the Wall, he passed the ditch by that hidden Wal, and lying hid in the marish till euening, came in the night nere vnto Calais, where tarrying for the cleare day, he then went into the towne (for else he might not) there he instructed them that were greedie of prey and to scale the Castle, how they might enter the same, they caused ladders to be made to the length by the Archer appointed. Thirtie men conspiring together, clothing themselues in black armour without any brightnesse, went to the castle by the guiding of the said Iohn de Dancastre, and climing the wall with their ladders they slew the watchmen, and threwe them downe headlong beside the wall: after this, in the Hall they slewe many whome they found vnarmed, playing at the Cheese and Hazard. Then they haste into the Chambers and Turrets vppon the Ladies and Knights that lay there asleepe, & so were made masters of all that was within: & shutting all their prisoners into a strong chamber, being bereft of all their armor, they toke out the English-men that had bene taken the yere before and there kept in prison, and after they hadde relieued them well with meate and drinke, they made them guardeins ouer them that had them in custodie: & so they wan all the fortresses of the castle, vnknowne to them that were in the towne, (appointed to ouersee the repayring of the broken walls) what had happened to them with in the castle. In the morning they commanded the workemen in the towne to cease from their worke, who thereupon perceiuing that the castle was wonne, strait-waies fledde, and the newe Castellans suffered the Ladies to depart on Horsebacke, with their apparell, writings, and Gunniments, where they ought to hold their fees: and the same day there came from Calais to their ayde such persons as they sent for, by whose ayde they kept the Castle: and about 3. of the clocke there came 2. Knights, sent from the Earle of Guisnes, who demanding a truce, willed to know of them that were thus entred the Castle, who they were, to whom they belonged, and by whose authoritie they kept the castle so taken in the time of truce: whereunto they answered; that being intruded, they would not declare to any man their purpose, till they had tryed a longer possession: and therefore on S. Maurice day, the Abbot (the king being busie in Parliament) to the Frenchmen being sent from the said Earle of Guisnes, declared, how in preiudice of the truce, the said castle was taken and therefore by right of mutuall faith it ought to be restored vnto them. The king answered, that without his knowledge that enterpraile was made, and therefore hee gaue commandement to his subiects, that none of them should deteine the Castle of Guisnes, but deliuer it vnto the lawfull Lords thereof. The messengers being returned home, and reporting what they had done, the Earle of Guisnes commeth to the Castle, demanding of them within, as at other times, in whose name they kept it. Who constantly affirming that they kept it in the name of Iohn Dancaster, hee required to know if the same Iohn were the king of England, liegeman, or would obey him: who answering that hee knew not what messengers had beene in England: the Earle offered for the Castle, besides all the treasure found in it, many thousands of crownes, or possessions for exchange, and a perpetuall peace with the king of France. To this they answered, that before the taking of that Castle they were Englishmen by Nation, but by their demerites banished for the peace of the king of England; wherefore the place which they thus held, they would willingly sell or exchange, but to none sooner then to their naturall king of England, to whom they said, they would sell their Castle, to obtaine their peace: but if he would not buy it, then they would sell it to the king of France, or to whomsoeuer would giue most for it.

The Castle of Guisnes gotten by the English.

The earle being thus shifted off from them, the king of England bought it indeed, and so had that place which he greatly desired: whereupon king Iohn of France, charged the king of England to haue broken the truce: vnto which king Edward answered, saying that he had done nothing against the truce, nor against any article thereof, because (quoth he) there is not any article that prohibiteth trafficking together, ther, or intercourse of Merchandize. The Fortresse was went to stop up the Passage into the higher Countrey, giuing to some great hurety from the Foragers, that were to issue forth of Calais. The Councell of France therefore wishing to haue that Castle againe, or to build another of like vtility for the defence of the Countrey thereabouts, they sent for Geffrey Charnie late preferred out of English captiuity, with authority to build and fortifie as followeth.

Balbasty fortified.

To them that trauaile from Guisnes to Calais, there was a place on the left hand strong, but decayed, hauing a Church, in which certaine Nuns were resident, and it was called Balbastie: this place was soneare to Guisnes, that the Englishmen hauing without the gate of their fortresse might shut to it. This Monastery of Nunnes might easily be made defensible, for it had high Walles like a Castle, and a high Tower, and very large for a steeple, and being situate in a marish ground, it might with small labour be compassed with a Ditch. This place the Englishmen had spared for deuotion sake, vntill that the foresaid Geffrey in breach of truce, with a mighty power besieged Guisnes, and removed the Nunnes from the Church, making a Castle of the Church, and fensing the Walles with Rampire and ditch: and this was about Pentecost, in which season the waters not impeaching him, his people might worke in the Marish. They within the castle therefore being besieged were vnneth able to come abroad with their Boates by the ditches that were full of water, for the marish vnpassable and also full of Water, neyther they of Calais could vnto them by any manner of meane, by reason of the siege and warding that was kept at Balbastie. They that were thus besieged, oft times sallyed out and fought with them of Balbastie, but fewe by few, sometime with arrowes, and sometime with other weapons: at length, vpon a day appointed, the Caitifians, with them of Dye, and Markes on the one part, and they within Guisnes on the other part, metten at their enemies, slew many, chased many, & finally burnt vp Balbasty, & dismantling the walles, made all plaine with the ground.

Balbasty burnt and raced.

This yeare the Duke of Lancaster going into Spaine, by the aduise and ordinance of the King, his daughter was espoused in England vnto William Duke of Zeland, eldest Sonne to Lewis Duke of Baiure, that intruded vpon the Roman Empire.

Walter Bentley and Robert Knolles make a voyage into France.

About the fifteenth of August, Walter Bentley Captaine, Robert Knolles, and other, in the Marches of Britaine, valiantly encountred their enemies, where in a fight doubtfull for a good while, were slain the principall Marshall of France, also the Lords of Quintyn, of Curignole, of Richmont, of Mount Albon, of Legeuel, of Launoy, of Montbech, of Vile Chastel de la March, and other Knights, in number 120. and Bachelers, to the number of 500. Who coate armours were brought away: the number of commons were not counted. There were taken the Lord of Rusebeke, son of the Marshall Bertram, also Lodwike de Maleis, the Lord of Haletret, the Viscount of Comaine, Geffrey de Graues. With many la Vall, Charles Dorchefil, Ioan de Blare, and other Knights, with Bachelers aboue 130. This Army of the French-men, vnder the conduc of the said Marshall, of purpose deuised by him, was so beset on the backe halfe, with the trayncsse of a Mountaine, that hee they could not, to the end that hope of flight being taken from them, their courage to fight might y more encrease. There were many of those Knights surnamed of the Starre, who in their yeares of Knights of the Starre. on had conspired neuer to turne their feasefull backes vpon their enemies, of which number of knights, there were among them slaine and taken, numbred 45. From that dangerous encounter scaped vnhurt, and among other, the foresaid Walter Bent, Captaine was foze wounded, who commanded 30. Archers to be condemned, for that in the greatest heat of the fight they fled.

The Castle of Stafford also entred into Gascoigne, where encountring with a great Army of the French-men that were clued with the Fortresse of Gagent, he discomfited, tooke, and chased them: there was taken that valiant Knight is the Gaude and seuen knights of the Starre. Shortly after, died Iohn de Charsfeles, and Thomas Wale, Knights of great valour.

The same yeare, it being heard that Pirats troubled the Seas, there were seauen Ships of warre ordained, certaine Pinaces, attending vpon them: ouer the which were Admirals, Tho. Cooke, & Richard Totesham Knights, who secured the seas about y coast of Picardy and Normandy, but before the Feast of Saint George, they returned as they wished.

Whilest these things were a doing by Sea and Land, Otto sonne to the Duke of Bunis with chain wike, the French Kings feed man, sent letters geth to combat to the Duke of Lancaster, being returned out of Spruce, by the tenor whereof he accused him, before the affirming that as hee returned out of Spruce French King by Colein, he maliciously informed the Colo- at Paris. ners, that the said Otto went about by stealth to haue taken him prisoner, & to haue presented him to the French king, adding hereunto that because he neuer meant any such taking of him he was ready in declaration of his good name, by a singular combat only in the French kings Court, to proue the Duke of Lancaster a lyer touching the said Article. The letters were not sealed, and therefore, least it might haue beene thought folly to haue giuen credit to the letter, deliuered by a Seruant, the Duke sent vnto Otto two Knights to learne the cause of the chalenge, and to demand thereof his letters patents, sealed with his seale of armes, which knights accomplishing the effect of their iourney, and returning with speed the Duke sent to the French king for a safe Conduct for himselfe and his men, and with much adoe obtayning it, hee went to Paris, where in the Lists, in presence of the French King & the the King of Nauarre, and the Duke of Burgoine, with many Peeres, and other of the Realme of France, he mounted on his steed in armour, ready in all things, without delaie to trie the combat, and so stood till his aduersarie was ready, and the voyce of the Herault and Canton to be had by their common oath, for the assurance of his word, and to obey the Law. On the contrary side, the said Otto scarcely was set on his horse, and was not able decently to set on his helmet, and to weld his Speare (verie hardlie) whose inableness being perceiued by the French King, the King of Nauarre, and other, the King tooke the quarrell into his hands, whereupon Otto was commanded still to depart the lists, and so went his way, but the duke abode still within them.

Anno reg. 27. 1353. After this, by commandement of the French King, Otto swore that he should neuer after that day appeach the Duke of Lancaster of that article: and so from thence the Duke returned home by Zealand.

Parliament at Westminster.

After the Epiphany, a Parliament was holden at Westminster, wherein an ordinance was made at the instance of the Londoners, that no knowne Whore should weare from thenceforth any hood, except tryed or striped of diuers colours, nor Furre, but garments reuersed or turned the wrong side outward, vpon paine to forfeit the same.

A precise ordinance for Harlots.

Corne brought out of Ireland into England.

This yeare, the dearth of Corne by them of Ireland, and the Irish men that brought in Corne to sell vnto diuers hauens of the realme was allwaged, to the great releefe of the people.

S. Stephens Chappell at Westminster. Ex Charta.

King Edward altered the Chappell, which his progenitors before had founded of S. Stephen at Westminster, into a College of 12. secular Chanons, twelue Vicars, and other ministers accordingly, and endued it with reuenues to the summe of fiue hundred pound by yeare.

Staplers of Wooll to be kept in England.

The morrow after Saint Mathies day began a Parliament, wherein it was ordained, that the staple of wooll before kept in Flanders at Bruges, should from thenceforth be holden in diuers parts of England, Wales & Ireland, as at Newcastle, Yorke, Lincolne, Canterburie, Norwich, Westminster, Chichester, Winchester, Excester, Bristow, and Carmarden.

The Earle of North-hampton went into Scotland with a great company of armed men, and Archers, where he rode through the Marches, and enforced the Castle of Loghmaban, and other fortresses to yeld and took the Scots that were layd in ambushes. He also held a treaty of Peace with the Scottes, who gladly would haue redeemed their King, and made a perpetuall peace with the English-men, but yet so as the King of Scots should not hold his land of the King of England.

Treaties of Peace.

Innocent the first, for the desire of peace, sent the Cardinall Bonoine to Caleis, to heare the treaty of the finall peace betwixt the kingdomes of England and France, to whom repayred the Councellors of both Realmes, with full authority to treat and constitute the conditions of the same peace, and at length they agreed vpon this point, that the King of England should resigne all his right that he had to the realme of France, and remit it to the French King, and should haue therefore the Dutchy of Aquitaine, and the Countries of Artoys and of Guisnes, for him and his successors Kings of England, without that he should hold y same of the French kings in any maner of wise. To these conditions the king of England gaue his consent, and for the assurance of the couenants, Embassadours are sent to the Sea of Rome from eyther Realme. On the K. of Englands behalfe went the Bpshop of Norwich, the Duke of Lancaster, the Earle of Arundell, and other Knights, who going to Auinion, there came to them the Archbishop of Rohan, the Duke of Burgoine, Gaffrey Charney, and other of the French Kings Councell: all these were received in great honor: many Cardinals and Bishops met the Duke of Lancaster, who brought him for the space of two miles vnto Auinion, and to the Popes pallace: at length in the consistorie of the Pope, he with the Cardinals and Embassadours being present, the causes of their message was declared, and the Embassadours of England requested to haue the couenants confirmed, which had beene concluded at Caleis: to whom the French-men answered, that gladly they would haue peace, but touching Aquitaine, and the foresaid Countries, as they said, the French King could not, nor they might giue their assents that the same should be alienated from the entire bodye of the kingdome, y which, as well the King as they had taken an oath to maintaine, but yet they could be contented that the profitable dominion of the said Dutchy and Countries should be deliuered, and come to the King of England, as his Ancestors had Aquitaine, but to yet as the regality of the crown of France should euer be reserued. The English-men requested that the'e said Dominens should be absolutely, and without any condition restored to the king: answer also was made to the reason of the French-men touching the oth of their King and themselues, whereby they were bound to conserue the integrity of the honour of their kingdome, to wit, that the Pope for the benefit of peace might absolue them frō the said oath, and this as to certaine Articles premitted, it should be very well done: but yet nothing was done that might be of force to the furthering of y peace. And so the Embassadors without effect returned home, the Bpshoppe of Norwich excepted, that deceased, and was buryed there, to whom succeeded Thomas Percy.

The King of Nauarre though a bpple raised, slew Charles de Spaine Marshall of France, whereupon to auoyd the displeasure and punishment of the French King, he fled into his owne Countrey, sending his Uncle vnto the duke of Lancaster with letters humbly beseeching him that he would come into Normandy to his aides & defence, & to receiue an oath of fidelitie fidelitie and amitie of him against all men. The Duke therefore getting licence of the King, assembled together a great Nauy at South-hampton, where when the Duke was ready to haue made saple, knights that he had sent into Normandy, came backe to vnderstand the truth of this businesse, by whom it was vnderstood to the Duke, that the said K. of Nauarre his cousin was reconciled to the King, and so the Dukes voyage was stayed.

Fryer Augustines Church in London. Ex Record.

The Fryers Augustines Church in London was rectified by Henry Bonneuile Earle of Hereford and Essex, whose body was buried in the quire of the same Church.

Dissention at Oxford. Ex Hist. Ambrosii Autor.

A great dissention fell in Oxford, betweene a Scholler and a Vintner for a quart of Wine, so that the Scholler powred the Wine on the Vintners head, and beate his head with the pot, by reason whereof, a great conflict was made betwixt the Schollers of the Vniuersity, and the laymen of the towne, in the which, many lay men were wounded, and about twenty slaine. These frayes continued the space of two dayes, and then the religious men of the towne laboured to make peace. The Laymen pursued a Scholler, & wounded him to death, yet that day the tumult was appeased, but on the morrow, the people of the Villages about Oxford, being confederate with the laymen of the towne, came in great force & erected a blacke banner, whereupon the Schollers fled to their Colledges, but the lay men breaking vp the doores, slew many of them, and threw them into their Priuies: they cut and rent their Bookes, and boze away what they liked. By this meanes the Vniuersitie was dissolued, the Scholliers (saunig of Merton Colledge) went vnto their friends, and so continued more then a peare. Many, both Scholliers and Laymen were indited by the Kings Iustices, amongst the which, 4. Burgesses that had bin Maiors of Oxford, were sent into the Tower of London.

Citizens of Oxford punished.

Parl. Annal.

About the twentieth of November, King Edward held a Parliament at Westminster, in the which was granted towards the recouery of his title in France, fifty shillings of euery sacke of Woll to be transported ouer the seas for the space of fiue yeres then next following, by meanes whereof, the king might daily dispend during the said 6. yeares, more then one thousand markes sterling, for by the common opinion, there were more the an hundred thousand sacks of Woll yerely into forraine lands transported, so that during those fiue yeres, the said grant extended to 150000. pounds sterling.

Iusting at Woodstocke.

King Edward held a great Iusting at Woodstocke, for honour of the queene, who was then purified of her sonne Thomas.

Parliament at Westminster. K. Aversbury.

After Easter in a Parliament at Westminster, the King take the quarrell of Ospon into his hands, and sauing euery man his right, he forgaue the Scholliers all the whole trespas, so that in the Summer following, the Vniuersitie beganne againe to flourish, and the King gaue to the Chancellour of Oxford the onely view of the assise of bread, Ale, and Wine, and all other victuals, excluding the Maior vtterly from that office. The communaltie of the Towne gaue to the Vniuersitie two hundred and fifty pounds for amends, sauing vnto them neuertheless the actions which they had vnto euery singular person of the Towne.

Vniuersitie of Oxon priuiledged.

In this Parliament the proceese of the iudgment made against Roger Mortimer Earle of March, was reuoked, deemed erronious and false, so that the young Roger Mortimer, sonne to Edmond Mortimer, Son and heire to Roger Mortimer, was restored to the title and possessions of the Castle dome of March, as cousin and heire to his grandfather. Ex Record.

King Edward being about Sandwich, on his journey towards France, and the Prince of Wales at Sutton in Deuenshire, on his voyage toward Aquitaine, looking for a prosperous Wind, by y space of 40. dayes or more, all things else being ready. The French King had his Armies diuided in sundry places about in the Hauens of Normandy and other parts to impeach the landing of the King and Prince, and so long they lay there, that the French-men with their hyred Souldiers did sorely waste their owne Countrey, and consumed so many thousands of Crownes out of the French Kings Coffers vainely, that in the end he being ouerpayed not his people, and so he was forsaken of them, that when King Edward wasted France, the French King durst not men to encounter him, but fledde before him, as he followed, burning his owne townes, and destroying victuals, that the King found finde neyther harbour nor meate. King Edward sayled into France.

After the Moneth of August, the King of England, and the Duke of Lancaster, with seuen thousand armed men, and their retinue, entred France, and by the space of nine dayes journey as they went, wasting all by fire that came in their way, and returning to Caleis, the King heard that the Scots entred by stealth and had taken the Towne of Barwike, the Baron of Graystocke being in the army with the King, to whom the charge of that Towne had beene committed, whereupon the king hasted vnto Barwise, and within fiftene dayes recouered the Towne againe, being deliuered vnto him, life and liberty to depart being giuen vnto them that were found therein. Barwike taken by the Scots.

Barwike taken by the Englishmen.

After this he passed through Scotland vnto the Scottish Sea, but because victuals sayled for his Army, the King giuing them licence, they all returned towards England. There followed on the taile of the Army, by the space of twelue miles, Robert Herle, Almerike de Saint Edmond, Robert de Hildesley, & other whom the Scots in the night season found asleepe & at rest, doubting not lying of any misaduenture, wherefore they gaue a cruell assault vpon them, with an hideous noyse and cry, where, after long resistance Robert de Hildesley, and Iohn Brancester, Knights, were taken Prysoners, Robert Herle and Almericke hauing much adoe to escape, for the said kingdom perceiuing the Scots to be too strong for them, thought with themselues, that their Lords being Barons, of whom they held in fee, would redeeme them, and so with withdrawing, deliuered them from the Scots captiuitie.

Henry Duke of Lancaster being appointed chiefe Admirall of the English Nauie, landed at Hogges, about the Feast of S. Bartholomew, and from thence rode towards Normandy, being accompanied with Philip, brother to the King of Nauarre, who desired ayde of the said Duke, and requested him to come to helpe him. At this season, the French King hauing the King of Nauarre, Geffrey Harecourt, and diuers other Noblemen in great suspicion touching the realme and kingdome, bid them all to a Feast, where he tooke the said King of Nauarre, and cast him in Prison, and murthered the rest of the Noblemen, sauing Geffrey Harecourt, whom he caused to be beheaded with an Axe.

The King of Nauarre being thus imprisoned, his brother Philip seized many Castles and holds into his hands, which were in Normandy and thereabout, strongly fortifying them with men and victuals, though the helpe of the Duke of Lancaster, being manned all well with Englishmen, as with the men of the same countrey, to withstand the Frenchmen.

The same time when the King passed ouer to Caleis and France, his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, hauing with him the Earles of Warwike, Suffolke, Salisbury, and Oxford, tooke shipping in the beginning of October at Sutton hauen in Denonshire, and luckily sayled, and landed at Burdeaux, where he was honourably received by the Bishop and Clergie, being accompanied with all the commō people in the first Sunday of the month: The Sunday following, the Prince going out, lodged two miles from Burdeaux, in the Castle of Arnoun. On the next day he passed through a streight Wood, and so through the middle of the Towne of Lougan, sometimes walled, but now defaced, and so passing on a long journey he lost many hosses, and came at length to the strong Castle of Dandret. On Thursday he came to the City of Belas, hauing in it a Cathedrall Church, and a Conuent of Fryars Prinos. On Fryday proclamation was made in the Army, that euery man should beare the armes of Saint George. and it was said that his enemies bare the same also. On Saturday he passed to the Castle of Aax, were stand 2. Castles of thee Lords, whereof one sheweth a farre off.

On Fryday the twelfth of that moneth, his army passed the Lands of Wodiur, which are belonging to the Earle of Flure: this dayes journey being long and tedious, he lost many of his hosses in the wast ground called the Launds. Two miles from the town of Aurule, he displayed his banners, and diuided his armies in diuers troupes. In the Vward, wherein was 2. thousand men of armes, were the earle of Warwike high Constable, Reignold Cobham, Lord Barthall, Lord Beauchampe, a Somersetshire man, the Lord Clifford, and the Lord Thomas of Hampton, belonging to the Ancients, and with them seauen Barons of Gascoigne. In the middle Ward, wherein were seauen thousand men of armes, besides Clarks and Pages, there was the Prince himselfe with a double Ancient, the Earle of Oxford, the Lord Bartholomew Burwash, the L. John de Lile, the Lord Willowby, the Lord le Ware, the Lord Maurice Barkely, sonne to Thomas Lord Barkely, then living, very old, the Lord John Bourlers, Lord John Rose, the elder of Burdeaux, Captaine de la Butch, the Lord Camount, the Lord Mountferrant with their Ancients. In the rereward was 4. thousand men of armes, committed to the charge of the Earle of Suffolke, the Earle of Salisbury and the Lord Nemers, who led the Bernences: In y whole Army was of mē of armes, Clarks Pages, Archers, Brigants, and other, aboue 60000. men, and this day was Jenken Barefort, and diuers other made knights, and the village of Aurule, with 3 other villages (where of William Lord Raymond was Captaine) were deliuered vp vnto the Prince, wherein he lodged his Army, and resting there two dayes, as many as would were suffered to goe out, and take victuals, and burnt their enemies Country. On Tuesday, they lodged in the towne of Mount-Clere, where the Castle belonging thereunto was giuen vp to the Prince, & after he left it againe to the Frenchmen, by reason of fire which brake vp in the towne, whereupon the Prince went out into the field, & lodged in his Tents, euer after refusing to lye in any Towne. This day hauing taken 3. Townes and burning them, he made knights Gilotus de Straton, and diuers other. Also John de Lile stricken with a quarrell at Auttage, died. On Wednesday and Thursday he lay still, and on Fryday he came before the strong Towne of Lesegron, where he lodged in his Tents. On Saturday he came before Placence, a very faire town, & a strong, the inhabitants whereof fled away into the Castle, where the Earle of Pelesni, & many knights, were taken by Captain de la Bouch, and the Lord Mountferrant, and de Lonchis, who was that day made knight. On Sunday S. Luke's day, they stayed at Cwant, & taking y foat of Galian by force, they set it on fire and burnt it. On Munday casting fire in the town of Placence they passed along, leauing the towne of Beal Marchi on the right hand, and lodged before the Towne of the Archbyshop of Anser, called Le Vale. On this day Richard Stafford brother vnto the Earle of Staffort, led his men with his Ancient towards the Towne: and on the next day being Tuesday, the towne was yelded vnto him, & because it belonged to the Church, the prince would not suffer any man to enter into it, excepting certaine persons appointed of purpose, for the deliuering of victuals. On Wednesday they leauing the faire town of Estamount, on the left hand, they came before the Noble Towne of Perand, belonging to the Earle

Earle of Comenge, which was full of armed Souldiers, and the Prince lodged in the great Monastery of Barons, in the which Abbey, there was not so much as one liuing creature found. On Thursday they lay still doing no harme to the said Abbey. On Friday they went out of the faire and rich Country of Armenake, and entred the Country of Auserike, through the which, the passage was very hard and hilly, and lodged at Saraunt a towne, they set it on fire, contrary to the commandement of the Prince.

All that day and three dayes following, they passed alongst by the high hils of Aragen. On Saturday they came to the Towne of Saint Poze, where the rereward of the Army lodged in a great Monastery of blacke Monkes, which were all fled away: the middle ward at Villrankes, and the Vward at Tremaine: these villages being very rich and full of victuals, had no man in them, for all the inhabitants were fled.

Sunday the fourth and twentieth of October, they passed a certaine Ford, and entred into the Lands of the Earle of Comenge, which reached vnto Tolouse, but these Countries were walled with fire and sword, and leauing on the left hand the towne called Sanneters in Auserike, they passed by the strong Citie of Wimbers, where Pope John the two and twentieth removing the blacke Monkes, erected a Bishops sea, and they were lodged in a great & rich Towne called Sotance, belonging to the Earledome of Comenge, where was a Conuent of Fryers Prinos: and burning this Towne on Munday they passed through a goodly wide countrey, very plaine, & streams to the Townes of Saint Foy, and Saint Lity. On Tuesday they rested: and on Wednesday being the feast of Simon and Iude, the Army passed through the Riuer of Geronne, being a water very fierce, stony, and terrible: and against the same day, through the Riuer of Arage, much more dangerous, and came vnto Tolouse: before that time, neuer durst any Horseman passe ouer these waters, wherefore the people of this country being wonderfully made afraid, could not tell what to doe, for being sodainly taken, they could not flie: that night the Prince lodged at Falgard, a little towne, one mile from Tolouse. On Tuesday they came vnto the faire and great Towne called Saint Gillard, being part of the inheritance of the Lord Amerike de la Fossad. the which towne the French King had taken from him, because he was the King of Englands feed man. Fiue by the sayd towne were twelue Wind-mils, the which they set on fire all at once. There were taken two Espies, they certified the Prince that the Earle of Armeniake was at Tolouse, and the Constable of France at Mount Haban, foure Leagues from Tolouse. On Fryday, they passed on towards Auinion, by the good towne of Valige, and the Towne called Franke, and the whole Army lodged at the great towne called Auionet, and the middle Ward and rereward lay in one side of the Suburbes, and the Vward lay on the other side of the Towne which the Townes-men perceiuing, fled euery one.

There were about this towne 20. Wind-mils, which they set on fire. On Saturday the 28 of October, they lodged in the great towne called Castelnanner, where a Church of the Chanons, a Conuent of Fryers Prinos, and another of Carmelites, with an Hospitall, and a Village called Les Mauns de Pucels, with a Conuent of Fryers Augustine, were all consumed with fire. On Sunday the feast of All-Saints, the Army rested, out of the which Army, certaine going to take Butties, they tooke a little Towne, the inhabitants whereof to be spared from spoyling, gaue them ten thousand florens of gold. On Munday they marched along by the townes of S. Mathele Poze, and the great Towne called Milkapinch, and from thence, they entred the Country of Carkaion, and the Prince lodged at a little village called Alse. On Tuesday they came to Carkaion, a faire Towne, rich and well built, bigger then London. Within the Walls, betwixt the towne of Sanburge, and the City being double walled, there ran a goodly water, which passed vnder a faire stone bridge, at the foot whereof, were 4. Conuents of Religious, of the which, the Fryars ran not away, but the other fled into the City. The whole Army was lodged in the towne, which abounded with Victuals and all other delicate victuals. This day, the sonnes of the Lord Libret, and Walter Daller, with Rowland Daues, and many other, were made knights.

On Wednesday and Thursday, the Army lying still in the towne, & hauing made a truce, they parled with them of the City concerning a Peace, the Cittizens offering for saueing the Towne from burning two hundred and fifty thousand of golden Souses: the Prince answered, he came not for gold, but to take Cities and Townes, together with their inhabitants, and the next day commanded the Towne to be brent. Carcaies in France burnt.

On Friday, the Towne being brent, the Army departed, leauing on the left hand the castle of Botenake vntouched, passing through the Champion Countrey, burning Townes called la Rustican, and all the Country thereabout.

On Saturday they trauailed through a great Wind and dust, leauing on the left hand a great pole of fresh water, being in compasse about xxx. leagues, and is called Cabon. They came to a Towne called Silony, which was yelded to the Prince, and therefore neuer fouthed: and the Prince was lodged that night at a good Towne called Canet. On Sunday the eight day of November, they passed the Water of Sander, partly at the ford called Chastell de Terre, and partly ouer a Bridge, and so trauailed betwixt high hils, vnto the great City of Narbon, whereof that Country taking his name, is called Gallia Narbonensis. The City was very strong and well walled, hauing in it a great Cathedrall Church also a notable Caſtle, belonging to the Biſhop, a very ſtrong Tower for the Earle of the ſame Towne. It had alſo a Suburbe called a Borough, much bigger and better built, then the Bozough of Carkaſon.

In the Bozough were foure Couents of religious perſons. Betwixt the Bozough and the Citie, there runneth a water called Aude, comming from Carcaſon, and runneth into the Breakiſh Sea. Betwixt the City and the Borough are two Bridges of ſtone, and the third of timber, built with ſtore-houſes for diuers Merchandizes. The Prince was lodged in the houſe of Carmelite Friars. On Tueſday the Bozough being ſet on fire, the army paſſing by the waters ſide went ouer it in diuers places. From thence, they went and lodged at the Towne and Caſtle of Arobion. On Wedneſday they trauailed an eaſt iourney, & hurtfull to the horſe for lacke of water. On Thurſday Theodorike Dale, porter of the Princes Chamber, was made Knight: thence the army paſſed by a good Towne called Ulmes: the middle ward paſſed vnto the good towne of the Earle of Ile, called Amile, where they lodged that night. The Prince lay at the Friars Minors, where was great abundance of muſkadell, being prouided for the Counteſſe of the Ile, which was all ſpoyled. This day alſo, the good Towne of Pipions was deſtroyed, with the Caſtle thereof called Redote. On Friday the Army paſſing by a long ſtony Way, lodged at Lanian. On Saturday, returning back toward Gaſcoigne they left on their right hand the great pole of Eſbone, and Carkaſon, and all the iourney that they went before, and the rereward lodged at a good Towne called Aiuer, and the middle-ward at Puchfiances, where a Caſtle being defended, withſtood them a ſeaſon, but at the length was wonne, and the Prince lay beyond the Bridge, by a faire running water, on both ſides whereof, the Countrey was ſpoyled with fire, together with the good Towne of Pelaunce, where the Vaward was lodged that night. On Sunday they trauailed a long iourney, becauſe the Prince ſhould be lodged in the great Abbey of our Lady de Prolior, where in ſeuerall Cloyſters did liue one hundred predicants, whereunto the Prince was deuoutly receiued. In the day the armie ſet on fire the Towne of Lemins, where there was farre greater Couents of religious, than at Carcaſon. Alſo they burnt the fayre Towne called Falanges, vnto which Town belonged one and twenty Windmilles. They burnt alſo the townes of Vnlard and Serre, with all the whole Countrey lying thereabouts. On Munday the middle ward lodged at the good towne called Dealpuhon, which long time was defended, but at length gotten by force, the Caſtle whereof yeelded, vnto the which Towne and Caſtle, the Prince commanded, that no harme ſhould be done by fire. On Tueſday, early paſſing ouer the River of Beſeile, they entred into a Countrey which was broad. About one a clocke, they came before a great Abbey called Bourghbon, where the Earle of Flurens with great ioy receiued the Prince, he being newly eſcaped out of Priſon from Paris, where he had laine by the ſpace of two yeares, and the ſaid Earle remayned from that time faithfull to the Prince. This day they rode in the Lordſhips and Seignories of the ſame Earle, by the Townes of Paſell and Colmon, and on the right hand they paſſed by the great town of Saint Canole, and the high Caſtle called Hautripe: but on this day they beent nothing for reuerence of the foreſaid Earle and his vineyards, but paſſed againe ouer the water of Arage, leauing alſo Tolouſe as they did at the firſt, but then one mile on the left hand, and now foure leagues on the right, and the middle ward was lodged in the great Towne of Permount, which together with the Caſtle was beent. On Wedneſday, they paſſed by the caſtle of the Earle of Flurs called Mounthane, at the foote whereof, all the Horſemen paſſed ouer the great Water Geround, and there take the Towne and Caſtle of Soyth, then leauing the River of Geround on the left hand, and ſo paſſed vnto the Towne of Pazconaiu, which they take, then they returned ouer the River againe, and take the ſtrong Towne of Carbone. On Thursday the army reſted. On Friday woyd was brought to the Prince that the French were vp, and had gathered a great force, which they had diuided into 5. great battailes, being in the field not farre from them, whereupon our men ſet themſelues in battell array, about one mile from the place where they lodged, and being now ready to fight, ſome one of the Souldiers by chance ſtart a Hare, whereupon a great ſhout was made, which the enemies hearing, they ſent out 40. light horſemen to ſee what was the cauſe thereof, who drawing nigh to the Engliſh army, and perceiuing them to be ſet in battaile array, returned back again, and declared what they had ſeene: whereupon preſently the whole army of Frenchmen fled with great feare. The ſame day Bartholomew Burwaſh, Iohn Chandos, & Iames de Audley, with 24. light horſemen were appointed ſcouts and comming to the tayle of the French men, they take priſoners 32. Knights and Gentlemē, amongſt whom they took the Earle of Roememe, alſo they ſlew many Carters and Wagoners. The Prince lodged in the Towne of Poiwoſe. On Saturday they marched to the Caſtle of Dzadzay, in which Caſtle the prince lodged, and in the morning they burnt it. On Sunday the two and twentieth of Nouember, about Euening, they perceiued that their enemies were on the other ſide of the great Hill hard by the great towne of Gemount, ſo that the Engliſhmen being benighted, ſent out 8. light Horſemen, and certaine Bowmen vnto the right hand of the Towne called Auremount. Where finding foure hundred men of armes of the Conſtable of France, they chaſed them out of the town, and ſlew and took many: the middle ward lodged at Auremont, and the Vaward at Colimont. Early in the morning the Wagoners being commanded to remaine in the towne of Auremount, all the reſtue being diuided into troupes, went into the field, wayting for the comming of their enemies, all in vaine: for the Prince taking the towne of Damount, was told that his enemies fled away at midnight. On Tueſday the army lodged in the field, and for lacke of water, their horſes were faine to drinke wine, whereupon it came to paſſe, that the next day their horſes were ſo drunke they could not goe right forth, and many of them dyed. On Saint Katherines day, with much adoe they came to water, and leauing the towne of Florence on their right hand they paſſed to the great towne called Silard, and the middle ward was lodged at a towne called Realmount, which they take by maine force, and therefore burnt it. On Thurſday they reſted. On Friday they trauailed a long iourney, by walled townes and ſtrong Caſtles, the middle ward lodged at Serde. On Saterday they paſſed ouer a certaine Water with great difficulty, and through woods, till they came to a good towne called Peſin. On Sunday the Prince reſted, and take homage and oaths of the townesmen. On Munday S. Andrewes day, trauelling a long iourney, they came to the towne of Tolouſe, where were three Caſtles. On Tueſday the Prince trauelled to the caſtle of Pelan, where he lodged. On Wedneſday Anno reg. 30. the prince came to Regla, where his horſes and Wagons paſſed through the riuer of Geronde. In this towne of Regla, the Prince appointed diuers Barons and ſuch like to winter in diuers places of the Marches, to the intent they ſhould keepe the inland parts of Gaſcoigne againſt the French men.

The Prince of Wales touching theſe matters aforeſaid, and for other conſiderations alſo, cauſed a new coyne of gold to be made in Gaſcoigne, being buſied himſelfe about the 1356 repairing of ſuch things as were decaied and throwne downe. And in this ſeaſon, there ſprang vp a lolliy fantaſie in the Frenchmens heades, that the King of England was come into Normandy, the cauſe of which rumour roſe vp, for that the Duke of Lancaſter, after that he had fortified the ſtrong places belonging to the King of Nauarre, which were in the Ile of Conſtance and other places, did direct his iourney towards Bytaine, whereof he was newly made chiefe Captaine. Another cauſe was this, Philip brother to the King of Nauarre, came into England, & earneſtly craued aid of the King againſt the French King, who kept his brother in priſon, that he might by force of armes reſtore al ſuch lands vnto him as were wrongfully withholden from him. whereupon he offering to doe homage and fealtie, had (of the Kings appointment) Miles Stapleton a man of great integrity, and in martiall affaires very skilfull, him (I ſay) the King appointed to be his faithfull fellow. Theſe men with two thouſand men well appointed trauelling through Normandy, tooke Townes and fortreſſes, burning diuers of them, paſſing along till they came to a caſtle 9. leagues diſtant from the Citty of Paris: neither did they aſlake their trauell, vntill they had forced their enemies to enter into a yeerely truce. By this meanes a great report & no leſſe feare filled the hearts of the Frenchmen, which report at length came to the eares of the Prince lying at Regla, wherefore hee gathering all the power he had with him in his Dukedome, to the intent to meet his Father, which he muſt doe by trauelling through France, hee came at length to Buzetat, where hee was certified that the Earle of Armenia, would after his departure haue ſpoyled the Countrey, and for that intent had prouided a great band of men: wherefore he ſent backe to the Gouernour of Gaſcoigne vnto Barnard de Libret, and other. From thence the Prince went into France through the coaſtes of Barny and Limon, ſtill encouraging his men againſt their enemies, ſending before him Iohn Chandos, Iames Dawdeley, and other complices, to try out the ſtate of their enemies Country, leaſt perhaps ſome crafty ambuſhment might ſodainly aſſault our men afore they were aware. He himſelfe remouing his campe euery day, and now being entred into Pictauia, his eſpies brought word that the French King had gathered a great army, being now in Aurelian, who alſo knew of the Princes comming, for he ſent out eſpies to diſcouer our army, amongſt whom Griffin Mico of Chambly, petit Captaine of two hundred men, meeting with other eſpies, came to his coaſt: for our eſpies take thirty of them, and ſlew the reſidue, ſo that there was not one of them left to carry word what was become of their fellowes. Our eſpies proceaded towards Romerentine, where meeting with the Lord Creſſe, and Lord Briſgand, they ſet vpon them and ſlew them, their chiefe Captaines being forced to flie to a Caſtle, and hauing taken vp their lodging in a Towne, the Prince commaunded that on the morning a great aſſault ſhould be giuen to them of the Caſtle.

The day following our men being all armed, paſſed through the ditches, and came vnto the walles of the Caſtle, ſome applyed to ſcale the wall with ladders, ſome burne the gates, and entring, ſlew a great many of the chiefe men, but the Lords before named fledde vnto the principall tower of the Caſtle: but the Prince determined not to depart, till they that were beſieged, were either taken or pelled: At length the Caſtle bridge vndermined, the men beſieged, with all humilitie pelled vp the Caſtle. After this the ſpyes declared that the French King was come downe to Turon, to prouide armies to goe againſt the Prince, of the which tydings the Prince being glad, he pitcht his tents againſt the French King, but could not paſſe the riuer of Leger, by reaſon of great floods, and the French King had broken all the Bridges, to the intent there ſhould bee no paſſage betwixt the Prince and the Duke of Lancaſter, whoſe armies might well euery night perceiue each others fires in the Campes: but the Prince following alongſt the riuer of Legers Eaſtward, hee pitcht his tents neare vnto Turon, where lyking for the French King foure dayes, hoping to fight with him, for that hee was distant but one league off, hee vnderstood that the French King was retyred backe to Blamia, tenne leagues off: passing ouer by a Bridge the River of Leyers at a place vsed be-twixt two strong Townes, and so toward Poyters. This retiring of the French King certified, the Prince returned backe, intending to haue met him in the way, which hee could not doe: yet crossing ouer all, as hee imagined the neerer way, he set vpon the taile of his enemies, and cut from them the Earles of Inyni and Vinters, & also the Marshal of Burgony, these being taken, died, as was thought, through the great toyle they had taken: night drawing on, our men gaue themselues to rest in a wood, intending the next day to take their journey toward Poyters, and by the way they were certified that the French King, with great poumpion prepared himselfe to battell, & drew nigh to our rents: the Prince therefore committed the vaward of the armie to the Earles of Warwicke & Oxford, the middle ward was guided by the Prince, and the rereward was led by the Earles of Salisburie and Suffolke. In all the whole armie of the prince there was not aboue foure thousand men of armes, one thousand armed Souldiers, and two thousand Archers. The pompous nobility of the Frenchmen drew nigh, greatly disdaining the small company of the Englishmen, for they had in number eight thousand fighting Souldiours, they had also seuen Ancients. At this matter a great many of our men murmured because of late a great part of our army was sent to defend Gascoigne. There was among the Frenchmen a certaine Scot called William Douglas, a man of great force and practise in the warre, this man did the French King make knight, and because hee knew he would bee a deadly enemie to the Englishmen, he gladly hearkned to his aduices. This William was Captaine ouer two hundred Scots: these men vnderstood well that it was the custome of the English men in those dayes to fight on foote, in which point they followed the Scots, and the Scot also prouoked the French king and other French men to fight in like manner. The French K. obeying his foolish counsell, gladly agreed vnto his sayings, whereupon hee sent light horsemen into the Citie, that they should suffer no man to make any chase, but onely fiue hundred horsemen well appointed to come out against the archers, in the beginning of the conflict, and to ruine them ouer and treade them vnder their horse feete: but these performed not that which was commanded them, as it appeared by the sequele thereof. The armies being set in a readinesse on both sides for to fight early on Sunday in the morning which was notable sayre, behold there came the Cardinall of Petragozen, & charged the Prince, in the name of God who was crucified, that it might please him to deferre warre for a time, both for ecclesiasticall peace, & also for the sparing of Christian blood, and to the end there might bee a treaty had of peace, the which hee promised should bee performed with great honour on both sides. The prince neither feared nor refused peace, but modestly agreed to the request of this Father. All this day now being appointed for the obtaining of peace, the army of the Frenchmen encreased by the number of a thousand men of armes, and also of other. On the morrow after, the Cardinall came againe from the French King, in his behalfe to request a truce, which should endure for one whole yere, the which the Prince denied, yet at the importunate suite of the Cardinall he granted a truce to continue til Christmas next comming. Therefore the Cardinall returning to the French King, requested him of pledges for the truce, but the Marshall Dawdenam, Geffrey de Charney and Douglas the Scot, perswaded him that by common reason it could not come to passe that the Englishmen should at that time preuaile, and especially, because they were but few, and in a strange Countrey, and wearied out miserably with their toyle in trauell, and therefore not able to withstand so great a number of the Frenchmen of France, who stood in defence of their own land. The Prince of Wales being certified, that the Captaines of the French, would haue no kind of peace, but such as they could get by force of armes, and calling his men together, he made to them an Oration first in generall, & then to his Archers as followeth: your manhood (saith he) hath beene alwaies knowne to me, in great dangers, which theweth that you are not degenerate from true sonnes of Englishmen, but to be defended from the blood of them which heretofore were vnder my fathers Dukedome and his predecessors Kings of England, vnto whom no labor was painfull, no place inuincible, no ground impassable, no hill (were it neuer so high) inaccessible, no tower inscaleable, no army impenetrable, no armed souldier, or whole hosts of menne was formidable. Their liuely couragiousnesse tamed the Frenchmen, the Cipriens, the Spartanians, the Calabriana, & the Palestines, and brought vnder the stiffe necked Scots, & vnruly Irrishmen, yea, & the Welchmen also which could well endure all labour. Occasion, time, & dangers, maketh of fearefull very strong & stout, and doth many times of dull witted men make witty: honour also, and loue of the country, and the desire of the rich spoile of the Frenchmen, doth stirre you vp to follow your fathers steps. Wherefore follow your Ancients, and wholy bee intentius to follow the commandement of your Captaines as well in minde as in body, that if victory come with life, we may still continue in firme friendship together, hauing alwaies one will, and one mind: but if enuious Fortune (which God forbid) should let vs at this present, to runne the race of all flesh, and that we end both life and labour together, be you sure that your names shall not want eternall fame and heauenly ioy, and we also with these gentlemen our companions, will drinke of the same cup that you shall doe, vnto whome it shall bee an eternall glorie and name, to haue wonne the Battaile of Poyters.

Prince of Wales his Oration.

the Nobility of France: but to bee ouercome (as God forbid) is not to bee ascribed vnto the danger of time, but to the courage of the men. Hauing spoken these words he perceiued that there was a hill hard by which was planted on the top with hedges and ditches, the midle whereof was very plaine, and a pasture field on the one side thereof, with many rough bushes, and on the other side it was all planted with vines, and the reddine was plain in the top whereof he did imagine the armie of the French to lye betwixt our men and the Hill. There were great and low valleys, and a piece of Marish ground. One company of the Prince finding out a narrow passage, entred the valley and take the hill, where among the bushes they hid themselues, taking the aduantage of the place. The field wherein our men lay, to wit, the vaward and middle ward was deuided from the plaine where the French army lay, with a long hedge and ditch, the one end whereof did reach down to the marish aforesaid: that of the hill nere the Marish, the Earle of Warwicke kept, Captaine of the vaward. In the vpper part of the hedge, toward the hanging of the hill, there was a great gap, from the which a stones cast it did our rereward, ouer the which the Earle of Salisbury was Captaine. Our enemies perceiuing our Princes Ancient to be displaced, and oftentimes to be remoued from place to place, & by reason of the hill to bee sometime quite out of sight, they iudged that the Prince fled. yet Dowgle the Scot and Marshall Clarimount said that it was not so, but marshal Dawdenam being deceiued in his owne opinion, thought otherwise, crying out still to follow and chase the Prince now fleeing, & with him also Dowglas, to the intent to get preferment and a worthie name of his new warfare: But Clarimount to wash away the euill opinion which was conceiued of him touching his fidelitie, was the more behement to perswade them forward, for vnto them the charge of the vaward was deputed: before these went out, the fashion was, certaine to chase and to kill, against whom certaine that were vnder the Hill of our vaward came to meete Marshall Dawdenam, who staying to see the end of the iusting, kept himselfe from encountring. In the meane time Clarimount thinking to come out by the gap in the hedge, and so to come at the backe of our vaward, and to compasse them in, met with the Earle of Salisbury, who perceiuing his comming and purpose, suspected his whole intent, and so they which gouerned our rereward, making haste to take the gap and keepe the enemie from passing that way, sustained the first charge of the battell. Then began a terrible meeting betwixt the armed men, who laid on load with swords and speares. neither did the Archers slacke their duty, but lying in safe trenches, cast vp aboue the ditch and shot ouer the hedge, preuailing more with their arrowes then they did that fought in armes: thus our rereward slaying the enemies, who came straggling to the gap, and the vaward which lay on the hanging of the hil toward the Marish being gouerned by the Earle of Warwike, were alwaies ready and met with the Frenchmen, beating them downe. The Archers of the vaward were placed in the marish out of danger from the Horse-men, yet for all that they did preuaile there somewhat, for the Horse-men were appointed to no other purpose, but to ouerrunne the Archers. The Earle of Oxford considering the discommodity that might ensue thereof, departed from the Princes warde, and leading with him the Archers, set them on the one side of the French men, commanding them to shote at the hinder parts of the Horses, by meanes whereof the Horses being gauld and wounded, fell to tumbling with them that sat on their backes, or els turned back and ran vpon them that followed after, making great slaughter vpon their owne masters. The Horsemen being thus beaten backe, the Archers retired towards the place from whence they came, shooting & gawling the sides of the Frenchmen which fought right ouer against them: by this time the force and heate of the battell began to be in prime, when as the Earles of Warwik and Salisbury, like fierce Lyons, endeuoured of purpole which of them should dung the land of Poytiers most with Frenchmens blood. Neither was the wise Counsellour Thomas Duke of Suffolke idle at that season, who right worthily in all his acts behaued himselfe, being expert and skilfull in actuarie. For he continually running fro ward to ward, and into all troupes and companies, comforted & stirred them vp with good words to doe well, hauing a great regard that the youthfull sort of lustie Souldiors being to bold vpon their good hearts and courage, should not without regard goe out too farre, and placed the Archers at sundry times to great aduantages, and oftentimes as leasure would suffer him, hee would encourage vp the minds of the souldiers. Clarimount was slaine, William Douglas also being wounded fled, hauing with him a few Scots of his band, with Archebald Douglas his brother: our men retiring put themselues in good aray, and our vaward and middle ward ioyned themselues together. By and by there marcheth forth a new army of the Frenchmen the which the eldest sonne of the French King Dolpain of Vienna, brought forth. The order and arrayof this army was more terrible and fierce then the shew of that which was last oppressed, yet for al that could it not make our men afraide, who were sharpe set, and very desirous of honour, and also of reuenge, both for themselues, and their fellowes, which a little before were slaine and wounded. And therefore boldely they goe to it on both sides, making thwrtes and noyses, crying out, Saint George to borrow, or Saint Denis bee for vs. Within a while they were come to fight man to man, and euery man ready to die, fight now to saue their liues, neither doth the Lyon make the wolfe more afraid, or the Tiger is more terrible to the simple beast, then our lusty gentlemē were to their enemies who chaſed them, & ſlue them like as ſhe wolues chaſe & kill ſheepe. And though that this battell with ſtood our men moze then the firſt, yet, after they had loſt a great many of their men, they had ſuch a deuile, that they ſaued manie & returned by running away, but by a faire retreat which the Frenchmen are accuſtomed to vſe. But our men conſidering, that the victory of the field was doubtfull, as long as the French King might be in preſence with his armie, who lay there halfe hid in a Valley, they would not afterward when they had chaſed any that fled, goe out of the field, but the worthy man Maurice Berkeley, ſonne of Thomas Barkley, had no regard thereunto, who for the ſpace of two houres together with his men neuer ſpared, but would be ſtill in the foreſront of the battell inuading his enemies with the ſwo. This Maurice being in the middeſt of the Dolphins guard ſolued blowes among them, firſt with a ſpeare, then with a ſwoꝛd, and at length being all alone compaſſed with the multitude, & ſore ly wounded, he was taken priſoner. In the meane time our men carried thoſe which were wounded at their campe, and laid them vnder buſhes and hedges out of the warre, other hauing ſpent their weapons take the ſpeares & ſwoꝛds from them whom they had ouercome: and the archers lacking arrowes, made haſte to draw them from poze wꝛeches that were but halfe dead, there was not one of them all, but either he was wounded oꝛ quite wearied with great labour, except 400. men who keeping the chiefe ſtandard, were appointed to meete the French King. The Dolphin being thus put to flight, came to the French K. and ſaid, my Lord K, the field is fallen to the Engliſhmen, & your eldeſt ſon hath withdꝛawn himſelfe: vnto whom the French K. anſwered with an oath, y he would not that day foꝛſake the field vnleſſe he were taken oꝛ ſlaine, and ſo by that meanes carried away by force: wherefoze y ancient-bearers are commanded to march foꝛwards, after whom followed two great companies of armed men into a wide field, ſhewing themſelues to our men, and ſtroke a great feare into their hearts, in ſo much that they were out of hope to conquer any moze. The which thing a man of great wiſedome ſtanding by & prince ſignified with a ſobbing voyce, (ſaying, alas we poze wꝛetches are ouercome,) but the prince hauing a great truſt and faith in Chriſt checked him ſaying, thou lieſt thou daſtardly fellow, foꝛ thou canſt not ſay ſo we can be ouercome as long as I liue. Captain de la Buche, a noble man in all affaires, as ſone as he perceiued the armies of y French K. marching foꝛth of their tents, aſking licence of the prince departed away with 12. ſouldiers, and a hundꝛed Archers whom many of our men thought to haue fled away, therefoze our ſouldiers, (expecting the chiefe Captaines) being quite out of hope of victoꝛy, committed themſelues wholy to the mercy of God. Then the Prince commanded his Ancient beaꝛer Sir Walter Woodland to march foꝛward toward his enemies, and with a few freſh men hee ioyned battell with the great army of the French King: by and by they ſeuered their trumpets, one giuing anſwere to another, they made ſuch a noyſe, that the walles of Poytiers ſounded with the Eccho thereof like a wood, in ſuch ſoꝛt that a man would haue thought that the hils had bellowed out to the vallies, and that the cloudes hadde giuen foꝛth a moſt terrible thunder, ſo the which there wanted no cruell lightnings, whileſt the aꝛme ſhone on the bꝛight armour & ſpeares daſhing againſt ſhining hernels. Then came on the cruell company of croſſbowmen making a darknes in the ayꝛe with the multitude of quarrels which they ſhot, againſt whom came a woꝛthy company of Engliſh bowmen: out flies alſo dartes of Aſh which met with the enemie a faꝛ off: but the French army being full of diuers troupes, & many armed men defending their bꝛeſts with their ſhields, pꝛoceed foꝛward againſt their enemies: wherefoze our Archers hauing emptied their quiuers in vain, being armed only with ſwoꝛds and targets, are faine to encounter with them that were laden with armour. Then beſtirreth himſelfe the woꝛthy Prince of Wales, cutting & hewing the Frenchmen with a ſharpe ſwoꝛd. In the meane time Captain de la Buche marcheth a compaſſe about, vnder the hanging of the hill, which he with the Prince a little before foꝛſoke, and priuily compaſſing about the field, at the length commeth cloſe vnder the place where the French campe lay, from thence he aſcended to the toppe of the hill that way, which the Frenchmen had beaten with their trauaile, and ſo ſodainly bꝛeaking foꝛth vnlooked foꝛ, and ſhewing by the enſigne of S. George that he was our friend, the Prince with great courage giueth a freſh charge on the French army, being deſirous to bꝛeak their rankes, before the Captaine aforeſaid, ſhould ſet on the ſide of the battayle. The Prince luſtily encountring with his enemies goeth into the middle of the thꝛong, and where he ſeeth moſt company, there he layeth about him on euery ſide.

In the meane time on euery ſide, his friends which ſerued with Captain de la Buche, were at the backes of the enemies, beating downe and killing without pitie, and the Archers alſo placed foꝛ the purpoſe that ſo thicke, wounding the backes and ſides of the Frenchmen, in ſuch ſoꝛt, that the foame of the battaile was quite ſpoiled, neyther could they put themſelues in oꝛder oꝛ array any moze. This was the courage of the Prince, who at the length thruſteth thoꝛow the thongs of them that guarded the French King; then ſhould you ſee an Ancient beginne to nod and ſtumble, the beaꝛers of them to fall downe, the blood of Knaues and Princes ran mingled together into the waſters which were nigh. In like ſoꝛt the Boye of Cornewall rageth, who ſeeketh to haue none other way to the French Kings ſtandard, then by blood onely: but when they came there, they met with a company of ſtoutmen to withſtand them, the Engliſhmen fight, the Frenchmen alſo lay on, but at length God hauing ſo diſpoſed, the Prince preſſeth foꝛward on his enemies enemies, and like a fierce Lyon beating downe the pꝛoud, hee came to the yeelding vppe of the French King. The Frenchmen being ſcatteꝛed abꝛoad in the fields of Poytiers, pꝛeceiuing that the ſtandard with the flowꝛdelice was beaten downe, fled with all ſpeede towards the Towne, which was not faꝛre off: the Engliſh menne pꝛeceiuing them to bee flying, though their owne liues were either ſoꝛe wounded oꝛ wearied, followed them in chaſe euen to the gates of Poytiers, where in a great ſtꝛaunge and very dangerous, they ſlew a great number of Frenchmen. At the laſt our men being called backe by retreat with the ſound of trumpet, and aſſembling together, there were diuers pauilions and tents ſet vp in the fields, and the whole company being thꝛoughly comfoꝛted with this victoꝛy, gaue their whole endeuour to pꝛeuide foꝛ them that were wounded, foꝛ the quiet reſt of them that were wearied, foꝛ ſafe keeping of them that were taken priſoners, and foꝛ the refreſhing of them that were almoſt famiſhed, vntill they had full vnderſtanding who and how many were wanting: Among them which were found halfe dead, was ſeene the Lord James Dawdley by reaſon of his broad buckler, and being carried in the armes of his ſouldiers, was bꝛought to the Princes lodging, and the Prince himſelfe roſe from his ſupper, and came to him, and cauſed him to be ſtripped and laid in a ſoft bed, and being ſomewhat better come to his remembꝛance, the Prince comfoꝛted him, ſweaꝛing to him that he had the French King pulled into him: which newes when the languiſhing Noble man heard, he ſtraightwayes reuiued. The Prince returning to the French King, willed him not to deny that to be a woꝛthy deed of his, that roſe from his ſupper to comfoꝛt him that was almoſt dead, who ſpared not his owne blood to purchaſe victoꝛie. After that they hauing had ſome talke concerning the warres which Iames Dawdley made, y French King ſaid that amongſt all other ſtout Champions which valiantly that day behaued themſelues, he did greatly wonder at the noble deeds of that Knight, and he ſpake not much moze in all his ſupper. But what he ſpake to the Prince, who comfoꝛted his Noble pꝛey. Such like woꝛds, it is ſaid that the French king ſpake: Although it be our chance to fall into an euerlaſting ſoꝛow, yet foꝛ all that wee thought it good to refraine from the ſame by a kind of meaſure, foꝛ though we be vnder ſubiection by law and right of warre vnder our noble couſin, yet are we not as raſcals, oꝛ faint hearted runnawayes, oꝛ taken lying hid cloſe in a coꝛner, but after the manner of the field by the end and ſucceſſe of warre, where we were as ready to die as to liue foꝛ iuſtice ſake. And in the ſame field were many rich men taken, whoſe liues were reſerued foꝛ ranſome, the faint-hearted and lewd chaſed away, but the woꝛthieſt and ſtouteſt were ſpoyled of their liues. This battell of Poytiers was fought on the nineteenth day of September.

The next day after the battell, all the pꝛyſoners were numbꝛed, to wit, the French King alſo Philip his ſonne, the Archbiſhop of Senan, the Earle of Pontue, the Earle of Longuile, the Earle of Ewe the Earle of Tankeruile, the Earle Daunter, the Earle of Vendodour, the earle of Slaun eꝛ, the earle of Vademount, the Earle of Vandome, the Earle of Iuyny, the Earle Don Martin, the Earle of Solabuſſe, the Earle of Sanſe, Vicount Nerbon, the Lord Daubeny, Marſhall Daubenam, the Lord Guinſchard de Angoliſme Seneſchal de Seintong, the Lord Pozes Sainmemet, the Lord Leonard de Guthoy, the Seneſchall of Poytiers, the Lord great Parker, the cheiſe Maiſter of the hoſpitall of Spaigne, the Lord of S. Tigre, the Lord Damboyd, Seneſchall of Anner, the Lord Tower, the Lord Dars, the Lord Duruall, the Lord of the tovvne of Ermel, the Lord Paugeler, the Lord Plamke, the Vicount de Belimount, and the Lorde of Suly: there were alſo the bodies found of many that were ſlain, as the Duke of Burbone, the Duke Dafines, the Conſtable of France, Marſhall de Garmmont, the Lord Geffrey de Charney, the Lord Pounce, the Biſhop of Chaloner, the Lord of Launday, the Lord Ripemount the Lord Chauency, the Lord Ioſle, the Lord Role, the Lord Aunger, the Lord de Sercant Iohn, the Lorde Dargenton, the Lord Cyme, the Lord Kuas, the Lord Rocheſurche ward. the Lord de Vllem. The Prince bought all the pꝛiſoners and captiues of them that kept them and carried them with him to Burdeaux, there to remaine in ſafe cuſtody, duting his abode there.

An. reg. 31. 1357. Edward the blacke Prince returned with the priſoners into England.

Edward Prince of Wales returning into England with Iohn the French King, Philip his ſonne, and many other priſoners, arriued at Plimmouth on the firſt of May, and the foure and twentieth of May entred London with them, where he was receiued with great honour of the Citizens, and ſo conueyed to the Kings pallace at Weſtminſter, where the K. ſitting in his eſtate in Weſtminſter hall, receiued them, and after conueyed the French King to a lodging, where hee lay a ſeaſon: and after the ſaid French King was lodged in the Sauoy, (which then was a pleaſant place belonging to the Duke of Lancaſter.) In the winter following were great and royall Iuſts holden in Smithfield at London, where many knightly fights of armes were done, to the great honour of the King and Realme, at the which were pꝛeſent, the Kings of Englande, France, and Scotland, with many noble eſtates of all thoſe kingdomes, whereof the moze part of the ſtrangers were priſoners.

many noble men and other, and after the sayd Henry Picard kept his hall against all comers whosoever, that were willing to play at dice and hazard. In like manner the Lady Margaret his wife did at her lodge her Chamber to the same intent. The King of Cypres playing with Henry Picard in his hall, did winne of him fifty markes, but Henry boring very skilfull in that art, altering his hand did after winne of the same King, the same fifty marks and fifty markes more, which when the same King began to take in ill part, although he dissembled the same, Henry said unto him, Sir Lord and King be not agreeued, I count not your gold but your play, for I have not bidd you hither that I might grieue you, but that amongst other things I might try your play, and gaue him his money againe, plentifully bestowing of his owne amongst the retinue: besides, he gaue many rich gifts to the King and other Nobles and Knights, which dined with him, to the great glory of the Citizens of London in foure dayes.

About Hallowntide, Dauid le Bruse King of Scot. was deliuered from the long imprisonment of xi. yeeres, in the castle of Odham, his ransome being set 100000. markes to be paid the next ten yeres following.

Normandy and Britaine were sore spoyled and wasted by Philip the King of Navars brother, Iacob de la Pipe, and Robert Knowles, with many other Englishmen which were captaines of that company, who raged in warlike sort in those Countreis, the space of 3. yeres and more, contrary to the King of Englands pleasure. This Robert Knowles being a meane man of birth became Captaine of many Souldiers, and did many marueilous acts. Anno reg. 32. 1358. T. Walsingham. Robert Knowles.

Isabell daughter to Philip the Faire, King of France, and wife to King Edward the second, deceased, apud Risinges iuxta London, the xxii. of August, and was buried in the middest of the grey Friers quire at London, in a tombe of Alabaster. Registrum fratrum minorum.

This yere King Edward begaun the new building in the Castle of Windsore, where he was borne, for which cause he procured to adorne that place with larger and more beautifull buildings: he appointed surueiour of this worke William Wicham a prudent and discreet man. But the keepe then called the round Table was begun (as afore is shewed) in the 18. yere of his raigne. The same yere dyed the noble and famous personages, to wit, Sir Roger Mortimer Earle Marshall of the Kings hoast, and one of his especiallest priuy Counsellors in Burgundy, in the towne of Roneray, he was buried at Wigmore, Thomas Earle of Oxford, Iohn le Grey steward of England, Geffry de Say, and many other. And in the Kings army that was beyond the Sea, there dyed aboue a thousand men of account. Also Geffrey de Northbrigges Bishop of Chichester deceased, and Robert de Straton succeeded. Castle of Windsore enlarged.

Iohn of Gaunt the Kings sonne (by dispensation) take to wife Blaunch daughter of Henry Duke of Lancaster his kinswoman. Anno reg. 33. 1359.

Iohn Beauchamp Constable of Douer, warden of ye portes, Knight of the Garter (sonne to Edward de Beauchampe, Earle of Warwike and brother to Thomas also Earle of Warwike) deceased, and was buried on the South side of the middle Ile in the body of S. Pauls Church in London: a faire monument of him remaineth there, by many ignorant people, mistaken, to be of Humfrey Duke of Glocester, who lyeth honorably buried at S. Albons. Iohn Beauchamp Constable of Douer, warden of ye portes, Knight of the Garter, buried in Paules.

The French K. vnder colour of peace, offered to K. Edward Flaunders, Picardie, Aquitaine, and other lands, which the Englishmen had ranged through and spoyled, for the performance whereof, messengers were sent into France, but the Frenchmen would not performe the offer, wherefore King Edward being angry, with a nauy of ships passed ouer Sea to Caleis, where diuiding his army into three parts, he committed one company to Henry Duke of Lancaster, another to Prince Edward, and the third he reserued to himselfe, and so passed into Burgundy. King Edward inuadeth Burgundy.

In the Lent season, the Normans with a small nauy arriued at Winchelsey, and partly burnt the towne, and slew such as did withstand them: wherefore the Prelates of England assembled from all parts in armour to withstand them. but when they had prepared themselues to battell, the French were gone, leauing behind them two of their ships, which stucke fast in the land, and two hundred of their men. Forrein enemies driuen backe.

King Edward with his power rode through France, by Picardy, Artois, Roan, Champaine, and so to Britaine, destroying the countrey before him. And here is to be noted, that the 14. day of Aprill, and the morrow after Easter day, King Edward with his hoast lay before the City of Paris, which day was full darke of mist and haile, and so bitter cold, that many men dyed on their horsebacks with the cold, wherefore vnto this day it hath beene called the Blacke Munday. The King of Nauarre vexed sore the marches of Normandy. Thus was the Realme of France miserably beset on all sides. At the last, a finall peace was concluded on this condition, that King Edward should haue to his possession, the countries of Gascoigne, Guyen, Poytiers, Limosin, Baleule, Erantes, Caleis, Guines, and diuers other Lordships Castles, Townes, and all the lands to them belonging, without knowledge of any soueraignitie or subiection for the same. This peace being confirmed by writing and by oath, King Edward came into England, and so straight to the Tower to see the French King, where he appointed his ransome to be three millions of Florences, and so deliuered him of all imprisonment, and brought him with great honour to the Sea, who then sayled ouer into France. Anno reg. 34. 1360. A great tempest. French King released.

King Edward the foure and twentieth of January began a Parliament at Westminster, Anno reg. 34. 1361. where where the forme of the agreement was read, and allowed of all estates, where the King on the last of January caused the nobles to sweare to hold and keepe the sayd agreement, especially those, as well Prelates as other that were not at Caleis, where he, Nowe, and other that were there with him.

And on the first of February following, the King restored to the Bishops all their houses lands, tenements, &c. as by his patents may appeare in effect as followeth. Edward by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland, and of Aquitaine, to all by these presents &c. Although the priory of Pontacute, in the County of Somerset (by reason of the warres betweene vs and France) with all the lands, tenements, fees, aduowsons, together with the goods and chattels belonging to the same, hath beene of late taken into our hands, and by vs farmed and rented forth, as appeareth by diuers patents. Now therefore, since peace is betwixt vs & the Noble prince, our most deare brother, the King of France, woe for the honour of God, and holy Church, restore to the sayd Prior, the Priory, with all the lands, tenements, fees, aduowsons: and whatsoeuer else belonging to the same, to hold the same, in as free manner as they held it before. And withall, forgiue and release all arrearages of rents which might be due vnto vs, by reason of any former grants. In witnesse, &c. the first of February the 35. yere of our raigne. Restitution of the Priory of Pontacute. Record.

The like letters of restitution had the bishoppes (in the patent) vndernamed, to wit, Worthampton, Arundel, Cameringham, Dritton, Pattewell, &c. to the number of one hundred and ten in England, besides them in Ireland, Normandie, & the parts of France. All which houses were cleane suppressed and dissolued, with many more by king Henry the fift.

A great dearth and pestilence happened in England, which was called the second pestilence, in which dyed Henry Duke of Lancaster in March, at London, and was buried in Leicester, in the Collegiate Church which he had founded, with a Deane, twelue Chanons, Prebendaries, as many Vicars, and other Ministers accordingly: and one hundred weake and sicke persons, fifty men, and fifty women, and ten other women to tend vpon them that were sicke and weake, so that the same College and Hospitall, at the suppression by King Henry the eight was valued by the yeare in Lands fiue hundred ninety and fiue pounds, seuen shillings, and fiue pence. The second pestilence.

There dyed also Reignald Lord Cobham, and Walter fitz Warren, valiant and famous knights, and fiue Bishops, to wit, Reignald of Worcester, Michaell of London, Thomas of Ely, Iohn of Lincolne, and Robert of Cicester. William Wickam bishop of Winchester. Iohn Forster.

There was then a priest in England, called William Wicham, who was also great with the K. that all things were done by him, and without him nothing was don. And so when ỳ Bishoprick of Winchester was void, the K. of England at the desire of the said priest, wrote to the Duke of Burbone that hee would for his sake require the Pope Vrban, that his chaplein might haue the bishoprick of Winchest. promising the Duke in his bonds, to intreat him right courteously for his imprisonment and bollage. When ỳ Duke of Burbon saw the K. of Englands messengers & his letter, hee was therof right ioyous: & hewed all the manner to the French K. who counselled him to go to the Pope for ỳ same, & so he did for he went to Auignion to the Pope, who was not as then gone to Rome, & so the Duke made his request to the Pope, ỳ he granted him, & gaue him ỳ Bishoprick of Winch. at his pleasure, so that the K. of England would be fauourable to him in the composition for his deliuerance that he fozsaid Wil. Wicham should haue the said Bishoprick. Then the Duke of Burbon returned into France, & so into England and there treated with ỳ king and his councell for his deliuerance, so he would then his buls from ỳ Pope. The K. of England loued so wel this priest, that the Duke of Burbon was deliuered quite, and paid 20000. Frankes. And so sir William Wicham was B. of Winchester and Chancellor of England.

The 4. of May the king made a composition in his Parliament betweene the two Vniuersities of ỳ one part, and the 4. orders of friers mendicants abiding within ỳ same Vniuersities on the other part, which before had continued many yeres in strife, to the great decay of learning, & much other hurt to both parties.

Anno reg. 41. 1367. T. Walsingham. Edward Prince of Wales, taking compassion of Peter king of Spayne, who was driuen out of his kingdome by Henry his bastard brother, entred Spayne, with a great puissance and in a battle at Nazers the 3. of Aprill, put to flight ỳ forsaid bastard, ouercame his power, & slew 6000. of his men, where there were taken 60. persons of name, and 2000. of the common souldiours, which done, hee restored the said Peter to his former dignitie, and returned home with great triumph and victory, but not long after, Henry the bastard, with K. Peter sate at a table, sodainly thrust him through with a speare, & inuaded the land by treason, which by open warre he could not doe.

The Bastard his brother driues Peter out of the land.

The Bastard slaine by treason.

Anno reg. 42. 1368. The Frenchmen tooke diuers townes and castles, in Poytow, that belonged to the king of England, and to the end they might the more effectually deceiue the king of England, the French K. sent him word, that he was readie to pay the residue of his fathers ransome, and to performe the conditions of peace: also hee sent him Mines out of Boheme and other presents, in token of loue: but it fortuned whiles the embassadors were in the kings presence, ỳ lamentable newes were brought of the fozcible inuasion of the Frenchmenne in Poytow which when the K. heard, he commanded the embassadors to get them home with their deceitfull presents, to their deceitfull Lord, whose mockes he would not long leaue vnreuenged. The Embassadors returning home, were met by the men of Caleis, who tooke their mules and other goods from them.

Subtilties of Frenchmen.

In the month of April, Leonel Duke of Clarence, with a chosen company of the English nobilitie went towards Millane, there to marry with Violentis the daughter of Galeacius the second of that name Duke of Millaine, of which marriage Paulus Iouius writeth thus, vpon the life of the said Galeacius: by meanes of peace being obtayned, and Barnabe (his) no lesse earnest endeuour labuing by fozce and armes to recouer the Principeome of Genoune as taken from him by fraud, and detained by iniury, Galeacius desired to fozstifie him elie vñ fozraine affinitie, glozious in deed, in princely pompe, but in euent to him and his vnfoztunate, matching his sonne Iohn Galeacius with Isabel daughter to Charles the French king, and his daughter with Leonell Duke of Clarence, son of the K. of England, to whom hauing receiued 200000. Flozences of gold for a dowry by the mariage of Violentis, ỳ cities of Mons regalis, and Alba Pompeis submitted themselues. And Isabel which came to ỳ Vsurp was so troublesome to her father in law, ỳ she cost him 200000. Flozences although ỳ yeelding of the Towne of Pictures, and the title of ỳ most honozable name had beene giuen to her new husband in part of her dowrie. Moreouer at the comming of Leonell, such abundance of treasure was in most bountcous manner spent, in making of most sumptuous feasts, setting fozth stately sights, and honouring with rare gifts aboue two hundred English men, which accompanied his son in law, as it seemed to surpasse the greatnesse of most wealthy Princes: for in ỳ banquet wherein Francis Petrarch was present, amongst the cheefest guestes, there were aboue thirty courses of seruice at the table, & betwixt euery course, as many pesents of wonderous price, intermixed, all which Iohn Galeasius, cheefe of the choise youth, bringing to the table, did offer to Leonel.

Marriage of Leonell.

Most sumptuous feast.

Costly gifts giuen.

There were in one only course seuenty goodly horses, adorned with silke and cluct furniture: and in the other siluer vessels, falcons, hounds, armor for horses, costly coates of mayle, breastplates glistering of maslie steele, helmets, & cozselets decked with costly crestes apparelled distinct with costly Iewels, sondry girdles, & tastly certaine gemmes, by curious art set in gold, and purple, and cloth of gold for mens apparrell in great abondance.

Frequents of a feast sufficient to serue three hundred men.

And such was the sumptuousnesse of that banquet, y^t the meats which were brought from the table, would sufficed thy hane serued 10000. men: but not long after, Leonell living with his new wife, whilest after the manner of his owne countrey, as forgetting or not regarding his change of aire, he addicted himselfe ouermuch to intimate banquettings, spent and consumed with a lingering sickenesse, died at Alba. Afterward Violandis was married to Otho Marquise of Montferat in Italy, who hadde no better successe then the other being in the hide of Pauie, stabbed through of a base horsekeeper, where he likewise died obscurely.

Anno reg. 43 1369.

The third mortalitie or pestilence was this yere, wherein died Blanch Duchesse of Lancaster, and was buried in Pauls Church at London.

The third pestilence. Dearth of corne

This yeere was a great dearth of Corne, so that a bushel of wheat at London was sold for two thillings sixe pence, of Barley twentie pence: of Oates twelue pence.

The 15. of August died Quéene Philip wife to Edward the third at Windesore, and was buried at Westminster.

Staples of Wooll.

Quéene Borough, Kingstone vpon Hull, and Saint Botulphs, alias Boston, were made Staples by Parliament.

The Kings sonne Iohn Duke of Lancaster, and Humfrey Bohan Earle of Hereford, with a great armie went into France where they little preuailed, because an huge Army of Frenchmen had pitched their Tents vpon the toppe of Chalke hill, neere vnto Caleis, so strongly, that they could not be set on without great losse and damage: but shortly after, Thomas Beauchampe earle of Warwicke arriued at Caleis with a number of chosen souldiers, at whose coming the Frenchmen leauing their tents and victuals, fled away, neuertheless he passed forth, spoyling and wasting the Ile of Caine with fire and sword, but as he returned to Nardis Caleis, he fell sicke whereof he died, and the other of the captains returned without honour.

Anno reg. 44 1370.

The K. borrowed great summes.

King Edward borrowed of the Prelats and other, many great summes of money, saying, hee would bestow the same in defence of the Church and realme, but about Midsomer hee sent a great army into France, whereof Sir Robert Knowles was generall, a man, who before time had valiantly handled ye beyond seawards, so long as they were ruled by his counsell: but toward winter, the young Lords sith they ought not to be subiect to him who was not so noble of birth, as they, and so deuiding themselues into diuers companies, Sir Robert Knowles departed into Britaine to his owne Castles which he had conquered: The Lords being so deuided, the Frenchmen set vpon them, take prisoners whom they listed, and slew the residue.

A great part of Gascoigne fell frō the prince, because of the strange exactions hee laid vpon them: also sickenesse encreasing vpon him, he returned into England with his wife and his sonne Richard, and resigned into his fathers hands the gouernment of Gascoigne.

The monasterie of Abingdon, fiue miles from Oxford, was spoyled by them of Oxford, together with the artificers of Abingdon.

Anno reg. 45. 1371.

In a Parliament at Westminster in ye first weeke of Lent, it was ordained that the great Charter and Charter of the forrest, should bee kept in all points. Also in the same Parliament, the Clergy of the realme granted to ye K. an ayd for ye wars in France, of fiftie thousand pound to be payed in the same yeere, vnto the leuying of which summe, Shauntrie pieces were taxed, according to the summe y^t they receiued by the yeere, also small benefices which were neuer taxed, &c. And the Lay of the Lords & commons also granted to the King the like summe of fifty thousand pound, in aid of the same warres, to bee leuied of all the parishes of England that is to wit, that euery parish should pay 23. shillings 4. pence, the great parishes helping the lesse: supposing (according to the common opinion) that there hadde bin so many parishes in England, that would haue sufficed in such manner to the said summe. By which meanes writs were directed to all the shires of England, to certifie vnto the King of all the Churches in euery shire, which also made the number of Churches to be examined. And it was found that the said summe of fiftie thousand pound, might not be leuied in manner as was thought. Whereupon ye King summoned a great councell at Westminster, against ye fifth weeke of Easter next following, & there was ordained that euery parish should pay fiue pound 16. shillings, the greater helpe the lesser. And then also was set downe the names of shires, with the number of Churches in euery shire, and the summe that euery shire should pay as followeth.

Sum of all the shires in England, without the Citty of London, and the Bishoppricke of Durham be 377. and of Parish Churches, 8600. and all the money amounted vnto 51181. li. 8. s. &c. Of the which was in the bishoppricke 718. li. 8. s. &c. By reason that Parishes in the County of Suffolke payd but 12. shillings, 7. ob. And the Parishes in the County of Deuonshire, paid but 112. shillings 10. d. farthing, for their great pouerty, and so was the King answered 40 50000. pound.

Cheshire a Countie Palantine came not to this Parliament.

In the Citty of Chester are 10. parish Churches, and in the shire without the Citty are 87. Parish Churches besides Chappels.

The Bishops were removed from the Offices of Chancellour, Treasurer, and privie Seale, and lay men put in their stead.

Sir Walter Manny deceased.

This yeare deceased the gentle Knight Sir Walter de Maine in the Citty of London, whereof all the Barons of England were right sorry, for the truth and good counsell that they had alwayes fame and heard in him: he was had alwayes fame and heard in him: he was buryed with great solemnitie in the Monastery of Charterhouse Monkes, which he had founded besides London, and at the day of his Obsequie, there was present the King and all his children, with the Prelats, Barons, & Knights of England. His lands both in England and beyond the sea fell to the earle of Penbroke, who had to wife the Lady Anne, his daughter and heyre. Also the valiant Knight Sir Willi. Molineux, who long serued in France, and was made Knight Banneret by the black Prince, at the battaile of Nazares, now returning out of France dyed at Canterbury, about the feast of S. Iohn Baptist. Also Sir Iohn Mandevile Knight, a man worthy the memory, borne in S. Albones, deceased, this man from his tender yeares so addicted himselfe to study, that therein he ac-counted a great part of his ioy & felicity to consist, for he reckoned that his worshipfull parentage little auayled, vnlesse he enabled the same by learned skill and literature, by vsing thereof so well furnished his minde with knowledge in the Scripture, he dired. his study to Physicke, being an art very seemely and worthy a gentlemanlike nature, but among all other things, his desire was very great to see Asia, and Africa, being two mighty portions of parts of the world, furnishing himselfe therefore, he like another Vlisses, being knowne of very few of his old acquaintance set forward.

Sir Iohn Mandeuile.

Sir William Molineux deceased.

In this his voyage he painefully visited the Countries of Scythia the greater & the lesser, Armenia, Aegypt, both the Countries of Lybia, Arabia, Syria, Iewry, Mesopotamia, Persia, Grecia, Illyricum, Tartaria, and other Kingdomes: finally hauing attained the knowledge of diuers tongues, least the variety and wonders of so many and so great things as he had seene with his eyes & knowne alway by memory, shou'd be vtterly drowned in oblivion, he wrote exactly in the Latine, French, and English tongues, these workes following, viz. his Itinerarie of 33. yeares, of the Marualles of the world, and the description of Countries: being returned into England, and noting the euill abuses of that his age & time, the godly Gentleman would say in these our times now it may bee trulyer sayd than euer before that vertue is layd aside, the Church is troden down, the Clergy erreth, the ciuell raigneth, simony beareth sway, &c.

I. Bale.

At length he died at Leiden, the 17. of November 1371. and was buried in the Abbey of the Williammites, thus farre Bale. To the confirmation whereof Abraham Ortelius in his Itinerarium, profelling to haue there yet monument of the knight Sir John Mandeuile in the citie of Leiden, setteth downe the inscription thus.

Epitaph of Sir John Mandeuill.

Heere lieth the noble man Sir Iohn de Mandeuile, otherwise surnamed knight at the beard, Lord de Campd, borne in England, a professor of Phisicke, a very deuout man in prayer, and a moste bountifull bestower of his goods on the poore, who after he had trauailed almoste ouer the whole world, ended his life at Leiden, the yere of our Lord 1371. the 17. of Nouem.

This is the inscription of the stone, sayeth Ortelius, in which there is grauen, the Image of an armed man, with a Lion at his feete vpon a two tailed beard, at his head a hard bleffing, with these wordes in French, Pou that paste by, for charitie say prayere for me.

The shield of his armes was voyd, they said there was within a plate, and his armes ingrauen therein, to wit, a Lion Argent, with a red crescent at his breast in a blew field, with a border indented Or: there was shewed his knines, his furniture for horse and his spurs, which he vsed in his trauailes through the world.

Anno reg. 46. 1372.

John Duke of Lancaster, & Edmond Earle of Cambridge, returning out of Spaine, brought with them two daughters of Peter late king of Spaine, whome afterwards they tooke to be their wiues: the Duke maried the elder, named Constance, and from that time lyued himselfe king of Castile.

Battell on the Sea.

The Englishmen fought a battell on the Sea with the Flemings, and tooke fiue and twentie ships laden with salt.

The French men besieged Rochell, to the removing whereof was sent the Earle of Penbroke, with a number of men of armes, vpon whom fell the Spanish nauye in the Hauen of Rochell, who slew and tooke the Englishmen, and burnt their Nauie. The Earle and manie noble men were carried into Spayne, together with the Kings money. King Edward with a great Nauie entred the Seas towards Rochel, to haue rescued the same, but the winde being contrarie, with heauie cheere hee returned againe, hauing spent in this preparation (as it was sayd) nine hundred thousand pound.

Earle of Penbroke taken prisoner.

Anno reg. 47. 1373. T. Walsing.

John Duke of Lancaster entred France with a strong power, and passed through the Realme without battle, but in the deserts and mountaines of Auuerne, for lacke of victuals, many of his armie died: from thence he went to Burdeaux, and brought scantly forty horses backe with him: it was commonly talked that he lost thirtie thousand horses in that vnluckie voyage. It was a great misery to see the poore state of the men of warre, such as were knights of great wealth in their Countrey hauing lost men and horses, were glad to begge from doore to doore and found no reliefe, for the Countrey was destroyed, and not manured, by reason whereof, such dearth was in that Countrey, that victualles could scant bee gotten for any money: The Duke yet wintered there. The tenth of April following, a day of battell was appointed betwixt him and the Duke of Anion at Tholouse. In the meane time, truce was taken till the twentieth of May next following, but the King of England knew nothing of it: When the day came, a great power of armed men for the French appeared, the which the Duke of Anion had assembled, but yet that day passed without battell, to the great shame and reproch of the English, for the French-meane said, they were readie in field the day appointed to iustice for their comming, that came not at all, wherefore they spake many reprochful words against the Englishmen, calling them false cowards, and heartlesse. And such was the ende of that iourney.

Parliament.

In a Parliament it was graunted that the Cathedrall Churches should enioy their elections, and that from thenceforth the King should not write against the elected, but should by his letters helpe towards their confirmation, but this statute tooke small effect: but the Clergy graunting a tenth, and the laitie a fifteenth, it was paid. John Thursby Archbishop of Yorke deceased, he began the new quire of y cathedrall church of Yorke, vnto the which in y laying of the first stone, he gaue 500. markes, and euery yere after whilest hee liued 200. pound to the same worke. Hee also adorned the Ladie chappell there with a maruelous worke-manship: he sate one and twentie yeres, he died at Thorpe and was buryed at Yorke, vnto whom succeeded Alexander Neuell Canon of Yorke. Also John Barnet Bishoppe of Ely deceased at Bishopes Hatfield, and was buried at Ely, vnto whom succeeded Thomas Arundell, son to Richard Earle of Arundell. Also William Line Bishoppe of Winchester deceased, vnto whom succeeded Henry Wakefield.

Christ church of Yorke repayred and builded.

Anno reg. 48. 1374.

John Duke of Lancaster with all his traine of Earles, Barons, knights, &c. returned out of Gascoigne into England in the moneth of July, after whose departure almost all Gascoigne fell from their allegiance, which they had couenanted of with the King of England, sauing Burdeaux and Bayon.

This yere dyed William Wittelsey Archbishop of Canterburie, at Lambeth, and was buried at Canterburie: the Monkes of Canterburie (by the Kings licence) made their election, but choosing the Cardinall of England, the King was so offended that he meant to outlaw them, and they were forced to purchase his fauour with a great price. Then Symon Tibalde, alias Sudburie, (Sonne to Nigellus Tibalde Gentleman of Sudbury in Suffolke) Doctour of both lawes, Bishoppe of London, was from thence translated to Canterbury, and William Courtney Bishop of Hereford, was translated to London, and y Bish. of Wangor, to Hereford.

John Duke of Lancaster, William Earle of Salisburie, Reignold Lord Cobham, with Simon

Simon Sudbury and other, assembled at Bridges to treate a peace betweene the Realmes of England and France, where met with them the Duke of Arnow, Guaine and other nobles of France. This treatie continued almost two yeres, and ended without conclusion of peace, but on a truce, which scantly continued one yere.

Anno reg. 49. 1375.

The same time Robert Wafield Bishop of Salisburie dyed, after whom succeeded Ralph Argay. Edward le Spencer deceased in the Castle of Cardiffe, & was buried at Thocketsbury. Also John Hastings Earle of Pembroke, who was taken of the Spaniardes, 4. yeres since was deliuered by Henry the bastard King of Spayne vnto Bertram Cleyken Constable of France, for a certaine some of money, which the said Henry did giue to the said Bertram, who when he was brought to Paris, and the summe of his ransome was limited to be 6. thousand Franks, the Lombards in Bridges became sureties therefore, and promised payment therefor, but he began to be sicke, so that the Frenchmen fearing least he should die in their hands, or euer they should get his ransome, made haste to bring him to Calays, notwithstanding he died before hee came there, and the French-men were deceiued of their purpose.

The Ile of Constantine was deliuered to the French King, to the great detriment of England, for which cause afterward Sir I. Anstey appeached Thomas Carrington of treason. A great heat was in England, so that many both men and women dyed thereof.

The Lord Latimer.

Good Parliament.

A Parliament commonly called the good parliament, was holden at Westminster, in the which, when a subsidie was demanded, answere was made by Peter de la More, Prolocutor of the Parliament, that the King nedeth not the subsidie of his poore Subiectes, if hee were well and faithfully gouerned, which he offered to proue effectually, and promised that if it were found that the King had erde, his subiectes should be readie most gladly to helpe him according to their power.

Anno reg. 48. 1347.

The Knights required to haue the Lord Latimer with other, removed from about the King whome they saide did giue him euill counsell, which being done, certaine Prelates, Earles, and other, were appointed to gouerne the King, who then was an olde man, but this endured not long. The commons also requested to haue remoued out of the Kinges house, a certaine proud woman called Alice Pierce, who by ouermuch familiaritie that she had with the King, was cause of much mischiefe in the realme, the exceeding the maner of women, late by the Kings Iustices, and sometimes by the doctors in the Consistories, perswading and disswading in defence of matters, and requesting thinges contrary to lawe and honestie, to the great dishonour of the King.

Alice Pierce.

Adam Burie late Bishop. Richard Lions late Sheriffe, Goldsmith.

Also Richard Lions and Adam of Burie, Citizens of London, were accused by the commons, of diuers fraudes and deceiptes, which they hadde done to the King: Richard Lions for money did wisely compound and escaped, the other conueyed himselfe into Flaunders.

Walch Prior deceased. Adam Bishop.

The 8. day of June, Prince Edward departed out of this life in the Archbishops pallace in Canterburie, who was in his time the Glory of Chiualrie: he was in the feast of S. Michael the Archangell, with great solemnitie buryed at Canterburie in Christs Church, & then king Edward created Richard Son of Prince Edward Earle of Chester, Duke of Cornewall, and Prince of Wales.

This yere in the moneth of June, the seruants and tenants of the Earle of Warwicke maliciously rose against the Abbey & conent of Euesham, and their tenants doing their worst to destroy the same for euer, beating their seruants, and killing some of them, & comming to the Yeamoris of the Pooles, they brake downe the pales of their parkes, & burnt the. One their Deere, they brake the hedges of the ponders and fish poles, let out their water, took the fish, and did many other damages, minding to haue destroyed the house, & ouerthrowne the walls: but the King had not sent commaundement to the earle to restraine their malefactors, & troublers of the peace, thus for feare of the king & motation of friends, a peace was made, but no sufficient recompence, for the damage was much more then y parties were able to make amends for: because of this presumption of the Earle, the king put him out of his councell, and would not be governed by the other Lords that were appointed thereto by parliament, but hee sent for the Duke of Lancaster against to governe the realme, by which occasion all they y before were banished the Court, came againe, as the Lord Latimer, Alice Pierce, and other, whose counsell he followed euen to the end of his life. The foresaid Alice is made so familiar with y king, as also her companions, that is to say, y Lord Latimer, and Sir Richard Stirie, that at their becke, the K. promised all matters of y Realme to bee disposed, whereupon they being desirous to bee reuenged vpon their accusers, ceased not vntill by the kings & dukes authority they had gotten sir Peter de la More, to y Kings court, whome without any answere, as gainst all iustice, they sent to the castle of Hewarke, there to be imprisoned. The Duke now laboured against Wil. Wicham Bi. of Winchester, & taking occasion by all waies and meanes he possibly could to indomage him, at y last amongst other thinges that hee obiected against him, hee charged him to haue beene false vnto the king, at what time he was Lord Chancellor, & although the Bishop in declaring of his innocetis was ready to bring forth for himselfe both sufficient reasons and witnesses, yet notwithstanding he caused him to bee condemned without making answere, William Skipwith being Iustice, & by the kinges authority tooke from him all the temporall goods of his Bishopricke, and that hee might gette the peoples fauour, he moued the king to giue the said goods to the Prince called Richard of Burdeaux, and so he vsed the young Princes name for his owne helpe. Furthermore, in the Kinges name, he forbad the bishop to presume to come

P. de la More imprisoned.

The Duke in Bishop of Winchester.

Wicham Bishop of Winchester deprined of his temporall goods.

How the earle of March and the deceit of the Duke of Lancaster.

In the meane time the Kings sickneſſe increaſed, and Phyſitions began to diſpaire of his recouery, although they haue named Alice together with Isabell her daughter did lie by him euery night. The Duke now who determined all matters of the Realme, commaunded Portmer Earle of March to go to Calais, where hauing ſet all things in order, he ſhould diligently view all the other caſtles more thereabout, but the Earle as he was a man of a good wit, conſidered that it was a dangerous time, and for the Duke had an old hatred againſt him, more he called to remembrance, how the Duke had vniuſtly impriſoned Sir Peter de la more his ſteward, and had oppreſſed the Biſhop of Winchester whome he had exempted from priuiledge of the kings pardon, and deſired to doe the like to him, if he could: he choſe therefore rather to loſe the rod, than his life, wherefore he reſtored the rod of his Marſhalſhippe vnto the Duke, ſaying: hee would not for a ſmall commoditie wrappe himſelfe into ſo great danger.

M. Percy made Marſhall of England.

The Duke reioycing that hee might with ſome honour reward Sir Henry Percie, preſently gaue vnto him the rod, and made him Marſhall of England, and by this meanes Sir Henry Percie was ioyned to the Duke but incurred as much hatred of the whole Communalty, as he had gotten fauour and loue of the Duke.

Matt. reg. 51.

The king kept his Chriſtmas at Hauering Abowe, where then for the great infirmitie of his body in his armes he lay ſicke.

The Duke vſing the kings authority, directed warrants to all the Lords and Barons of the Realme, that after Chriſtmas on Monday, 15. dayes after S. Hillary, they ſhould come to the Parliament at London, wherein the matters of the realme were to be talked of. To this Parliament came Richard of Burdeaux the prince, with a great number of noble men & Knights, to whom the Londoners at his comming preſented with diuers honorable gifts, and the Duke of Lancaſter alſo, ſeemed to honor him aboue the reſt, placing him in the Kings ſeate, and taught him to demaund of they would giue the 12. tenth in one yeere, or els of all the marchandiſe ſold in the realme of England for one yeere xii d. of euery pound. of euery firſthouſe one penny, & of euery knights fee, one pound of ſiluer, and eſpecially the Duke proſecuted the demand, ſaying that of neceſſity one of theſe points ought to bee graunted, for that the enemies had now proclaimed warre and would inuade the realme. The knights of the Parliament, whom the Duke had made at his pleaſure, deſired reſpite they might deliberately anſwere him, for all the other knights in the laſt Parliament had ſtoutely ſtod with the communalty, he had cauſed to be remoued, except twelue whome he could not remoue, a day was appointed them. Of the greater part, maiſter Hungerford was elected to deliuer their anſwere, who was a knight very familiar with the Duke, and was his Steward. Thoſe few whom wee haue ſaid to haue remained, endeauored that Sir Peter de la More might deliuer their anſwer, and alſo to anſwere all obiections that ſhould bee laid againſt him in preſence of the Lords. And further, if he ſhould be found faulty, to ſubmit himſelfe to the iudge, mind of the noble men preſent, but the knights preuailed nothing in their ſuite. For when one of the Knights urged the matter more then other, he was willed to hold his peace, otherwiſe it might coſt him his life. Whilſt theſe things were in handling, a ſubſidie was demanded for the King of the whole Cleargie. They therefore treating of this matter, firſt made a common complaint before the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, of the iniury offered vnto their brother William Wicham Biſhop of Winchester, which was alſo iniury vnto them all, and to the whole liberty of the Church whereſoeuer they affirmed they would not treat of other matters, vntill all the number of the Cleargie were together, for they pitying his fall, were moued againſt the Archbiſhop, thinking him a great hyred man for the Duke, and notwithſtanding the Archbiſhop affirmed, the aforeſaid Biſhop to be prohibited by the King not to come neare vnto his preſence, yet leaſt he ſhould be compelled, he ſent a commandement for him, that he ſhould come vp to the Conuocation of the Cleargy at London, who making no delay, came with a ſmall number of ſeruants, that before time was thought to excell all other in multitude attending vpon him, he was ioyfully receiued of his fellow Biſhops.

The Cleargy regardeth the infortunate of the Biſhop of Winchester.

In the meane time the Duke ceaſed not to his followes to imagine how hee might bring to paſſe, which he had long conceiued in his mind: for he ſaw it would be hard for him to obtaine his purpoſe, the Church ſtanding in his full ſtate and very dangerous to attempt publikely to do thoſe things, the lawes and cuſtomes of London being in force, whereſoeuer he laboured firſt to ouerthrow as well the liberties of the Church as of the City: for which cauſe he called vnto him a certaine Diuine, who many yeares before in all his acts in the Scholes, had inueyed againſt the Church, for that he had beene deprined by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury from a certaine benefice that he vniuſtly (as was ſaid) was incumbent vpon within the Citie of Oxford, his name was Iohn Wicliffe, who with his Diſciples, were of the common people called Lollards, they went bare-footed and baſely clothed, to wit in courſe ruſſet garments downe to the heeles, they preached, eſpecially againſt Monks, and other religious men that had poſſeſſions, &c. Amongſt other things he denyed the Biſhop to haue authority to excommunicate any perſon, and that any Prieſt might abſolue ſuch a one as well as the Pope.

The Duke ſeeth for Iohn Wicliffe.

T. Walſingh.

That neither the King, nor other ſecular Lord could giue any things perpetually to any perſon of the Church.

That (as he affirmed) in the time of William Rufus it was practiſed in England, for whom as for other Kings of the Realme (notwithſtanding he tooke away the Church goods) the church of England prayeth, which if the doe law fully, then doth well: and to ſay that doth it vnlawfully, were abſurd.

That the temporall Lords (if they hadde power) might lawfully take the goods of ſuch religious perſons, to relieue their neceſſities, &c. when he had taught theſe and many other, not only in the Scholes at Oxford, but alſo had preached them publikely in London, that he might thereby get the fauour of the Duke & others, whome he had found prone to heare his opinions, not onely Lordes, but alſo certaine Citizens of London, (for he was not only eloquent, but alſo learned to contemne temporal goods, for the loue of eternall riches, & therefore his converſation was with thoſe religious that had no poſſeſſions, and adorned himſelfe into the begging Fryars, approuing their poouerty & extolling their perfection) The Duke I ſay, and Sir Henry Percy, commended highly his opinions, and indeuoured to extoll his learning and honeſtie of life aboue all other. Who therefore being thus ſet forth with their fauour, feared not to ſpread his doctrine, much more then before, going from church to church, and preaching his opinions. Whereuppon at length, th. Biſhoppes wakened their Archbiſhop, who ſent for this John to come & anſwere to thoſe things that were ſpoken of him. And the Duke hearing thereof, ſent for 4. Doctors of Diuinitie, one of euery order of the begging fryars, aduertiſing them, that with a natural and olde hate, hee purſued the religious perſons that had poſſeſſions, neyther was it difficult to compell the willing Fryars to ayde him in this point.

Wicliffe in Paules church in London.

John Wiclife was to appeare before the biſhops on Thurſday the nineteenth day of February there to be conuicted, for words that he had ſpoken, who, after the ninth houre, the Duke and Sir Henry Percy, and diuers others aſſiſters going before him, was brought forth, not only by the comon ſergeants, but alſo by ſir Henry Percy himſelfe, who was chiefe Marſhall of England, being by the way animated by his fauourers, not to feare the Biſhops, neither the concourſe of the people, ſaying that hee was walled in with ſo many Knights and other: he was brought into S. Pauls Church, where ſuch a multitude of people were gathered together to heare him, that it was hard for the noble men to paſſe through, & that he might eſcape death intended him by many Biſhops. And firſt a diſſention being raiſed between the noble men and Biſhoppes, it was thought his anſwere ſhould haue been deferred. But when the people being gathered round together, ſtaied to giue place vnto the noble men, Sir Henry Percy abuſing his authoritie, pricked forwardes the people, which the Biſhop of London ſeeing, prohibited him to exerciſe ſuch authoritie in the Church, ſaying that if he had knowne he would haue vſed himſelfe ſo there, he ſhould not haue come into the Church, if he could haue letted him. Which the Duke hearing, and being offended, proteſted, that hee would exerciſe ſuch authoritie, whether hee would or not. When they were come into our Ladies Chappell, the Duke and Barons, with the Archbiſhop and Biſhops, ſitting downe, the foreſaid John was alſo ſent in by Sir Henrie Percy, and by him willed to ſit downe, for becauſe (ſaid he) he hath much to anſwere, he hath need of a better ſeate. On the other ſide, the Biſhop of London affirmed it to be againſt reaſon, and alſo contrary vnto Law, th. thee ſhould ſit, who there was cited to anſwere before his ordinarie: hereupon very contumelious words did arife betwixt Sir Henry Percy, & the Biſhop, ſo that the whole multitude began to be troubled, and then the Duke began to reprehend the Biſhoppe with ſtout words, and the Biſhop to turne the like to the Duke againe: whereuppon the Duke being angrie that hee could not in this ſtate reuenge, ſware that he would pull downe both the pride of him, and of all the Biſhops in England, and added then ruſtell (ſaid he) in thy parents, who can profite thee nothing. The Biſhop answered, I truſt not in my parents, nor in the life of any man, but in God, in whom I ought to truſt: then the Duke whiſpering in his eare, ſaid, he had rather draw him forth of the Church by the haire of the head, then to ſuffer ſuch things at his hand.

Concerning a loude boyce.

London & Duke.

The Londoners hearing theſe words, with a loude boyce cryed out ſwearing they would not ſuffer their Biſhop to be thus iniuried, and that they would rather loſe their liues then their Biſhop ſhould be diſhoneſtly vſed in his Church, or pulled out as was threatned. Their furie was the more increaſed againſt the Duke, for that the day before in the Parliament in Weſtminſter, the Duke being preſident: It was requeſted in the Kings name that from that day forward there ſhould be no more Maior of London, according to the auncient cuſtome, but a Captaine ſhould be appointed, and that the Marſhall of England, as well in the citie as in other places, might arreſt ſuch as offended, with many other things, which were manifeſtly againſt the liberties of the Citie: which being once heard Iohn Philpot a worthy Citizen arofe, and anſwered, &c.

The morrow after, the Londoners aſſembling themſelues together, take counſell vpon ſuch demands as the day before the Lords L. of Woodſtocke, and Sir H. Percy had had concerning the creation of a Captaine in the Citie, & of the pr. of the Marſhals office, &c. Beſides of the iniurie that was offered to their Biſhop, and other matters: and whilſt there was great adoe and long talke about theſe things, there entered into the Cittie the Lord Fitzwalter, and Guido Brian, whether to know their minds, or for otherwiſe vncertaine, but the commons ſcarcely hold their handes from beating them that came vncalled for till at the length they had ſworne their comming was not for any hurt vnto them or to the Citie. The Lord Fitzwalter hauing gotten fauour at the Citizens hands, began his Oration, the effect whereof was, that he being by ancient inheritance Standerd-bearer to the citie, was to take iniuries offered vnto them, as to himselfe, and therefore willing them to looke to their defence, they presently tooke armor, and ranne with great rage to the Parthalls Inne, they brake vppe the gates, and doores, brought out a prisoner gyues and all, wherin his feare were sathed, intending to burne them in the midst of the Citie. Sir Henry Percie is sought for, the armed men ran vp and downe, but all in vaine, for that day he and the Duke were to dine with one Iohn of Ippe, but the Londoners knewe it not: for they thought that he and the Duke had beene at the Sauoy, and therefore with all haste posted thither, but one of the Dukes knights seeing these things, in great haste came to the place where the Duke was, and after that he had knocked and could not get in, hee said to Hauerland the Porter, if thou lone my Lord & thy life, open the gate, with which wordes, he got entrey, and with great feare he tolles the Duke, that without the gate were infinite numbers of armed men, and vnlesse hee tooke great heede, that day should be the last. With which words, when the Duke heard them, he leapt so hastily from his oysters, that hee hurt both his legges, against the fourme: some was offered to his oysters, but hee would not drinke for haste, he fledde with his fellow Sir Henry Percie, no manne following them, and entring the Thames neuer stinted rowing vntill they came to a house neere the Sauoy in Kenington (beside Lambeth) where at that tyme the Princesse was, with the young Prince, before whom he made his complaint. The Princesse hauing heard their talke, comforted them, promising that she would make a finall end of all those matters.

The common people of the cittie not knowing that the Duke was fled, in great fury hasted to the Sauoy, & against chaunting to make them, asked some what that busines meant, Whereunto he was answered, that they went to take the Duke and the Lord Percie, that they ought to be compelled to deliuer to them Sir Peter de la More whome they vniustly kept in prison: the priest saide that Peter de la More was a traytor to the king, and was worthie to be hang'd. With which words they all cryed, this is Percy, this is the traytour of England, his proper beloyayeth him, though hee be disguised in apparell: then ranne they all vpon him, striuing who should giue him his death's wound; after they had wounded him, they caried him to prison, where he dyed. The Bishop of London, William Courtney, hearing that the Citizens hasted to the Sauoy, left his dinner and met with them, admonishing them to be mindfull of the holy time (for it was Lent) and for the loue of Christ to leaue off from such seditious doings, affirming ỳ he would bring all things ỳ were don against them to good end. And doubtlelle had not the Bishop allwaged their madde mindes, the Duke and the Lord Percie had that day lost their liues, but by the Bishops meanes the matter was pacified for the time, and euery man got him to his owne house. Then were the Dukes armes hanged vp reuersed in signe of treason, in the most principall stretes of the cittie, vncertaine by whom: all that ware the Dukes signe or colors, were fayne to hide them, conueying them from their necks, into their bosome. The Pucelle (wife to Edward late deceased) desirous to make peace, sent into London these knights, Albert de Vere, Simon Burley, and Lewes, Clifford, to perswade them, to make peace vnto the Duke, vnto whom the Citizens made answere, that they would doe for her honor, what soeuer she had commanded, but yet they enioyned the knights, to will the Duke, that hee should suffer the bishop of Winchester to come to his answere, and to be tryed by his Peeres, and also to permit Peter de la More to answere for himselfe, after the custome of the law; and as for the third, they said they would account a traytor, wheresoeuer he should be found. The said knights no other wise then they had heard of the Citizens, reported vnto the Duke with full mouth, whereby they made the Duke very wofull, for whereas they had spoken of a traitor, this (said he) they speake of me, though it be not true.

The Londoners hauing held a counsell about this matter, sent of their chiefe Citizens, eyther to inquire, or to excuse that which had happned, who suing long to come to the Kings presence, being kept backe by the Duke, at the length the Duke tolde them that the king was very euill at ease, and that his sickenes might be increased, if that he were moued to anger, by their speech. But the citizens, whose chiefe man & speaker was John Philpot, answered the Duke, that they were not come by any meane to augment the Kings sickenesse, but rather to mitigate his griefe, that he might be strong to defend them. Moreouer, they sayd they were charged not to communicate those matters which they had in commission from the Cittie vnto any other then vnto their liege Lord the King. At length hauing gotten accesse, they shewed vnto the King, how it had beene published in the Parliament, that it was his will, that contrary to their liberties, the Sayo should be depaled, and a Captaine created, and other matters in the Parliament, which sounded against their liberties. Also they excused themselues of diuers things which had beene done, during the tyme of the commotion of the comonaltie of the citie, saying they were not priuie to any such doing, but that amongst so great a multitude, some lewd people had done such things, neither so great a multitude could be moued by the exhortation of the Sayo, when they were once vppe together. The King being a little cheered vp with their comming, answered, that he would not the diminishing of their liberties, no, he was rather readie, if neede were, to augment them, neither did any such resolutions euer come out of his mouth, & therefore, he willed them not to feare, but to returne and appease ỳ citizens, and to keepe them in peace.

In the meane space some men ceased not to make rimes in reproch of the Duke, & to fasten them them in diuers places of the Citty, whereby the greater fury of the people might be kindled, the dukes fame blotted, & his name had in detestation. Which tyning when the Duke heard, hee requested the Bishops to pronounce sentence of excommunication vpon all those that by such rymes maliciously did hurt his fame. The Bishop of Winegor therfore (the Aldermen of the city assisting him) publikely excommunicated all those that defamed the Duke &c.

A few dayes after the Duke went vnto the Parliament, that for the causes expressed had beene pretermitted: the Duke and noble men being set, they demanded an answere of the knights of the shires, of these things which had bin demanded of them: who answered, that they would to help their soueraigne Lord the king grant, not of euery house one peny but of euery person, man or woman aboue the age of fourteene yeres one groat throughout England, so that the money should be gathered into the hands of certaine Earles and Barrons vntill they saw how such a summe should be spent. The clergie also granted the like subsidy, to help of the king of euery head, as well religious men as women, as secular Priests one groat, if they were not promoted, but of euery religious person promoted twelue pence.

The Duke hauing obtained as he desired, the rate of all the heads of the whole realme, was not yet quiet, for the iniury done against him by the Londoners: wherefore he caused the K. to send for the Sayo, Aldermen and Shiriffes of London, who being brought into the kings chamber of presence, (being then at his mannour of Shine) they found the King placed in a chaire, not able well to speake, for the greife of his sickines, and the Archbyshop, with other Bishops, the Duke and the kings sons with many Lords and men of honour sitting about him. Where after due reuerence made, and silence commanded, Sir. Robert Alton began an oration, perswading the citizens to confesse their great & heinous offences against the K. and Duke, and to submit themselues to their mercy. Whereunto the Londoners answered that they had not conspired against the Duke, neither had there beene any shamefull thing spoken or done against him that they did know of, or consent vnto, which thing they were ready to proue before their soueraigne Lord the King, & the duke himselfe: Yet notwithstanding they affirmed, that they could not stay the folly of the comon people, by whom that which had chanced was committed: wherefore the said Citizens requested the king that he would not punish these that were innocent and ignorant of the fact: but they for reuerence of the King, promised the duke that they would indeuour themselues to bring in the common people, and to compell them by law to make due satisfaction; and more (sayd they) we are not able to doe for the Duke, that maybe to his honor. And at this word, with the Kings will, they were dismissed, full merry when they saluted the Court with their backes.

After this the King sent vnto them, secretly commanding them to call all the Citizens together, and to make one ware Candle or Taper with the armes of the duke his some in the same Taper, and carry the same in solemne procession to Saint Paules Church, there continually to burne before the Image of our Lady, continued at the charges of the Citie. The ware Taper therefore being made, the Citizenes by voyce of the crier, are generally called together, at which call, they come to heare the cause of their calling, the communaltie and those of the proper state contemned to bee present at such a procession, and therefore with indignatiō euery one departed home to his house, only the wealthpfull and best sort of the Citizens make the procession, placing the Taper of ware where they were commanded. But the Duke not contented with this satisfaction, he threatned the Citizens, and said, that that which they had done was nothing grateful vnto him, nay said he, it rather recounteth to my great shame, chiefely, for that while he was alive and in good healthy, they had in such sorte offered his armes wrought in a ware Taper.

On the other side the Citizens affirmed that they had expressely done that which pertained to a father had commanded them, and would haue done any thing that might haue pleased him. To whom the Duke answered, that they knewe his mind, and were not ignorant how to make satisfaction: with which wordes the Citizens were much troubled, (for quoth they) an ongst themselues, hee would haue vs to proclaime him king: but that shall neuer be done, and so they parted, more friends then they were before. And the Duke ceased not till he had put downe Adam Stapl. Sayo, in whose place Nicholas Brembar was elected, & on the nine and twentith of March tooke his oathe at the Tower of London, Also the Aldermen were depos'd and other set in their places.

Sir Iohn Minstarworth Knight who had traiterously forsaken the English armie, at that time when Sir. Robert Knowles was sent to inuade France, was drawne, hanged and quartered on the 12. of Aprill, his head was set on London bridge, & his foure quarters were sent to foure principall citties of England.

In the meane time William Wicham Bishop of Winchester, seeing the lawes of the land to bee handled, not according to iustice, but as it pleased certaine persons, and being destitute of all mens helpe, he turned himselfe to womankind, promising not onely for himselfe, but also for the oppression and losses of his Church. Therefore knowing ỳ Alice Piers could doe all things that shee would, and there was not any man that would in any thing resist her will, hee requested her helpe, hee offered her money, he promised her great friendship, if she could helpe his Bishoprick forth of such troubles: she promised easily to dispatch his cause and not refusing that which was offered, went to try if any sparke of loue yet remained in the King. She therefore that long had bin taken with her loue, enclosed with her speech, supposed nothing to be denied her her now that she asked: against ỹ Dukes will. he commanded his temporalities to bee giuen vnto him againe, and so the Bishop by right, and wrong, recouered that was lost.

Countesse of Pembrooke dieth.

The fourteenth of Aprill died the Lady Mary of S. Paule, Countesse of Pembrooke, a woman of singuler example, for liuing to the honor of God, and glory of her house, in relieuing poore mens necessities, thee spent her goods, that to ỹ Dukes and Princes she bestowed examples of good workes: and dying she gaue all her substance, either to her seruants, or to diuers Churches, but especially to poore people: shee founded Pembroke Hall in Cambridge, and named it Aue Maria Vaincola Anno. 343.

Chaucer and other sent into France.

About the same time the Earle of Salisbury, and Sir Richard Anguishon a Poyton, the Bishop of Saint Davids, the Bishop of Hereford, Geffery Chaucer, (the famous Poet of England,) and other were sent into France to treat a peace, or at the least a truce for two yeeres or more, but they could not obtaine any longer truce, then for one moneth, which they vtterly refused. Whereuppon they stayed in France about these things, and some thinking they might safely haue passed betwixt Calcis, and Douer, about fiftie taking shippe, were forthwith intercepted by the Galleyes, and were all slayne, two men and two women onely escaped, euen in the very sight of ỹ Townsmen of Caleys, they being not able to giue them any ayde: Sir Hugh Caueley being at that present time Captaine of Caleys, take this so great an iniury in verie euill part especially for that it was done, whilest they were yet treating of peace, but hee could not helpe it, wherefore forthwith hee take with him a number of the best and chosen out men, and purposing to reuenge this iniury, made a roade into France, killing a great number of men, and brought backe with him a great booty of artillery and cattell, the messengers returned into England, and brought nothing backe with them, but rumors and warre.

Hugh Caueley Captaine of Calcis.

Alice Pierce leueneth king Edward.

King Edward feebled (as it were) with the disease of the Annuly (which time was giuen him of God to the vse of penitence) had almost sodainely died, neglecting the benefite of time ỹ God had giuen him, like as hee should neuer haue died: trusting the fond fables of the oft named Alice, when she affirmed, he should recouer his health, so ỹ at that time he talked rather of hawking, & hunting, then of any thing ỹ pertained to the sauing of his soule, onely he granted pardon of death for offences, throughout his kingdome to the inhabitants. Being now sodainely taken with the daye of his death he began to haue manifest signes thereof: what Alice Pierce then did, any man may iudge, although we set them not downe in writting, for all one as she saw the king had set foote within deaths mase, she bethought her of slight, yet before she went, that all men might perceaue that she loued not the king for himselfe but for that which was his, she take the rinages from his fingers, which for the royaltie of his Paiestie he was wont to to weare. Thus yelding him such thankes for his benefites, she bade him adieu, and so withdrew her selfe from him.

The King being thus at the point of death, was left not onely of her the said Alice Piers, but of other the knights and Esquires, who hadde serued him, allured more with his gifts then his loue. Amongst a thousand there was only present at that time a certaine Priest, (other of his folkes applying the sporte of what they could lay hands on) who lamenting the Kings misery, and inwardly touched with griefe of heart, for that amongst so many Counselliers which he had, there was none ỹ would minister to him the word of life, came boldely vnto him, and admonished him to lift vp the eyes, as well of his body as of his heart vnto God, & with sighes to aske mercy of him, whose maiestie he well knew he had grieuously offended, whereupon the king listening to the words of the priest, although he had alittle before wasted the vse of his tongue, yet then taking strength to him, seemed to speake what was in his mind, and then what for weaknesse of his body, contrition of his heart, and sobbing for his sins, his voyce and speech failed him, and scarce halfe pronouncing this word Iesu, hee with this last word made an end of his speech, & yelded vp the Ghost at his manner of Shine (now Rich mount) on the 21. day of June, in the yeere of our Lord 1377, and the 51. yeere of his age, when he had reigned 50. yeeres, foure moneths and odde dayes, whose body was afterwards solemnely buried at Westminster.

This king surpassed all his predecessours, through vertue granted to him from aboue, in a certaine excellency of magnanimitie of heart: hee neuer feared any thing or changed countenance for any misfortunat chances whe they happened, a noble warrier and fortunate, for as well by land as by sea, in warlike conflicts he obtained the victorie, gentle, familiar and courteous as well towards strangers, as his owne Countrey-men and subiects, deuout in Gods seruice, for hee had the Church and Ministers thereof in great reuerence. In worldly carestractable, prudent in counsell, and discreet, in sweetnesse of language affable and meeke, in gesture and manners well ordered and ripe, hauing compassion of the afflicted: in bestowing of benefits very liberall, in abundance of wealth modest enough, in creating of buildings marueilous curious, bearing losses patiently, giuen much to hawking, & hunting, to the which, whilest he had time, as the season of the yeere gaue, he applyed himselfe greatly, he was liberall in gifts, and prodigall in expences, proper of person, in stature neither such as excelled the meane bignes of men, nor yet of the lowest sort, hauing a countenance more reuerent, then was commonly in men, but rather like an Angell, in which did shine such a marueilous grace, that such as beamed of him, hoped the day following for good lucke, he gouerned his kingdome euen till his old yeres valiantly, wisely & royally. But yet he did not restraine riotous lust, carnall concupiscence, nor motions, of the flesh, euen in his extreame age, and so (as was thought) for his intemperancie ended his life the sooner.

Issue of K. Edward the third.

He had Issue by the Lady Philip his wife, seauen Sonnes, Edward the Blacke Prince, William of Hatfield that dyed young, Leonel Duke of Clarence, John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, Edmond of Langley E. of Cambridge, & Duke of Yorke, William of Windsor that dyed without issue, Tho. of Woodstocke Earle of Buckingham, and D. of Glocester: and fiue daughters, Isabel married to the Lord Couey, Earle of Bedford, Ioane Quene of Spaine, Blanch that dyed young, Mary married to Iohn Mountfort D. of Britaine, and Margaret Countesse of Pembrook. He founded Calkuinster, commonly called new Abbey, neere vnto the Tower of London, wherein he placed white Monks of the order of Cisteaux, to the honour of God, and our Lady of grace, according to a vow by him made, being on the seas in great perill, by meanes of a tempest: he founded an Abbey for Nunnes at Dertford in Kent, he founded the Kings hall in Cambridge for poore scholliers, (which Hall with others was suppressed by King Henry the eight, for the foundation of Trinitie College there) he also founded an Hospitall for the poore, and named it Maison de Dieu, or Gods house, in the towne of Calcis, he redified or new builded S. Stephens Chappell at Westminster, altering the same into a colledge of a Deane, 12. secular Chanons, 12. Vicars, and other ministers and seruants, and indued it with reuenues to the value of 500. pounds by the yere. He also redified or almost newly builded the Castle of Windsor. He also augmenting the Chappell there, which his progenitors Kings of England, had before erected of 8. Chanons, he added to them a Deane and 15. Chanons, 24. poore and impotent Knights, & other Ministers. Quene Mary was the first that brought water to that castle by Conduite, which before was wayered by welles. It remaineth of record which I haue seene, that thee hath beene payed at Windsor for wine pressed out of grapes, that were wont to grow in the little Parke there.

THE LIFE AND RAIGNE OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

An. Reg. 1.

RICHARD the Second, borne at Burdeaux, the Sonne of Prince Edward being but eleuen yeres old began his raigne the 21. day of June in thepeere of our Lord God 1377. In beauty, bountie, and libra lity, he far palledall his progenitors, but was ouer-much giuen to rest and quietnes, louing little deds of armes, and for that he was yong, was most ruled bypoung counsell, and regarded nothing the counsels of the sage and wise men of the Realme, which thing turned this land to great trouble, and himselfe to extreame misery, as is by these verses declared.

Vox clamantis in Io. Gower.

When this King first began to raigne,
the Lawes neglected were,
Whereforé good fortune him forsooke, and th'earth did quake for feare,
The people also whom he pol'd,
against him did rebell,
The time doth yet bewaile the woes,
that Chronicles doe tell.
The foolish counsell of the lewd,
and young he did receiue,
And graue aduice of aged heads,
he did reiect and leaue,
And then for greedy thirst of Coyne,
some subiects he accused,
To glide their goods into his hands,
thus he the Realme abused.

On the 16. of June, before the old King was departed, the Londoners hauing certaine knowledge, that he could not liue any season, sent the chiefest and most worthy citizens of their citie, vnto Kenington, where the Prince and his mother remained, to declare vnto the said Prince their ready willes, and god will to accept him for their true and lawfull King and Gouernour, John Pulpot being especially appointed to doe the message, began his Oration thus.

John Philpot his Oration to the Prince

Wee bring newes, most excellent Prince (which without great sorrow wee cannot report) of the vndoubted death of our most inuincible King Edward your Grandfather, who hath kept and gouerned vs, and this Kingdome (as I may say) a long time in quiet peace: and now by the manifest tokens of death in him, he hath ceased to be our Gouernour: wherefore wee beseech you on the behalfe of the Citizens, and City of London, that you will haue recommended to your good grace, the Citie your chamber, whom wee knowledge chiefly to be our King, to whose rule we onely submit our selues, and bow to your will and pleasure vnder your dominion to serue in word and deede. And that wee execute further our message, your reuerence knoweth, your City to be vnspeakably troubled for that you haue withdrawne your presence from it, which is knowne to be so much at your deuotion, that the Citizens are not only ready to spend their goods for your sake, but also to ieopard their liues. Therefore we come to your presence, to beseech you that it may please you to remaine there, both to the comfort of vs your Citizens and also to the subuersion & solace of your selfe. We further beseech you most noble Prince, that you would vouchsafe to make some good and profitable end of the discord, which lately hath risen through the malice of some, and not to the commodity of any, but to the hinderance and discommodity of many, betwixt our Citizens, and the Duke of Lancaster. To these and other like words uttered by the said John Philpot, it was answered by the Prince, and his Councell, that he would doe his endeauour to satisfie their desire in all things, and so being sent away, they returned bringing glad tidings to their fellow Citizens.

The next morrow there was sent to London, on the Kings behalfe, the Lord Latimer, Sir Nicholas Bond, Sir Simon Burley, and Sir Richard Adderberry, which in name of the new King, saluted the Cittizens with their message of the new Kings towardnes, who promised to loue them and their citie, and to vse to them as they had requested: they also told the Cittizens how the King had spoken to the Duke for them, and how the Duke in all things had submitted himselfe to the Kings will, that they also should submit themselues in the same manner: and then the King would endeuour himselfe that peace should be concluded, to the honour and commodity of the Cittizens: but the cittizens fearing such forme of peace as might happen, answered, that they would not in any wise so do, especially because they knew the King to be but young, & weake to helpe them in such a troublesome businesse, and that their cause should not be discussed by him, but by their deadly enemies, and so they should bee punished at their pleasure, if they consented to the Kings request in that Article. At length after talke had vpon this businesse, fiue houres together or more, they light vpon this point, that if the said Knights would be bound to the Cittizens, that their submission should not redound to the temporall losse, or bodily harme of any cittizen, or preiudice of their citie, they would gladly obey the Kings commandement. The Knights desirous to satisfie the Kings desire, and to prouide for the quietnes of the Cittizens, vndertake by oath of fidelity, and their Knighthod, that it should not be to their dishonour, but to their commodity, if they would submitte themselues. This surety received, the cittizens take their iourney towards Shithe, where they found the new King with his mother, the Duke and the Dukes brethren: there were also many Bishops gathered about the dead body of the late King: The comming of the cittizens being knowne to the King, he straight commanded them to be called before him, the which cittizens as before, besought him to reforme the iniuries betwixt the Duke and them, affirming that they were ready in all things to submit themselues vnto his will and pleasure, not as though they confessed they had made any fault against the Duke, but as men that came at this time for the benefit of peace, and honour, aswell to the King, as the Duke, to pacifie the hearts and mittigate the displeasure of both.

The Duke of Lancaster and the Citizens of London make friends.

The Duke seeing them in this manner to haue submitted themselues to the King, though (as it was said) hee had other matters in his head, yet fearing that hee should not afterward come to so honourable conditions, if hee refused this forme of peace, fell downe at the Kings feete, and beseeched him to take the cause in hand betwixt the forme, that the Londoners had oppressed, desiring therewith, that they which had beene imprisoned for any dishonour offered him, might be by the Kings fauour released and set at liberty: And so hee did forgiue the Cittizens whatsoeuer they had committed against him, and receiued them into his full fauour, in the presence of the King, affirming with an oath, that hee would be their friend, and as carefull for their commodities as for his owne, and in token of an vnfained peace, hee kissed euery one of them before the King, and so with quietnesse, the Cittizens returned home, praising God, that had brought the Duke to such humilitie, who a little before had demanded in great pride of the Cittizens for his fauour, one hundred Hogsheads of wine, and an infinit number of precious stones. The Friday next following, the Duke and Cittizens came to Westminster, where was proclaimed the vnion and agreement betweene them.

The King accepteth the Duke and Bishop of Winchester.

The young King desirous at his entring to the Kingdome, to haue an vnity amongst his subiects in euery place, brought the Duke and the Bishoppe of Winchester to be at one, and wheresoeuer hee knew in his Realme any discord and variance to be risen, he take the quarrells in his hands, promising to make a good and fruitfull end for both parties. He also deliuered Peter de la More, (a Knight of Herefordshire) out of the Castle of Nottingham, where he had long beene emprisoned, and by his letters patens, released him of all things whatsoeuer, in the name of the King, might be layde vnto him.

Peter de la More set at liberty.

Vpon the feast day of Saint Peter and Paul, the Apostles, in the morning, the Frenchmen, with fiue vessells, great and small, inuaded the Towne of Rye, and with small labour, tooke the Towne, albeit, the Towne dwellers vpon confidence of strength, had taken order that none should remoue their goods from the towne, that at the least wise for loue of their goods, they might with more courage abide the conflicte: yet notwithstanding, they turne their backes in the time of battell, whereupon it came to passe, that by their want of heart and courage, the Towne was taken with all their goods.

The French men take the Towne of Rye, and burne it.

The Abbot of Battayle hearing of so lamentable a report, put his men in armour to defend the billages nigh adioyning, and one of the enemies going forth for forage, being taken by one of the Abbots men, declared that the French-men purposed to keepe the said Towne for ten dayes, whereupon the Abbot removed with his power to the towne of Winchelsey, which towne, (as the prisoner reported) the French purposed to assault, but when they saw the Abbot and his men armed in that Towne, dispairing of further entrance into that Cemetrie, they beginne to set fire on the Towne of Rye, and within fiue houres brought it wholly vnto ashes, with the Church that then was there of a wonderfull beauty, conueying away, foure of the richest of that Towne prisoners, and taking 66. left not aboue eyght in the Towne: 42. hogsheads of wine they carried from thence to their ships, with the rest of their booty, and left the Towne desolate.

The Towne of Rye consumed with fire.

King Richard the second. Foure Earles, Knights made.

King Richard was crowned with great solemnity at Westminster, by the hands of Simon Sudbury, Archbishop of Canterbury, on the 16. day of July. At this coronation King Richard created foure new Earles, Thomas of Woodstocke, King Edwards youngest sonne Earle of Buckingham and Northampton, to whom hee gaue 1000. markes, yerely, out of his treasury, till hee had prouided him Land to that value. Thomas Mowbery of Apilehme, alias Archilme, Earle of Nottingham, Guilchard, or Gifford Angolisme, Knight of Gascoigne, and Master to the King, Earle of Huntington, to whom he likewise gaue 1000. marks yerely out of his treasury, till hee had prouided him lands to that value. And Henry Percy, Earle of Northumberland. He also made 9. Knights, to wit, Edward, Sonne to Edmond, Earle of Kent, John, sonne to Thomas Roos of Hamelake, Richard de Gray of Rotherfield, Richard, sonne to Gilbert Talbot, Gerard, sonne to Warine de Lisle, Michael, sonne to Michael de la Pole, Richard de Poynings, Robert de Harrington, and Thomas de la More.

Michael, sonne to Michael.

Sir John Burleigh Knight, the Kings Chamberlaine, Custos of Nottingham Castle, was also for terme of life by patent, made keeper of the forrest of Sherwood. And Simon Burleigh Knight, his brother, was made Constable of Windlesore Castle, Wigmore, Guilford, and the Mannor of Kenington, and also Maister of the Kings Falcons at his Mues neere Charing crosse by Westminster; this Sir Simon Burleigh had his house in London, in Thames street, betweene Paynards Castle and Paules wharfe, which house sometime belonged to the Abbey of Fiscampe, and by reason of the wars in France, came to the Kings hands.

Mues for the Kings Falcons.

About the same time, Henry Percy, Marshall of England, and Earle of Northumberland, resigned the rod of his office, and went home to his Countrey, in whose place, Iohn of Arundale, brother to the Earle of Arundale, was sent, who valiantly resisted the French men, when they assailed the Towne of South-hampton, and manfully kept them off from entring the Towne, being chased to the Sea.

About the same time, of a small cause, discord rose in the forge of Rochesborough, betwixt the English men and the Scots, and certaine on both sides being slaine, the Scots were put to the worse. Whereupon, being turned into a fury, shortly returning to the Towne with the Earle of Dunbarre, they entred in the night, slew the Townesmen, spoyled their goods, and committed the towne to the fire: which thing being knowne, the new Earle of Northumberland sorrowing inwardly euen at the heart for the death of the slaine townes-men, determined to reuenge their death vpon the enemies entring into Scotland with 10000. men, he toke paines in the land of the Earle of Dunbarre, for the space of 7. dayes together, burning by all that came in his way, & returned with his people.

The Towne of Rochesborough burned by the Scots.

The 21. of August, the Frenchmen take the vnwinable (that I may so call it) Ile of Wight more by craft, then by force, which Ile had not been taken by any men, if the same had beene well kept with diligent watch, but the euer assured security of the Iland men, brought on them their destruction, and to the French vnhoped-for victory. Indeed the French-men being driuen on the shore by tempest, attempted to enter the Ile, supposing the Iland men had not beene aware of their comming: but the purpose of the French was not vnknowne to the watchmen, and therefore they suffered them to enter on the land, to the end, that after so many were come on land, as they supposed they might deale with, the residue should be kept off, but it chanced otherwise then they thought, for as was said, some being entred, when the Wight-men would haue stopped the other, the Frenchmen pressed forward with such force, that they repulsed the Iland men from their ground, so that they were driuen to seek refuge by hiding themselues.

Frenchmen win the Ile of Wight.

The French therfore hauing thus gotten this Iland, did much hurt in slaying the inhabitants burning certain townes, & taking the substance from the people: at length coming to the castle, & thinking to haue won it with small ado, they finde there a pyck of incredible sharpenes, for Sir H. Tirel keeper of the said castle, boldly coming to encounter them, made great slaughter among them, by reason whereof they left from assayling that castle, & from thencefoorth thinking it not good to dwell so neere a serpent, they gathered together what spoyle they might of the Ile, and constrained the Islanders to get of their friends without the Ile, 1000 marks of siluer for the sauing of their houses from burning & for the residue of their goods. Whereuer taking of them an oath of fidelity, not to resist them for the space of one peare, whensoeuer it should please them to land there, they departed thence to their gallies, and againe coasted the shore about till they came to the town of Winchelsey, where vnderstanding the Abbot of Battell was come to defend it, they sent him word to redeeme the towne, vnto whom the Abbot answered, he needed not to redeeme the thing that was not lost, but willed them to desist from woorking the towne vpon paine of that which might follow. The French enraged therewith at his answere, requested him that if hee would not haue peace, hee would send forth to fight man to man, or more in number if hee would: to try the matter in view of armes: but neyther would the Abbot admitte the one request or the other, saying, hee was a religious man, and therefore not to admitte such petitions, and that he came not hither to fight, but to defend and preserue the peace of the country. These things being heard, the Frenchmen supposing that the Abbot and his people wanted courage, they assaulted the Towne with such instruments of warre, as cast forth stones farre off, not ceasing from noone till euening, but by the laudable prowes of the Abbot, and such as were with him, the French preuailed nothing, but left it as they found it.

The towne of Hastings burnt.

In the meane time whilest they were busie thus at Winchelsey, they sent part of their company vnto Hastings, where finding the Towne almost empty, they burnt it.

Payot of Lewes taken by the French.

The same yere the Frenchmen comming by ar Rattingdon in Sussex, neere to the Towne of Lewes, the Payot of Lewes with a small company met them, and was taken by the Frenchmen, that came vpon him, and carried to their ships with 2. knights, to wit, S. John Fallesley, and S. Tho. Cheyne, and an Esquire, called Ioh. Brokas, amongst other a certaine Esquire that had bin long in seruice with the Payot of Lewes a French-man by nation, fought so manfully against the Frenchmen, that his bowells falling from him to his feet, he yet pursued them. There was slaine in that battell about 100. Englishmen, and the Frenchmen returned home with all their Nauy, which was 37. Gallets, and 8. Caruels of Spaine, and certain Barks: straight waies therefore as they came to land, some of them went vnto the siege, that was about Arde, and by reason which alwaies is familiar to them, the keper of the Castle being an Almaine, to wit, the Lord of Gunney deliuered to them the Towne, they straight got the Castle also, for the which, the same keper being taken by Sir Hugh Calueley, keper of Caleis, was sent into England, and committed to prison.

Parliament at London.

The same time, a Parliament was assembled at London, which continued from Michaelmas till Saint Andrewes tide. In the which Parliament were almost all those Knights, with the said Peter de la More, which so nobly had stood forth in the Parliament, which rightly was called the good Parliament, for the increase of their country, and profit of their kingdome. Thus therefore taking in hand against the petions in the same place, as they left them, they earnestly stood in their matter, to haue Alice Pierce banished, who contemning the Statute of Parliament, and the oath which she had taken, durst take on her to enter the Kings Court to compell him, and to haue of him what pleased her; who although she had corrupted many of the Lords, and all the Lawes with money, the which not onely secretly, but openly pleaded for her; yet by the diligence and wisedome of the said Knights, she being conuict by her owne mouth, was banished, and her moueable goods confiscate to the Kings vse: but in the yere next following, to wit, the second yere of King Richard, the said Alice Pierce, then wife to William Windsore Knight, was pardoned, and in the 7th yere of the same King, her goods before confiscate by Parliament, were againe restored and recompenced.

Alice Pierce banished.

There was granted to the King of the Clergy two tenths to be payed that yere, with condition, that from henceforth the King should not extort from his Subiects by such petitions or demands, but like of his owne, and continue his warre, for as it was answered there, his owne goods pertaining to the Crowne, sufficed both to the finding of his houle, and maintaining of his warres, if the same were bestowed by fit Ministers, and for the keeping of the money, two Cittizens of London were appointed, William Wallworth, and John Philpot. The Englishmen hearing of a number of Spanish ships, to remaine at Sluce for want of winde, assembling a great company of armed men, and a great Nauy, meant to take the Seas: their chiefe Captaines, were Thomas of Woodstock, Earle of Buckingham, the Duke of Lancaster, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Robert Fitz-Walter, Sir Robert Knowles, and many other valiant personages, who being entred the Sea, tasted fortune disfauourable: for by a tempestuous winde that rose, their shippes were scattered in sunder, their masts were broken down, their sailes rent, and many of the small vessells that were victuallers were drowned: at length the ships got together againe, and arriued in England, and being now rigged ecstsones fraught with men, and to the Sea they goe. About the same time, Sir Hugh Calueley making a iourney towards Bulloigne, found a Barge in the Hauen of the Towne, that bare the name of the Towne, and another that was the French Kings, and 24. other vessells more and lesse, all the which, with a great part of the fabrubes of Bulloigne, he caused to be dispoyled, taking with him whatsoeuer was thought to be desired, with certaine prisoners: he droue afore him a great booty of sheepe and oxen, which he found pasturing neere the Towne, which might well serue to victuall Caleis for a great time: he recouered the same day, the Castle of Marke, which through negligence before had beene lost.

Two tenths granted by the Clergy.

Hugh Calueley his iourney toward Bulloigne.

King Richard kept his Christmas at Windesore. 1378.

The English Fléete, whereof we spake, returned without any great good successe, they take an eight Spanish shippes in the Brittish coasts, neer to Bzest, and more had taken if their businesse had beene as well done, as was pretended: and therefore the Fléete returned home, so tossed with stormes and contrary weather, and after with intestine discord, that it seemed there wanted amongst them Gods fauour. The Lord Percy (this Fléete remaining for the mending of his shippes, whilest the other was abroad) went now to the Sea, with a great ship, and some small vessells, and meeting with 50. ships laden with French wares and Merchandize, of which some were of Flanders, some of Spaine, he set on them all, who beholding his bold enterprize, and thinking that he had some aydes at hand, gaue ouer to make resistance, and so 25. escaping by slight, 22. yelded themselues to the said Tho. Lord Percy. Sir Hugh Calueley, with a power secretly armed, went to ỹ town of Staple, where the faire was then, to the which were come many Marchantmen from Bulloigne, Mutterell, Amiens and Paris, where he falling on them that were vnarmed, slew many, tooke many to be put to their ransomes, sacked all the goods, and set fire in the Towne, so that it was wholly consumed, few places excepted. This done, he returned to Caleis with his men in safety, bringing from that Faire, wares which returned to the great profit of the Calisians many yeres after.

Sir Hugh Calueley goeth to the towne of Staple.

The men of Winchelsey and Rye saile into Normandy, and spoyle the towne of Peters-Hauen.

The men of Winchelsey and Rye, gathered a great number of people together, and imbarked themselues towards Normandy, desirous to requite the losses which before they had receiued, and so in the night arriuing in a Towne called Peters-Hauen, entred the same, slaying so many as they met, and those whom they thinke able to pay ransome, they carry to their ships: they spoyled the houses with the Churches, where they found many rich spoiles, which sometime had bin by the French men set from Rye, and especially the bells, and such like, which they shipped, set the rest on fire, and then they land at Wilet not farre from thence, where they practised the like cheuance, and so with their rich spoile turned home.

The men of Rye fetch their bels out of Normandy.

About the same time, Iohn, Duke of Lancaster requested that the mony granted to the King by the Clergy and Laity, might be committed to his custody, affirming that hee would keepe the enemies off from the coasts of England, by the space of one yere with that money, and moreouer bring to passe some further great commodity, to whose importunate petition, the Lords, although against their wills, agreed. They appoint thereto se the first day of March to meete in Councell, in which, every of those should goe forth on his iourney: and lest the Sea should in the meane time want those that should keepe it, there were nine shippes hyred of them of Baion to defend the Sea and Land from incursions of the French and others. These shippes being furnished with sufficient numbers of armed men, within a short time coasting the Seas, met the Nauy Marchandize of the Spaniards, and entering battell with them, in short time take fourteene of their ships laden with wines and other Marchandise, and returned into England ioyfully: vnto Sir Robert Knowles, Captaine of Bzest, they gaue the first fruits of their prey, 100. tun of their best wines, as they passed by him homewards.

Robert Knowles.

In the meane time, Henry the bastard, calling himselfe King of Spaine, hearing that they of Baion had done such harme vnto his people, and that the Duke of Lancaster had prepared a great number to enter the Sea, he was sore afraid, thinking that he minded not only to defend the Sea, but rather to seeke his kingdome, which by right of his wife the lawfull inheritor of Spaine, he meant to challenge: wherefore the said Henry commanded a Nauy to be prepared of all his Land, that hee might stay the said Duke from entering his Countrey, and if hee might, to take him prisoner, which happily they had done, if the King of Portugale with almost an innumerable number had not entred the kingdome of Spaine, the selfe-same time that the bastard Henry prepared himselfe against the Duke, deferring his iourney from day to day: they that were appointed Captaines ouer the Nany with certaine men of warre, got them to Sea, there to stay for the Dukes coming, esteeming it more glorious to liue on the Sea by preyes, taking from the enemies, then to liue by spoyling of their owne Country-men at home.

When they had certaine daies watted vp and downe the Seas, the Spaniards met them with an armed company, so that either part in hope of prey, ioyned together in fight; but our men hauing the wind and weather contrary to them, lost the victory to their enemies, some escaping by flight, and some being taken, amongst the which Sir Hugh Courtney, a noble Knight was one.

Mercer a Scot tooke ships of Scarborow.

About the same time, Iohn Mercer a Scot, gathering together no small number of French men, Scots and Spaniards, set vpon certaine ships of Scarborow, tooke them and led them into Scotland, this her did in reuenge of his fathers iniury, who was before taken by the Englishmen, and kept prisoner in the Castle of Scarborow.

John Philpot a Citizen of London, a man of iolly wit, and very rich in substance, considering the want of the Duke of Lancaster, and other Lords, that ought to haue defended the Realme, and lamenting the oppressions of the inhabitants, hired with his owne money, to the number of a thousand Souldiours, the which might take from the said Iohn Mercer, both his ships and goods, which hee had by roying taken, and defend the Realme of England from such incursions: and it came to passe within a small time, that his hired men tooke the said Io. Mercer with all his ships, which he had violently taken from Scarborow, and 15. Spanish ships that were laden with much riches, and were with him in aid at that present. There was great ioy made among the people, all men praysing that worthy mans bountifulnesse, and loue towards the King. The Earles and Barones seeing so laudable an act, atchieued by Io. Philpot, tooke it grieuously, although they knew themselues guilty: first they secretly lie in wait, to doo him some displeasure, and after they speake against him openly, saying, it was not lawfull for him to doe such things without the counsell of the King and Realme; certaine of the Lords, but the chiefe being Hugh, Earle of Stafford, that rehearsed these things thus against him, were answered by the said Iohn Philpot: Sir, know (sayeth he) that I neither sent my money nor men to the danger of the Seas, that I should take from you or your fellowes the good renowne of Chiualry, and winne it to me, but being sorrowfull to see the peoples misery, in my Countrey, which now through your slothfulnesse, of the most Noble Lady of Nations, is brought to lie open to the spoyling of euery bilest Nation, when there is not one of you that doth put his hand to the defence thereof. I haue Murther in the Church of Westminster. Tho. Walsing.

The 11th day of August, certaine wicked persons of the Kings house being armed, at night season time entred the Church of Westminster Abbey, and there set upon two valiant Esquires, Iohn Schakell and Robert Hawley, which had escaped out of the Tower of London, to the said Abbey, for refuge of Sanctuary: they slew the said Robert Hawley in the Quire before the Priors staff, and slew a Monke which intreated them to spare the said Robert in that place. Sir Ralph Ferreis, and Sir Alan Buxule. Captaine of the Tower (some say the Lord Latimer) were the Captaines of this mischiefe.

The foresaid two Esquires, Robert Hawley, and John Schakell, in the battell of Nazers in Spaine, tooke the Earle of Denepriloner, who deliuered vnto them his Sonne for a pledge: and because they would not present the said Earles sonne to the King, who would giue them little, or nothing for him, the foresaid Alan Buxule, with other were sent to doe this mischiefe, who slew the one, and cast the other in prison.

1379. Tho. Walsing. Werwicke Castle taken by the Scots

The Scots began to rebell, and a Squire of theirs, called Alexander Ramsey, with forty persons, in a night tooke the Castle of Berwick, but the ninth day following, the Earle of Northumberland recouered it, and slew the Scots that were therein.

The Marchants of London wickedly slew a rich Marchant of Genoa, for that he would carry to a better market the spices that he had promised to bring into this Countrey, the doers whereof were after apprehended, and some for that fact executed, as after shall appeare.

So great a mortality of men happened in the North parts of England, as neuer had beene seene before, which the Scots seeing, ranged thorow, and slew with the sword them that were sicke of the plague, and so pursued them that had not the plague, that they drove out of the Countrey, almost all the able men.

Care.

In a Parliament at London it was decreed, that euery Duke should pay tenne marks to the King, the Archbishoppes the like, Earles, Bishoppes, and mitered Abbots should giue fiue marks, and euery Monke forty pence, no Religious person, man nor woman, Parson, Vicar, or Chaplein escaped this Tare. Iohn Mountfort, Duke of Byptaine returned to his Countrey, where hee was received with great honour.

Sir Iohn Arundale drowned.

Iohn of Arundale, brother to the Earle of Arundale, was sent to helpe the Duke of Byptaine, with many other Noble Knights, and Esquires, who beginning their voyage from Plimmouth with spoyling their owne Countrey, rauishing wiues, widdowes, and virgins, and robbing of Churches, were by Tempest driuen on the Rockes of a certaine Iland in Ireland, where they were all most miserably drowned, with their Treasure and prouisions which was of inestimable value. Sir Thomas Banister, Sir Roger Trumpington, Sir Nicholas Kiriell, Sir Thomas Dale, Sir Iohn Sentcler, and sir other Knights, and many other perished there, besides threescore women, whom they had throwne into the Sea, to lighten their ships, and this was done on the 16. of December.

In a Parliament at London was granted to the King a tenth of the Ecclesiasticall persons, and a fifteenth of the secular, vpon condition, that no other Parliament should be holden from the Calends of March, till Michaelmas.

1380. Parliament at London.

A combat was fought at Westminster in the Kings presence, betweene Io. Ansley, Knight, and Thomas Cartington Esquire, whom the foresaid Knight had appealed of treason, for selling the Castle of Saint Saulours, which the Lord Chandos had builded in the Ile of Constantine in France, and the Knight ouercame the Esquire.

A combat at Westminster.

Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, Thomas Percy, Hugh Calueley, Robert Knowles, Lord Basset, Sir Iohn Harlestone, William of Windsore, appeached and tryed Knights, were sent with a great power to ayde the Duke of Byptaine, who were conueyed to Caleis, and from thence rode about thorow France, spoyling the Countrey, and slaying the people to the borders of Byptaine, and entered the same without losse, either of man or beast.

In this iourney, Sir Iohn Philpot, Cttizen of London, deserued great commendations, who hired ships for them of his owne charges, and with his owne mony released the armie which the fouldiours had gaged for their victuals, more then a thousand in number.

Iohn Philpot, his good seruice.

The Scots entred Cumberland, Westmerland, and the Forrest of Engleswood, slew the inhabitants, drowe away the Cattel, and robbed the Parket and Towne of Pearesh, and whiles the Earle of Northumberland prepared to haue beene reuenged, the King sent Letters to the contrary. Iohn Vian Knight, with the French Kings Gallies, tooke the Towne of Winchelsea, put the Abbot of Battell to flight, and tooke one of the Monkes that came thither armed.

About this time, saith Polidor, the making of Gunnes was found, by a certaine Almaine, who hauing the powder of Brimme-stone in a Mortar which hee had beaten for a medicine, and couered with a stone, as hee strooke fire, a sparke chanced to fall into the powder, whereby a flame out of the Mortar raised the stone a great height, which after hee had perceiued, hee made a pipe of yron, and tempered the powder with oyle, and so finished that deadly engine, Parliament at Northampton.

During the Parliament at Northampton, beginning the first of November, was hanged Iohn Kirby, that slew the Marchant of Genoa, whom wee spake of before.

Great Taxe.

In this Parliament, an exceeding great tare was demanded, which afterwards was cause of great disturbance: of all Religious persons, men and women fiue shillings eyght pence, secular Priests as much, and euery person, man or woman foure pence to the King, which was payd. It was also ordained, that euery couple wedded should pay 2. shillings for euery foote of heath, and also homegeld, but this was neuer asked.

1381. T. Walsing.

After the feast of Christmas, a Councel was holden at London, in the which, Sir Thomas Brantingham, Bishop of Exceter, was discharged of the Office of Lord Treasurer, and Sir Robert Hales, Prior of Saint Johns Hospitall of Jerusalem in England, was placed in his roome, a Noble and valiant Knight, and a hardy person, but such a one as pleased not the Commons.

Carickes fraught with wine came to Southampton.

About the same time, came vessels, called Carickes, to South-hampton, fraught with all kinds of Spices, Wines, and other Marchandizes, which greatly inriched the inhabitants of the whole Realme, but especially them that inhabited thereabout.

John Wicliffe

The same time, Iohn Wicliffe, parson of Lutterworth in Leycester-shire, laboured in his preaching, to proue, that after the consecration in the Masse made by the Priest, very bread and wine were there present as before, Christ being there assistant, as in euery place, but more specially, and the same bread not to be more worth then other bread, except onely for the blessing of the Priest, and therefore he affirmed that Christians were deceiued in honouring of the said bread, which was a thing without life, for any thing that had life, was better then that which lacked life.

An army sent to ayde the King of Portugale.

A great Army was assembled and sent to the ayde of the Duke of Lancaster, against the King of Spaine, for the said Duke affirmed, that it was expedient for this Realme, that an host of men, with abundance of money should be sent to the king of Portugale, that he might thereby be bound to ayde the King of England, and stop the passage of the Straits of Gibaltare, or of Soyor, from the Galleis, that must of necessity passe by the same straits, to come to infest the British, or English Ocean, for so should England be safe, and France should be deceiued: Captaines appointed to this Army, were Edmond of Langley, Earle of Cambridge, William, Lord Beauchampe, the Lord Boeterax, Sir Mathew Gourney, and many other Knights, the which passed the Seas, and prosperously came to Lisbone, and were thankefully receiued of the King, but these were not able to assaile the King of Spaine, yet greatly profitting Portugale, they defended the confines, and stopped the Spaniards that they should not enter the Countrey as enemies: our men oft times inuaded the Spaniards, and boldly abode in that land, vntill a greater number of warriers might be sent into them out of England.

A great rebellion in England, and the causes thereof.

In this meane time, the Realme of England, appointed to be punished for her sinnes, was suddenly plagued in such sort, that if God had not sooner suppressed the same, both the gouernment had beene vtterly destroyed, and the whole Realme made a laughing stocke and scorne to all Nations.

In the last yere (as is aforesaid) was granted to the King a grieuous tare, or tollage of his Subiects, both spirituall and temporall, through the which was raised in England, a shipwracke of great troubles: for diuers Courtiers desirous to enrich themselues with other mens goods, informed the King and his Court, that the tillage was not gathered by faithfully to the Kings vse by the Collectours: whereupon they offered to the King, that they would pay a great summe of money for the farme, of that which they would gather, ouer and besides that which had beene payd, if they might be by the King thereunto authorized. And some of them getting the Kings Letters and Authority, sate in diuers places of Kent and Essex, and handled the people euery sore and vncourteously, almost not to be spoken, for the leuying of the said summe of money, which some of the people taking in euill part, they secretly tooke counsell together, gathered assistants, and resisted the ernators, riling against them, of whom some they slew, some they wounded, and the rest fled.

Commissioners sent into Essex to Tho. Bampton.

The King therefore ordained certaine Commissioners to enquire, how they were leuied, amongst the which, one was sent into Essex to Thomas de Bampton, being sitting one day before whitsontide, at Brentwood, enquiring how the Collectors had leuied the subsidy before said, all the people of Fobbing answered, they would not pay one penny more then they had done, whereof they had his acquittance, whereupon the said Thomas did grieuously threaten them, hauing with him two Sergeants at Armes of the Kings, whereupon they of Fobbing, of Curringham, and of Stanford, assembled to the number of more then one hundred, went to T. Bampton, and gaue him that answer, that they would neyther treate with him, or pay any such money as was demanded: wherefore the said Bampton commanded the Sergeants to arrest and put them in prison, but the Townsmen made them all to fly towards London, to the Kings Councell. Whereupon Sir Robert Belknape, chiefe Iustice of the common Pleas, was sent downe with commission of Trailbaston, and before him sundry inditements of those men; who comming before him, called him traytor, to the King and Realme, and furthermore compelled him to sweare vpon a booke, that hee would no more sit in any such Sessions: and to cleare to them the names of the Iurors, whose heads they chopped off as they found them.

them and destroyed their houses, which made Sir Robert Belknape in haste to ryde his house. This done, the Commons assembled before Twightlintide to a great number: those tooke all the Clerkes of the said Thomas Bampton and chopped off their heads, which they carried before them on poles. At that same time, the great Prior of Saint Iohn of Jerusalem by London Prior of Iohns Canons. hauing a goodly and delectable Pannot in Esser, where him was obtained victuals, and other necessaries, for the vse of a Chapiter Generall, and great abundance of faire stuffe, of Wines, Arras, clothes, and other prouision for the knights brethren: The Commons entered this Pannot, eat vp the victuals, and prouision of Wine, three tunne, and spoyled the Pannot, and the ground with great dammage: then they sent diuers Letters into Kent, Suffolke, and Northfolke, to rise with them, and departing themselues into diuers companies, committed many outrages: shortly after, to wit, on Monday after Whitsuntide, a Knight of the Kings house, named Sir Simon Burley, hauing in his company two Seriants at armes, of the Kings, came to Grauesend, where hee challenged one to be his bondman, for whom, men of the towne did greatly intreat him to shew fauour, but Sir Simon would not take lesse then 300. pound of siluer for his manumission, and therefore arrested him, and sent him to Rochester Castle, whereupon the Commons of Kent beganne to rise, for which the King sent a Iustice of Tralybalon, with Iohn Legge a Seriant of Armes, there to sit, hauing with them many Inditements, but as they would haue sate at Canterbury vpon there commission, they were resisted by the Commons, who daily grew to a great multitude, and being without a Captaine, came to Dartford, where they tooke counsell, and appointed that none which were dwelling within twelue miles of the Sea, should goe with them, but keepe the coast of the Sea from enemies, saying there were moze Kings then one, which they would not suffer, nor haue any other but King Richard. On the Friday after, they came to Rochester, and there ioyned with the Esser rebels, who together strongly besieged the Castle, and deliuered the man of Grauesend with other: then they made Wat Tighler of Maidstone their Captaine, who with his company on Sunday after Trinity Sunday, came to Canterbury, where they commanded the Monkes to chuse them an Archbishop, for hee that now is, (quoth they) is a traytor, and shall be beheaded. Then they swoze the Maioz, Baliffes and Commons of the Towne to be true to King Richard, and the lawfull Commons of England. They beheaded three men of that Towne, and then taking with them 500. men of that Towne toward London, left the rest to keepe the said Towne. This tumult thus begunne in Kent, by meanes of Sir Simon Burley, was also increased by diuers other actions in other places, amongst the which, as I haue noted in a Chronicle sometimes belonging to the Monastery of Saint Albons, one of the Collectors of the grotes, or polle money, comming to the house of one Iohn Tylar, in the Towne of Dartford in Kent, demanded of the Tylars wife, for her husband, her selfe, her seruants, and for their daughter (a young maiden) euery one of them a grote; which the Tylars wife denied not to pay, sauing for her daughter, whom she said was but a child, not to be counted a woman: quoth the Collector, that will I soone wit, and taking the maiden, turned her vp to search whether shee were vndergrowne with hayre, or not, (for in many places they made the like triall) whereupon her mother cryed out, neighbours came running in: and her husband being at worke in the same Towne, tyling of an house, when hee heard thereof, caught his lathing staffe in his hand, and ranne reaking home, where reasoning with the Collector, who made him to bold, the Collector answered with stout words, and strake at the Tylar, whereupon the Tylar auoyding the blow, smote the Collector with his lathing staffe, that the braine flew out of his head, where-through great noyse arose in the streetes, and the poore people being glad, euery one prepared to support the said Iohn Tylar. Thus the Commons being drawne together, went to Maidstone, and from thence backe againe to Blacke-heath, and so in short time, they stirred all the Countrey, in a manner, to the like commotion, and forthwith diserting the wayes that lead to Canterbury, arrest all passengers, compelling them to sweare: first, that they should keepe their allegiance vnto King Richard, and to the Commons, and that they should accept no King that was named Iohn, for enuy they bare vnto Iohn, Duke of Lancaster, who named himselfe King of Castile, and that they should be ready whensoeuer they were called, and that they should agree to no Lare to be leuied from thencefoorth in the kingdome, nor consent to any, except it were a fifteene.

Sir Simon Burley by a commission in Kent arrested one of Grauesend, sent him to Rochester Castle. Commons of Kent began to rise.

Rochester Castle besieged, prisoner set out.

The Commons went to Canterbury and sware the Maioz to the King and them.

Lib. S. Albons.

The fame of these doings spread into Sussex, Hertford, Essex, and Cambridgeshires, Northfolke, Suffolke, &c. and when such assemblings of the common people daily tooke increase, and that their number was now made almost infinite, so that they feared no man to resist them, they began to shew some such Acts as they had considered in their minds, and take in hand to behead all men of Law, as well Apprentizes, as Vtterbarristers and old Iustices, with all the Iurers of the countrey, whom they might get into their hands, they spared none whom they thought to be learned, especially if they found any to haue pen and inke, they pulled off his hoode, and all with one voyce of crying, Hale him out, and cut off his head.

Iustices, Lawyers and Iurers beheaded.

They also determined to burne all Court-Rolls, and old Monuments, that the memory of antiquities being taken away, their Lords should not be able to challenge any right on them, from that time forth. These Commons had to their Chapleine or Preacher a wicked Priest, called Sir Iohn Ball, who commelled them to destroy all the Nobility, and Clergy, so that there should be no Bishop in England, but but one Archbishoppe, which should be himselfe, and that there should not be aboue two religious persons in one house, and their possessions should bee diuided among the lay men, for the which doctrine they held him as a Prophet. They going towards London, met diuers Lawyers, and twelue Knights of that countrey, whom they forced to sweare to maintaine them, or else to be beheaded: this being knowne to the King, on Wednesday following, hee sent messengers to demand the cause of their rising. Who answered, that they were gathered together for his safety, to destroy those that were Traytors to him and his kingdome: The King by messengers replyed, that they should cease their assemblies, vntill hee mought speake with them, and all matters should bee amended. Whereupon the Commons requested the King to come and see them on the Black-heath, and the King the third time sent word that hee would willingly come to them the next day. At what time the King being at Windsore, removed in all haste to London, whom the Maioz met, and safely brought to the Tower, whither the Archbishop of Canterbury Chancellor, the Bishop of London, the Prior of Saint Iohn Treasurer, the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Arundale, Warwicke, Suffolke, Oxford and Salisbury, and other of the Nobility, and Gentlemen to the number of fiue hundred did come, and on Corpus Christi eue, the Commons of Kent came to Blacke-heath, three miles from London, to warre with the King, hauing displayed before them two Banners of Saint George, and three score persons. The Commons of Esser came also on the other part of the Riuer Thames, to haue also answer from the King, at what time the king being in the Tower, commanded Barges to be made ready, and taking with him his Councell, and foure Barges for his retinue, was rowed to Greenewich, where the Chancellor and Treasurer perswaded the King, that it were great folly to goe to a number of men without reason, and thereupon hee stayed. The Commons therefore sent to him, requiring to haue the heads of Iohn, Duke of Lancaster, and fifteene other Lords, whereof fourteene were present with him in the Tower, to wit, Simon Sudbury, Chancellor, Sir Robert Hales Treasurer, the Bishoppe of London, Iohn Fordham, Clerke of the priuy Seale, Robert Belknape, chiefe Iustice, Sir Ralph Ferers, Sir Robert Plesington, chiefe Baron of the Exchequer, Iohn Legge, Sergeant at armes, Thomas Pampton, and others, whereunto the King would not assent, but willed them to come to him at Windsore, on Munday next, where they should haue sufficient answer to all their demands. The Commons had a watch-word which was this: With whom hold you? and the answer was with King Richard, and the true Commons, and who could not that watch-word, off went his head. The King being warned, that if he came to the Commons, hee should be carryed about by them, and

The King sent messengers to the rebels, to demand of them the cause of their rising.

King Richard came to the Tower of London.

The Commons of Kent came to the Black-heath.

The Commons of Esser came also on the other side the Thames.

Watch-word of the commons.

John Tylar of Dartford slew one of the Collectors of monney.

The Commons of Esser went to Southwarke, brake vp the prisons.

The Commons of Esser spoyled the Archbishoppes house at Lambeth.

The Commons of Esser burnt the Manor of Highbury.

The Commons of Kent brake downe the Stewes.

The Commons entered the City of London.

The religious were in prayer and procession

The Citizens pay through nothing from any man, but bought all things at a full price: and if they found any man with their wiues, they beheaded him. Now talking with the simple Commons of procuring them liberty, and apprehending traytors (as they termed them) especially the Duke of Lancaster, they shortly got all the poore Citizens to conspire with them: and the same day, after the Sunne was got on some height, that it waxed warme, and that they had tasted all their pleasures of diuers wines, whereby they were become as drunke, (for the rich Citizens had set open their sellers to enter at their pleasure) they beganne to talke of many things, amongst the which, they exhorted each other, that going to the Sauoy, the Duke of Lancasters house, to the which there was none in the Realme to bee compared in beauty and Kateliuesse, they mought set fire on it, and burne it; this talke pleasing the Commons of the City, they straight ranne thither, and setting fire on it round about, applyed their trauell, to destroy that place: and that it mought appeare to the communalty of the Realme, that they did not any thing for couetousnesse, they caused proclamation forced to grant them their requests whatsoeuer, hee returned toward London and entred the Tower about three of the clocke: The Commons being certified that the King was gone, they on the same day toward euening came to Southwarke, where they brake downe the houses of the Marshalsey, and loosed the prisoners, amongst other, they brake downe the house of Iohn Inworth, then Marshall of the Marshalsey, the Kings Bench, and all the houses of the Iurors, and Questmongers, containing that outrage all the night: At what time, the Commons of Esser went to Lambeth, a Mannor of the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, entred the house, spoyled and burnt all the goods, with the Bookes, Registers, and Remembrances of the Chancery. The next day being Thursday, and the feast of Corpus Christi, or the thirteenth of June: the Commons of Esser in the morning, went to the Pannot of Highbery, two miles from London, North, this mannor belonging to the Prior of Saint Iohn of Jerusalem, they wholly consumed with fire. On which day also in the morning, the Commons of Kent brake downe the fewe houses neere London Bridge, at that time in the hands of the frowes of Flanders, who had farmed them of the Maioz of London. After which, they went to London Bridge, in hope to haue entred the Citty: but the Maioz comming thither before, fortified the place, caused the Bridge to be drawne vp, and fastened a great chaine of yron a crosse, to restraine their entry. Then the Commons of Surrey, who were risen with other, cried to the wardens of the Bridge to let it downe, whereby they mought passe, or else they would destroy them all, whereby they were constrained for feare to let it down, and giue them entry, at which time the religious persons were earnest in procession and prayer for peace: the Commons passed through the Citty, and did no hurt, they tooke at a full price: and if they found any man with their wiues, they beheaded him. If they tooke any with theft they beheaded them, but destroyed nothing to the Citizens and Iurors houses, they burnt the Sauoy, but referred nothing to themselues.

clamation to be made, that none ſhould preſume to loſe his head, ſhould reſtore to the owner it to his owne by any thing that there was to be found, but that they ſhould bring ſuch plate and veſſell of gold and ſilver as were in that houſe in great plentie, and ſmall peeces, and throw the ſame into the flames, or in ſome priuie; cloſets of gold, ſilver, ſilke, and beſides, they ſhould finde Rings and Jewells ſet with precious ſtones, they ſhould bring in worſe, that the ſame might be to no vſe &c. And ſo was it done: Henry Knighton writeth, that when the rebells burnt the Sauoy, one of them (contrary to the Proclamation) tooke a goodly ſiluer peece, and hid it in his boſome, but another that eſpied him, told his fellowes, who forthwith fiercled him and tooke peece of plate into the fire, ſaying, hee be zealous of truth and iuſtice, and not theeues, or robbers. After this, they getting a rich garment of the Dukes, (commonly called a Jacke, or Jerkin) ſetting it on a ſpeares point, for a marke, they ſhot at it with their bowes and arrowes, but when they could, that way, doe it little hurt, they tooke it downe, and laying it on the ground, with their knees and arces, they all to broke it. To the number of two and thirty of thoſe rebells entred a ſeller of the Sauoy, where they dranke ſo much of ſweete wines, that they were not able to come out in time but were ſtaid in with wood and ſtones that mured up the doore, where they were heard crying and calling ſeuen daies after, but none came to help them out till they were dead.

In this meane time, the commons of Kent brake by the Fleete, and let the priſoners goe where they would: they deſtroyed and burnt many houſes, defaced the beauty of Fleetſtreete, from thence they went to the Temple to doe the like, and plucked downe the houſes, tooke off the tyles of the other buildings left, burnt to the Church, tooke out all the bookes, and euidences that were in cheſts of the Prentiſes of the Law, carryed them into the high ſtreete, and there burnt them: this houſe they ſpoyled for wrath they bare to the Prioreſſe of Saint Johns, vnto whom it belonged: after a number of them had facked this Temple, what with labour, and what with wine, being ouercome, they lay downe vnder the walles and houſing, and were ſlaine, like ſwine, one of them killing another for old grudge, and hatred, and others alſo made quicke diſpatch of them. A number of them that burnt the Temple, went from thence toward the Sauoy, deſtroying all the houſes that belonged to the Hoſpitall of S. Johns: and after they went to the place of the Biſhop of Cheſter, by the Strand, where John Fordham remained elect of Durham, they entred his ſeller, rouling out the tunnes of wine, drinking exceſſiuely, not doing any more harme. Then they went towards the Sauoy, burning many houſes of cruſtmongers. At the laſt, they came to the Sauoy, brake the gates, entred the houſe, came to the wardrobe, tooke out all the clothes they could find, which they ſet on fire, and with them burnt all the feather-beds, couerlets, (whereof one with armes was eſtemed worth 1000. marks) and all other goods that they might finde, with the houſes, and buildings belonging thereunto which were left by the Commons of the Citty of London. And (as it was ſaid) they found three barrells of gunne-powder, which they thought had beene gold, or ſiluer, thoſe they caſt into the fire, which moſt ſuddenly then they thought, blew vp the Hall, deſtroyed the houſes, and almoſt themſelues: from thence they went to Weſtminſter, burning diuers houſes, and amongſt other the houſe of Iohn Buterwike vnder-Shrieue of Middleſex, they brake the priſon at Wiſtminſter, and returned to London by Holborne, and before the Church of Saint Sepulchre, burnt the houſe of Simon the Poſtler and others, they brake the priſon of Newgate, let forth the priſoners, &c.

The ſame Thurſday, the ſaid Commons went to Saint Martins le Grand in London, and take from the high Altar in that Church one Roger Legat, chiefe ſlaue, (or queſtmonger) led him into Cheape, and cut off his head: at that time alſo they beheaded 18. in diuers places of the City. During which time, diuers of the Commons went vnto the Tower, there to haue ſpoken with the King, but could not be heard, wherefore they beſieged the Tower on that ſide towards Saint Katherins. The other Commons that were in the Citty, went to the Hoſpitall of Saint Iohn, and by the way burnt the houſe of Roger Legat lately beheaded, they burnt all the houſes belonging to Saint Johns, and then burnt the fayre Papyay of the Hoſpitall of Saint John, cauſing the ſame to burne the ſpace of ſeuen dapes after. At what time, the King being in a Turret of the Tower and ſeeing the flamnes of Sauoy, the Papyay of Saint Johns Hoſpitall, and other houſes on fire, hee demanded of his Councell what was beſt to doe in that extremity, but none of them could counſaile in that caſe. The King there in a Tower, towards Saint Katherines, made Proclamation, that all people ſhould depart to their homes peaceably, and hee would pardon them all their treſpaſſes: but they with one voyce cryed, they would not go before they had the trypayes within the Tower, and Charters to free them from all ſeruice, and other matters which they would demaund: this the King granted, and cauſed a Clerke to write in their preſence, as followeth:

Richard, King of England, and of France, doth greatly thanke his good Commons, becauſe they ſo greatly deſire to ſee and hold him for their King, and doth pardon to them all manner of treſpaſſes, miſprizions, and felonies done before this time, and willeth and commandeth from henceforth, that euery one hasten to his owne dwelling, and ſet downe all his greuances in writing, and ſend it vnto him, and he will by aduice of his lawfull Lords, and good counſell, prouide ſuch remedy as ſhall be profitable to him, to them, and to the whole Realme. Whereunto hee ſet his ſignet in their preſence, and ſent it vnto them by two Knights, one of them them ſtanding by in a chayre aboue the reſt, that euery one might heare. During which time the King remained in the Towre, to his great griefe, for when the Commons heard the writings, they ſaid it was but a mockery, and therefore returned to London, proclaiming throw the Citty, that all the men of Law, all they of the Chauncery, and of the Exchequer, and all that could make any Writ, or Letter, ſhould be beheaded, whereſoeuer they might bee found. The whole number of the common people, were at that time diuided into three parts, of the which one part was attending to deſtroy the Sauoy of Highberry, and other places belonging to the Priory of S. John: An other company lay at the Miles end, Caſt of the Citty: The third kept at the Tower-hill, there to ſpoyle the King of ſuch victualls as were brought towards him. The company aſſembled on the Miles end, ſent to command the King, that hee ſhould come to them without delay vnarmed, or without any force, which if hee refuſed to doe, they would ſurely pull downe the Tower, neyther ſhould he eſcape alue; who taking counſell of a few, by 7. of the Cloſke, the King rode to the Miles end, with his mother, in a whirlicote (or chariot as we now terme it) and the Earles of Buckingham, Kent, Warwick, and Oxford, S. Thomas Percy, S. Robert Knowles, and the Maior of London, with diuers other Knights, & Eſquires Sir Aubery de Vere, bare the Kings Sword. Thus with a few vnarmed, the King went towards the rebells in great feare: and ſo the gates of the Tower being ſet open, a great multitude of them entred the ſame. There was the ſame time in the Tower, 600. warlikemen furniſhed with armor and weapon, expert men in armes and 600. Archers, all which did quatle in ſtomacke. For the baſeſt of the ruſtickes, not many together, but euery one by himſelfe durſt preſume to enter the Kings chamber, or his mothers, with their weapons, to put in feare each of the men of warre, Knights or other: many of them came into the Kings priuy chamber, and played the wantons, in ſitting, lying, and ſpoyling them on the Kings bed: and that more is, inuited the Kings mother to kiſſe with them, yet durſt none of thoſe men of warre (ſtrange to be ſaid) once withſtand them: they came in and out like Maſters, that in times paſt were ſlaues of moſt vile condition. Whileſt therefore, theſe ruſtickes fought the Archbiſhop with terrible noyſe and fury, running by and downe, at length finding one of his ſeruants, they charge him to bring them where his Maſter was, whome they named traytor, which ſeruant, daring doe none other, brought them to the Chappell; where, after Maſſe had beene ſayd, and hauing received the communion, the Archbiſhoppe was buſie in his prayers, for not vnknowing of their comming and purpoſe, hee had paſſed the laſt night in confeſſing of his ſinnes, and in deuout prayers. When therefore hee heard they were come, with great conſtancy, hee ſaid to his men, let vs now goe, ſurely it is beſt to dye, when it is no pleaſure to liue, and with that the tormentors entring, cried, Where is the traitor? The Archbiſhop anſwered, behold, I am the Archbiſhop who n ponſeeke, not a traytor. They therefore layd hands on him, and drew him out of the Chappell, they threw him out of the Tower gates, to the Tower-hill, where, being compaſſed about with many thouſands, and ſeeing ſundry about his head drawne in exceſſiue number, threatning to him death, he ſaid vnto them thus: what is it deare brethren you purpoſe to doe, what is mine offence committed againſt you, for which yee will kill mee, yea were beſt to take leaue, that if I be killed, who ſhall your Paſtor, there come not on you, the indignation of the iuſt reuenger, or at the leaſt, for ſuch a fact all England bee put vnder interdiction: hee could vnneath pronounce theſe words, before they crept out with an horrible noyſe, that they neither feared the interdiction, nor the Pope to be aboue them. The Archbiſhop ſeeing death at hand, ſpake with comfortable words, as hee was an eloquent man, and wiſe, beyond all wiſe Legiſlatours of the Realme: Laſtly, after forgiuenneſſe granted to the executioner that ſhould behead him, he kneeling downe, offered his necke, to him that ſhould ſtrike it off, being ſtricken in the necke, but not deadly, hee putting his hand to his necke, ſaid thus, a ha, it is the hand of God, hee had not removed his hand from the place where the paine was, but that being ſuddenly ſtricken, his fingers ends being cut off, and part of the arteries, hee fell downe, but yet he dyed not, till being mangled with 8. ſtrokes in the necke, and in the head, he fulfilled moſt worthy martyrdome. There lay his body buried all that Friday, and the morrow till afternoone, none daring to deliuer it: his body to the ſepulture, his head theſe wicked take, and napling thereon his hoode, they fixe it on a pole, and ſet it on London Bridge, in place where before ſtod the head of Sir John Mainſterworth. This Archbiſhoppe, Simon Tibald alias Sudbury, Sonne to Nicholas Tibald gentleman, borne in the Towne of Sudbury, in Suffolke, Doctor of both lawes, was 18. yeres Biſhop of London, in the which time, hee builded a goodly College, in place where his fathers houſe ſtood, and endued it with great poſſeſſions, and furniſhed the ſame with ſecular Clerkes and other Miniſters, valued at the ſuppreſſion 122. pound, 18. ſhillings in lands by yeere. Hee builded the vpper end of S. Gregories Church at Sudbury. After being tranſlated to the Archbiſhoppicke of Canterbury in An. 1375. he re-edified the walls of that Citty, from the Weſt gate (which hee builded) to the Northgate, which had beene deſtroyed by the Danes before the conqueſt of William the baſtard. Hee was ſlaine as yee haue heard, and afterwards buried in the Cathedrall Church of Canterbury. There dyed with him Sir Robert Hales, a moſt valiant Knight, Lord of S. Johns, & treaſurer of England, and Iohn Legge, one of the Kings ſerieants at armes, and a Franciſcan Frier, named William

William Ashcdore the Kings Confessor. Richard Lions also a famous Lapidary or Goldsmith, late one of the Shreiffes of London, was drawne out of his house and beheaded in Cheape. There were that day beheaded many as well Flemings as Englishmen, for no cause but to fulfill the cruelty of the rude Commons: for it was a solemne pastime to them, if they could take any that was not sworne to them, to take from such a one his hod with their accustomed livery, and forthwith to behead him: neither did they shew any reverence vnto sacred places, for in the very Churches did they kill whom they had in hatred, they fetcht 13. Flemings out of the Augustine Fryars church in London, & 17. out of another church, and 32. out of the Mintre, and so forth in other places, of the Citie, and in Southwarke, all which they beheaded, except they could plainly pronounce bread and cheese, for if their speech sounded any thing on bread or cheese, off went their heads, as a sure marke they were Flemings.

Flemings beheaded.

The King comming to the Miles-end, the place before recited, was sore afraid, beholding the wood commons, who with froward countenance required many things which they before had put in writings to be confirmed by the Kings letters patents.

The first, that all men should bee free from servitude and bondage, so as from thenceforth there should be no bondsmen.

The second, that he should pardon all men of what estate soever, all manner actions and insurrections committed, and all manner treasons, fellonies, transgressions and extortions, by any of them done, and to graunt them peace.

The third, that all men from thence-forth might bee infranchised to buy and sell in euery Countie, Citie, Borough-towne, Fayre, Market, and other place within the Realme of England.

The fourth, that no Acre of land holden in bondage or service, should be holden, but for 4. pence, and if it had beene holden for lesse afore-time, it should not hereafter be inhaunced.

These and many other things they required: moreover they told him, he had beene euilly gouerned till that day, but from that time he must be gouerned otherwise.

Esser men returned home ward.

The King perceiuing he should not escape peece pt he granted to their request yeelded to the same. And because the Chancellor was beheaded, the King made the Earle of Arundell for the time Chancellor, and Keeper of the great Seale, and also made diuers Clarkes to write Charters, patents, and protections granted to the Commons, for the forfeite matters, without taking fine, for the Seale, or writing thereof; and so toward euen, the King craving licence departed from them. The next day being Saturday and the 15. of June, a great number of the Commons came to the Abbey of Westminster, and there found John Inworth Marshall of the Marshalsey, and maister of the Kings prisoners there, imbracing a Marble pillar of Saint Edwards shrine for his defence, against his enemies, they plucked his armes from the pillar, and led him into cheape, where they cut off his head. In which time they take out of Newgate one John Greenfield, led him into cheape, and cut off his head, notwithstanding that the King had at this time made Proclamation throughout the citie, that euery one should peaceably go into his countrey, without doing further euill, whereunto they would not assent.

John Greenfield beheaded.

The same day after dinner, about two of the clocke, the King went from the wardrobe, called the Norall in London toward Westminst. attended on by the number of 200. persons, to visit Saint Edwards shrine, and to see if the Commons had done any mischiefe there: The Abbot and conuent of that Abbey, with the Chanons and vicars of Saint Stephens Chappell, met him in rich copes with procession, and led him by the charnel-house into the Abbey, then to the church, and so to the high Altar, where he deuoutly prayed and offered. After which he spake with the Anchoze, to whom he confessed himselfe, then he went to the Chappell called our Lady in the peire, where he made his prayers: Which being done, the King made Proclamation, that all the commons of the countrey, that were in London should meete him in Smithfield, which was done accordingly, and when the King was come with his people, he rode towards the East, neere to S. Bartholm. Priory, and the commons towards the West in forme of battaile. The K. therefore sent to them, to shew them that their fellowes the Esser men were gone from thence-forth to liue in peace, and that he would grant to them the like forme of peace, if it would please them to accept thereof. Their chiefe captaine named Wat Tyler of Maidstone, he, I say, being a crafty fellow, of an excellent wit, but lacking grace, answered that peace he desired, but with conditions to his liking, minding to feede the King with faire words, till the next day, that he might in the night haue copalled his peruerse purpose, for they thought the same night to haue spoyled the citie, the King first being slaine, and the great Lozdes that cleaued to him, and to haue burnt the city, by setting fire in foure parts thereof, but God that resisteth the proud, did roadily disappoint him. For where the forme of peace was in three seuerall Charters written, and twice sent to him, none of them could please him: wherefore at length the King sent to him one of his Knights called Sir John Newton, not so much to command as to intreat him (for his pride was well enough knowne) to come and talke with him about his owne demandes, to haue them put in his Charter, of the which demands, I will put one in this Chronicle, that it may the more plainly appeare, the other to be contrary to reason. First, he would haue a commission for him and his, to behead all Lawyers, Escheters, and other whatsoeuer, that were learned in the law, or communicated with the law, by reason of their office, for he had conceiued in his mind, that this being brought to

to passe all things afterward should be ordered according to the fancy of the Common people: and indeede it was said, that with great pride, he had but the day before said, putting his hand to his lips, that before foure daies came to an end, all the lawes of England should proceed from his mouth. When Sir Ioh. Newton was in hand with him for dispatch, he answered with impudence, if thou art so hasty, thou mayest get thee backe againe to thy Master, I will come when it pleaseth mee: notwithstanding, he followed on horseback a slow pace, and by the way there came to him a butcher-maker of London, named John Ticle, who had brought to the Commons 60. dublets, which they bought and ware, for the which dublets he demanded 30. markes, but could haue no payment, Wat Tyler answered him, Friend, appeale thy selfe, thou shalt be well payd of this thy dublet-maker. any time, and then, keepe thee more mee, I will be thy creditor: And therewith hee spurred his horse, departed from his company, and came so neere the King, that his horse head touched the crope of the Kings horse, and the first word he said, was this, Sir King, seest thou all yonder people? yea truely, quoth the King, wherefore said thou so? because said he, they be all at my commandement, and haue sworne to me, faith and truth, to doe all that I will haue them. In good time, said the King, I will well it be so. Then said Wat Tyler, beleeuest thou King, that these people, and as many more as be in London at my commandement, will depart from thee thus, without hauing thy letters? No said the King, yee shall haue them, they be ordained for you, and shall be deliuered to euery each of them, with which words, Wat Tyler seeing the Knight, Sir John Newton, neere to him on horseback, bearing the Kings Sword, was offended, and said, it had become him better to be on foote in his presence. The Knight (not hauing forgot his old accustomed manhode) answered, that it was no harme, seeing himselfe was also on horseback: which words so offended Wat, that hee drew his dagger, and offered to strike at the Knight, calling him traitor: the Knight answered, that he lyed, and drew his dagger likewise. Wat Tyler not suffering such a continuely done to him before his rusticks, made, as if hee would haue runne on the Knight. The King therefore seeing the Knight in danger, to auoyde the rigor of War, for the time, commanded the Knight to light on foote, and to deliuer his dagger vnto the said Walter, and when his pryde minde could not be so pacified, but he would also haue his sword, the Knight answered, it was the Kings sword, and quoth hee, thou art not worthy to haue it, nor durst thou aske it of mee, if here were no more but thou and I. By my faith said Wat Tyler, I shall neuer eate till I haue thy head, and would haue runne on the Knight: and with that came to the King, William Walworth, Maior of London, and many Knights and Esquires on the Kings side, affirming that it were great shame, such as had not beene heard of, if in their presence, they should permit a noble knight so shamefully to be murthered according to the fancy of the Common people: and indeede it was said, that with great pride, he had but the day before said, putting his hand to his lips, that before foure daies came to an end, all the lawes of England should proceed from his mouth. permit a noble knight so shamefully to be murthered before his face, wherefore he ought to be rescued speedily, and Tyler to be arrested. Which thing being heard, the King, although hee were but tender of yeres, taking boldnesse vnto him, commanded the Maior of London to set hand on him. The Maior being of an incomparable boldnesse and man-hode, without any doubting, straight arrested him on the head, Wat Tyghler furiously stroke the Maior with his dagger, but hurt him not by meane he was armed, then the Maior drew his hasclard, and grieuously wounded Wat in the necke, and gaue him a great blow on the head, in which conflict, an Esquire of the Kings house, called John Cauendish, drew his sword, and wounded him twice or thrice, euen vnto death, and Wat Wat Tyler. spurring his horse, crped to the commons to reuenge him, his horse bare him about foure foote from thence, where he fell downe halfe dead, and by and by, they which attended on the King inuironed him all about, whereby hee was not seene of his company, and other thrust him in with their weapons, in diuers places of his body, and then they drew him from amongst the peoples sight, into the Hospitall of S. Bartilmew: which when the Commons perceiued, they cryed out, that their Captaine was trayterously slaine, and heartening one another to reuenge his death, bending their bowes, the King hearing both wisdome and courage, pricking his horse with his spurres, rode to them, and said: What a worke is this my men, what meane you to doe, will you that our King be not quarrellous, nor sorry for the death of a traytor and ribald: I will be your King, I am your Captaine and Leader, follow mee into the field, there to haue whatsoeuer you will require.

John Cauendish drew his sword.

Hen. Knighton.

This the King did, lest the Commons being set in a bitternesse of minde, should set fire on the houses in Smithfield, where their Captaine was slaine. They therefore followed him into the open field, and the souldiers that were with him, as yet not knowing whether they would kill the King, or be in rest, and depart home with the Kings Charter.

In the meane time, the Maior of London, onely with one seruant, riding speedily into the Citty, began to cry, yee good Citizens, helpe for a power, your King that is to be murthered, and succour mee your Maior, that am in the like danger, or if you will not succour me, yet leaue not your King destitute; when the Cittizens had heard this, in whose hearts the loue of the king was ingrafted, suddenly, seuerely prayed, to the number of a thousand men tarryed in the streetes, for some one of the Knights to lead them to the King, and by fortune, Sir Robert Knowles came in that instant, whom they all requested to be their leader, left comming out of order, and not in good aray, they mought easily be broken; who gladly brought part of them: Sir Parducase Dalbart, and other knights brought the rest to the Kings presence. When the Maior came to Smithfield, and did not find Wat Tyghler, (as hee left him wounded) he greatly marueiled, demanding where the traytor was, and it was told him that he was carried into the Hospitall of Saint Bartlemew and laid in the Maisters Chamber; the Maior went straight thither, and made him to be carried into Smithfield, and there caused him to be beheaded, his head to be set on a pole, and borne before him to the King, then remaining in the field, and the King caused it to be borne there vnto him, therewith to abash the Commons, greatly thanking the Maior for that act.

Wat Tyler beheaded by commandement of the Maior.

The King, and those that were with him, Knights and Esquires, reioycing at the vnhoped for comming of the Maior, and those armed men, suddenly compassed all the multitude of the Commons.

There might a man haue seene a wonderfull change of Gods right hand, how the Commons did now throw downe their weapons, and fall to the ground, beseeching pardon, which lately before did glory, that they had the Kings life in their power, now they hid themselues in caues, ditches, cornefields, &c. The Knights therefore coueting to be reuenged, besought the King to permit them to take off the heads of an hundred or two of them, but the King not condescending to their request, commanded the Charter which they had demanded, written and sealed, to be deliuered vnto them for the time, to auoyde more mischiefe, knowing that Essex was not as yet pacified, nor Kent Hayde, the Commons and Rusticks of which Countries were ready to rise againe, if hee satisfied not their pleasure the sooner. The Commons hauing got this Charter, departed home, but ceased not from their former euill doings.

The rude people being thus dispersed and gone, the King commanded Will. Walworth to put a basenet on his head, for feare of that which might follow, and the Maior requested to know for what cause hee should so doe, sith all was quieted, the King answered, that hee was much bound to him, and therefore hee should be made Knight; the Maior againe answered, that hee was not worthy, neyther able to take such estate vpon him, for he was but a Merchant, and to liue by his Merchantdize, notwithstanding, at last, the King made him put on his basenet, and then tooke a sword with both his hands, and strongly with a good will, strake him on the necke, and the same day hee made three other Cittizens Knights for his sake in the same place, which were John Philpot, Nicholas Brembar, and Robert Laund, Aldermen, and Sir John Candish in Smithfield was Knighted. The King gaue to Sir VVilliam VValworth 100. pound land, and to the other 40. pound land, to them and their heires for euer: vpon the Sand-hill towards Islington, were created the Earles marshall, and Pembrooke, and shortly after, Nicholas Twiford, and Adam Francis Aldermen, were also made knights. Sir Robert Knowles his good seruice in the Citty, was by the Kings commandement, made a free man of the Citty.

The King, with his Lords, and all his company, orderly entred into the City of London with great ioy. The King went to the Lady Princesse his mother, who was then lodged in the Towre-royall called the Queenes Wardrobe, and there she had remained two dayes and two nights right sore abashed, but when shee saw the King, her Sonne, she was greatly reioyced, and said, Ah faire Sonne, what great sorrow haue I suffered for you this day? The King answered, and said, certainely, Madame, I know it well, but now reioyce, and thank God, for I haue this day recouered mine inheritage, and the Realme of England, which I had neer haue lost.

The Tower-royall in London.

The Archbishops head was taken downe off the Bridge, and Wat Tylers head was set in that place.

Durelong it were in this booke to set downe the troubles at Saint Albons, by the bondmen there against the Abbot, and other, for liberties which they claimed, as the like did in other places, committing many abominable acts, but somewhat to speake of them within the parts of Suffolke and Norfolke.

The Saterday, whereof we haue before spoken, that the tempest might seeme to be generall, God sent his wrath into the parts of Suffolke and Norfolke, by sending Officers men to moue the people that lined in quietnesse, to raise like commotions, and to turne the hearts of the bondmen, or seruants against their Lords. The which making to their Captaine a most vngracious Priest, named John VVraw, who had beene at London the day before, and was instructed by VVat Tyler, cassly assembled a multitude of those common people. These according to the manner of them at London, ouerthrew houses and Mannors of great men, and of Lawyers, slew the Students of the Law, and catching Sir John Cauendish, a Iustice of the Realme, some say, Lord chiefe Iustice, beheaded him, and set his head on the pillory in the Towne of Bury. Sir Iohn of Cambridge, Prior of Bury, they caught and strooke off his head, his body was left naked in the field the space of three dayes, none presuming to bury it, for feare of the Rusticks. his head was set on the pillory by the head of Sir John Cauendish. Then entred they the Cloyster of the Monastery, take Sir John Lakingnith, keeper of the Barony, balled him out with great noyse, in the Market place they strooke off his head with eyght strokes, and left it on the pillory, they compelled the Monkes that remained (for their Abbot, Edmond Bromfield, was in prison at Nottingham) to grant them Charters, &c.

Sir Iohn Cauendish. Lord chiefe Iustice, the Prior of Bury and other beheaded by the Rebells.

No small multitude of Commons beeing got together vnder the leading of a certaine Dyer of Norwich, called Iohn Liststar, began to worke such malkerie, as in other places had beene put in practise, putting their hands vnto robbery, so that no place might be free from them: they thought to haue got to them VVilliam de Vfford, Earle of Suffolke, that they might might do their businesse vnder colour of his authority, but the Earle being warned of their comming, suddenly rose from supper, and taking his iourney towards woods and defarts, came to Saint Albons, and from thence to the King, layning himselfe to be the Lacky of Sir Roger de Boys, and bearing a Wallet behinde him. The Commons thus deceiued, forthwith feased vpon the houses of other Knights, and finding them, compelled them to bee sworne to ride thorow the Countrey with them, which if they had denyed, they had dyed for it.

The Knights that were thus compelled, were the Lord Schales, Sir William Morley, Sir Iohn de Brues, Sir Steuen de Hales, Sir Robert de Sale, which Sir Rob. blaming their doings, was smitten into the braine by one of his bondmen. The other perceiuing that they must dissemble, or dye a shamefull death, determined to say all things was well. Whereupon being brought in fauour with Liststar, (who named himselfe King of the Commons) those Sir Steuen Hales (because hee was a comely Knight) to carue before him, and to take the assay of his meates, and to the other he appointed other offices.

Sir Robert Sale slaine by the bondmen.

John Liststar King of the Commons and serued by Knights.

Now the Commons sent two Knights, Sir VVilliam de Morley, and Sir John Brewes, with three of the Commons, in whom they especially trusted, vnto the King at London, or else-where, for to purchase of him a Charter of manumission and pardon, the which that it might be more speciall then other, they deliuered vnto the said messengers a great summe of money, which they had received of the Cittizens of Norwich, vnder pretext to saue their Citty from burning and murther. The Knights with their companions, when they came to a Towne, named Ignigham, not farre distant from New-market, they met with the Bishop of Norwich, Sir Henry Spencer well armed: for as hee was at his Mannor of Burley, neere Ockam Castle, not farre from Stamford, hee heard of the Norfolke men, and determined to goe against them, hee had not at that time past an eight speares, and a small number of Archers, yet beholding the Knights, and some of the Commons, hee commanded them vpon their allegiance, to tell him if there were any of the Kings traytors. The Knights for feare of the Commons, dissembled to answere, the Bishoppe willed them boldly to goe to, and if there were any of the Kings traytors, to deliuer them to him: the Knights taking courage, answered, that two of the chiefest Rurrers among the whole company were present, and that the third was gone forth to prouide their dinner, and heerewith they shewed the cause of their iourney. The Bishop straightwayes commanded these two to lose their heads, and the third, his himselfe went to seeke, whose head also he caused to be cut off, and their heads were see vp at New-Market. Then the Bishoppe with the Knights, haste towards Norfolke, meaning to come to a place called Norwalsham, where the Commons were determined to stay for the Kings answer.

The end of John Liststar.

In passing the Countrey the Bishops number increased, for diuers Knights and many gentlemen of the countrey that lay hid for feare of the Commons, seeing the Bishop in Armour, they came forth and ioyned with him. The Bishop therefore when he came to the said place, hauing about him a seemely company, he found that the Commons had entrenched themselues after the manner of warre, and set vpon the rampier of their trench, timbowes, bowes, tables, bordes, with pales for their defence: behind them they had placed their carts, as if they meant not to flee, and forthwith the Martiall Bishop commanded his trumpets to sound, and taking a speare in his hand, set spurs to his horse, and so carried forth vpon them, with such a courage, that (by swift race he got the trench of them) as he had beene a young boy, rode amongst the enemies where they were thickest, driuing this man through, & felling that man downe and ceased not till the company following, had got the trench were ready to fight, those of the Bishops retinue therefore fought very sharply, and so likewise, did the Commons, till at length the Commons flee, but the Bishop stopped them, knocking them downe, till the chiefe stirrers of the tumult being taken with their King John Liststar (so many as pleased him being saued alive) he got the full victory. The Bishop brought the said John Liststar vnto drawing, hanging, and heading: and so the countrey was in peace.

Thus hauing throwed a few things, which were done in Norfolke, I passe ouer to write of the rest done in that and other Countries, but what they ment against the King, the confession of Iacke Straw declareth, who was chiefe amongst them, next to Wat Tiler. This man being taken, when at London hee should by iudgement giuen by the Maior, lose his head; the Maior spake openly to him thus. John (quoth he) behold thy death is at hand without all doubt, and there is no way through which thou mayst hope to escape, wherefore for thy soules health, without making any lye, tell vs what you purposed amongst you to haue done, to what end did you assemble the Commons? And when hee had stayd a while as doubtfull what to say, deterring his answere, the Maior added, Thou knowest surely, O John, that the things which I demand of thee, if thou doe it, the same shall redound to thy soules health, &c. He therefore animated with kayre promises, began as followeth.

Iacke Straw his confession at the Gallowes to the Maior and citizens.

Purpose of the Rebells.

Now saith he, it boteth not to lye, neither is it lawfull to vtter any vntruth, especially vnder standing that my soule is to suffer more straiter torments if I should so doe, and therefore I hope of two commodities by speaking the truth, first that these things that I shall speake may profite the Common-wealth: and secondly, after my death, I trust by your suffrages to be succoured, according to your promises (which is to pray for me) I will speake faithfully without deceipt.

The same time (saith hee) that we came to Conspiracie of the rebels.

Blackheath, when wee sent for the King, we purposed to haue murdered all the knights Esquires and gentlemen that should haue come with him, and to haue led the King royally vsed vp and downe, that with the sight of him all men (especially the common people) might haue come vnto vs the more boldly, and when wee had got together an innumerable multitude, we would haue sodainly put to death in euery Countrey, the Lords and maisters of the common people, in whom might appeare to bee either counsell or resistance against vs: and specially wee would haue destroyed the knights of Saint Johns, lastly we would haue killed the King himselfe, and all men that had béene of any possession, Bishops, Monkes, Chanons, Parsons, to be briefe, we would haue dispatched: only begging Fryers should haue liued, that might haue sufficed for ministring the Sacraments in the Realme, for we would haue made Kings W Tyler in Kent, & in euery other shire one. But because this our purpose was hindred by the Arch-bishop, wee studied how to bring him shortly to his end.

Against the same day that Wat Tyler was killed, wee purposed that euening (because that the poore people of London séemed to fauour vs) to set fire in foure corners of the Citie, & so to haue burnt it, and to haue diuided the riches at our pleasures among vs. Hee added that these things they purposed to haue done, as God should helpe him at the end of his life.

Iacke Straw beheaded.

After this confession made, hs was beheaded and his head set on London Bridge by VVat Tilers and many other.

Principall Captaines.

The principall Leaders of the Commons were VVat Tyler, the second Iohn Straw, the third John Kirkby, the fourth Alen Threder, the fift Thomas Scot, the first Ralph Rugge: these and many others were leaders of the Kentish and Essex men. At Mildenhall and Bury in Suffolke was Robert VVestbrom, that made himselfe King and was most famous after: John Wraw, who being a priest would not set crowne vpon crowne, but left the name of King and crowne to the said Robert. At Norwich John Litistar a dier, exercised the name and power of a King, till he was taken and hanged for his paines.

VVat Tyler being killed, Iacke Straw and other their principall Captaines hanged or headed, the hope and confidence of the Commons decayed, but because the minds of the King & the nobles was yet wauering, séeing the people ready to mischiefe, they granted to them Charters of manumission and suffered them to depart, the which being done, the K. caused an army to be assembled from London, and sent into all countries, that those who were his friends should make haste to come to him to London, furnished with horse and armour, and it came to passe that within three dayes he had a xl. thousand horsemen about him in seemely sort armed, hee mustred them on Blackheathe, himselfe riding on a great courser, with his standard borne before him, when therefore so mighty an army was assembled, the king was aduertised that the Kentishmen had ditsoones conspired, whereupon he forthwith set forward, but by the mediation of the Nobles & great men of Kent that vndertooke for them, hee was staid and pacified with them, and then first Iustices were sent to séeke and enquire of malefactors, and that Countrey became quiet at the sight of them. Then the Maior of London sitting in iudgement, caused the malefactors to be tryed, as well of the City as also of Kent, Essex, Southsex, Norfolk, and Suffolke and other Countries that might bée taken within the liberties of the Citie, and all those whom he found guiltie of the foresaid treason, hee caused to hop headlesse, among the which were Iacke Straw, John Kirkeby, Alen Threder, &c. also Iohn Searling of Essex, that glozied to haue beheaded the Archbishop, was beheaded himselfe.

Maior of London caused malefactors of the Citie, of Kent, Essex, Sussex, Norfolke and Suffolk that might be taken, to hop headlesse.

The King remained now at London, now at Waltham, with a great army of armed men, considering what was to be done for the commoditie of the Realme. At length the Counsell thought good to send the Kings commission into euery Shire, for the resisting of the disquieters of the peace of the Kingdome. These commissions did much comfort the faithfull subiects, and troubled the false, for they were now compelled to séeke corners, that before tooke vpon them to doe all things abroad. Lawyers now durst come forth of their dennes and those which before fled from the tyranny of the time, looked for those that now feared iudgement and iustice to be done on them.

An. Reg. 5.

The Commons being thus feared, but not in all places alike, they of Essex gathering a new multitude together at Bylleric, a village néere to Hatfield Peuerell, decréed either to inioy liberty gotten by force, or to die in fighting for the same, they sent to the K. then being at Waltham messengers to know if hee thought good to permit them to enioy their permitted liberty, like to their Lords, and that they should not be compelled to come to courts, but onely to great Léets twise in the yeare, vnto the which the K. answered thus. Oh miserable and hatefull both to land and sea, not worthy to liue, doe yée require th be equall to your Lords? Ye were worthy to be put to most shamefull death: but sith yée are come as messengers, ye shall not die now, to the end yée may declare our answeres to your fellowes: declare to them therefore on the K. behalfe, that as they were husbandmen & bondmen, so shall they remaine in bondage, not as before, but more vile without comparison.

Commons of Essex gathered together at Billerica, send messengers to the King.

Answere of the King to the Commons of Essex.

Whilest we liue, & by Gods sufferance shall gouerne the kingdome, with wit, strength and goods, wée will endeauour our selues to kéepe you vnder, to that the dutie of your seruice, may be an example for posteritie, & that your matches both present, and that shall succéede, may euer haue before their eyes, as it were in a glasse, your miserie, & to you matter to curse, and feare to commit the like. When the messengers were gone, there was sent straight wayes into Essex, Thomas of Woodstocke,

Earle

Earle of Buckingham, and Sir Tho. Percy, brother to the Earle of Northumberland, to represse the boldnesse of the said commons.

These commons had fortified themselues with ditches & carriages: neuertheless, although there was a great number of them, with small businesse, they were scattered into the woods, where the Lords inclosed them, lest any of them might escape: and it came to passe that fiue hundred of them were slaine, and 8. hundred of their horses taken, the other that escaped this slaughter being gotten together, hasted to Colchester, and began to stirre the townesmen to a new tumult, and when they possessed not there, they went to Sudbury, but the Lord Fitzwalter and Sir John Harlestone followed them, and slew as many of them as they list, and shut vp the rest in prisons. The K. came to his Manor of Hauering at Bowre, and after to Chelmesford, where he appointed Sir Robert Trisilian his Iustice to sit and enquire of the malefactours, wherefore he men séeing the euill that hung ouer their heads, there came aboue fiue hundred humbly to the King bare-foted and bare-headed, beséeching him of pardon and mercy. To whom pardon was granted, with conditions, to deliuer the stirrers of the said trouble. It came therefore to passe, that many were committed to ward, vpon whom the Iustice charged foure & twentie men of their conscience to say the truth, and many being condemned, were put to execution, by drawing and hanging, nine or ten being hanged on one beame. The Iustices that before had sit in Essex, Kent, London, and other places, for all the multitude that were to bée executed, vsed to head the Commons. till now it séemed not a kinde of death answerable to so many and manifest crimes. These things were done in Essex, the King being present, the like by his Iustices was done in other countries.

Robert Trisilian Iustice sate at Chelmesford.

Sir John Ball taken & brought to Saint Albones.

The tenth of July John Ball Priest being taken at Couentry and brought to S. Albones, was there before the King condemned, and had iudgement giuen him by Sir Robert Trisilian Knight a most skilfull Iustice, as a traytour to be drawne, hanged, headed, & bowelled, whose death was respited vntill the Munday at the intercession of William Bishop of London, who being carefull for his soules health, obtained that space for his repentance. This man a twenty yéeres together and more, preached in diuers places those things which hee knew to be liking to the common people, flattering alwell ecclesiasticall persons, as secular Lords, séeking thereby, rather the benevolence of the common people, then merite towards God: he taught that tithes were not to bee giuen to the Churchmen, except the partie that should giue the same were richer then the Vicar or parson that should receiue it. Also that tithes and oblations were to bée withdrawne from Curates, if the Parishioners or Parishioner were of better life then the Curate. Also that no man was méete for the Kingdome of God, that was not borne in matrimony, hée taught many other things too long to rehearse, for the which hee was prohibited of the Bishops in whose diocelles he had attempted these things, that hée should not preach from thence-forth in any Church: hée went forth therefore into the stréetes and wayes, and into fields to preach, & there wanted not of the commons that came to heare him, whom hee euer sought to allure to his Sermons, by detracting of the prelates. At the length being excommunicated, and yet not desisting hee was committed to prison by Simon the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, & William Bishop London, where hee prophesied that hee should bée deliuered by twentie thousand of his friends, which came so to passe in the forsaid time of troubles, when all prisons were broken vp, and the prisoners out of them, and when he was so deliuered, hee followed them, inflagating them to commit much euill, and preaching that so it ought to be done. And that his doctrine might infect the more number of people, at Blacke-heath, where there were many thousands of the commons assembled, he began his Sermon in this manner.

When Adam dolue and Euah span,
Who was then a Gentle-man?

John Ball his Sermon.

And continuing his begun Sermon, hee fought by the word of that Prouerbe which hee tooke for his Theame, to introduce, & proue, that from the beginning, all were made alike by nature, and bondage & seruitude was brought in by vniust oppressio of naughty men, against the will of God: for if it had pleased God to haue made bond-men, hée would haue appointed them from the beginning of the world, who should haue béene slaue, and who Lord. They ought to consider therefore, that now there was a time giuen them by God, in the which, laying aside the yoke of continuall bondage, they might, if they would, enioy their long wished for libertie. Wherefore he admonished them, that they should be wise and after the manner of a good husband that tilled his ground, and did cut away all noysome weeds that were accustomed to grow and oppresse the fruite, they should make haste to doe now at this present the like. First, the Arch-bishop & great men of the Kingdome were to be slame: after, Lawyers, Iusticiars, & Questmongers: lastly, whomsoeuer they knew like hereafter to be hurtfull to the commons, they should dispatch out of the land, for so might they purchase safety to themselues hereafter, if the great men being once taken away, there were among them equall libertie, all one nobilitie and like dignitie, and semblable authoritie or power. These, and many such mad deuises hee preached, which made the comon people to esteeme of him in such manner, as they cryed out, hée should be Archbishop of Canterbury & Chancellor of the Realme, for he onely deserued the honour. Moreouer, he had sent to the borders of the comons in Essex a Letter full of riddles or darke sentences, exhorting them to proceede in their begunne enterprises, which letter was after found in the budget of one that should bee hanged, the tenour whereof was thus.

Lithel. Iohn Ball. John Shepe, sometime Saint-Mary Priest of Yorke, and now of Colchester, greeteth well John namelesse, and John Miller, and John Carter, and biddeth them that they beware of Gilliingbrough alias Citenbrough, and standeth together in Gods name, and biddeth Pierce Ploughman goe to his worke, and chastice well Hob the robber, and take him with 10. Trueman, and all his fellowes, and no more: John the Miller hath ground small small, the Kings sonne of heaven shall pay for all, beware or ye be woe, know your friend from your foe, haueth enough, and saith hoe, and doe well and better, and seeketh peace, and seeke it, and holde therein, and so biddeth John Trueman and all his fellowes.

This letter John Ball confessed himselfe, that he had written and sent to the commons: moreover, he confessed to William then Bishop of London, to Walter Lee knight, and John Fersoor Notarie, that a certaine company of his sect, were confederate to goe round about all England, and to preach their points which he had taught, naming LVVNALB. masters of Arts. Whereupon he added, that except remedy were had, they within 2. yeres space would destroy the whole Realme, and this confession under a certaine forme was brought into a publike instrument. This Sir John Ball was hanged and headed at Saint Albones on the 15. of July, the King being present, and his body being quartered was sent to 4. Cities of the Realme: some other Epistles of the said Ball haue I seene, which also I thinke good (as afore) here to insert.

Sir John Ball hanged.

Epistle of Iohn Ball.

John Ball Saint Mary Priest, greeteth well all manner of men, and biddeth them in name of the Trinitie, Father, Sonne, & holy Ghost, stand manlike together in truth, & helpe truth, and truth shall helpe you: now raigneth pride in price, coustise is holden wise, letchery without shame, gluttony without blame, envie raigneth with reason, and sloath is taken in great season, God doe bote, for now is time. Amen.

Iacke Miller. Iacke Miller, asketh helpe to turne his mill aright, he hath ground small, small, the Kings sonne of heaven shall pay for all: looke thy will goe right with foure sailes, and the post stand in stedfastnes with right and might, with skill and will, let might helpe right, and skill before will, and right before might, then goeth our Mill aright: and if might goe before right, and will before skill, then is our Mill mistright.

Iacke Trueman. Iacke Trueman doeth you to vnderstond,
That falsenesse & guile hath raigned too long:
And trueth hath beene set vnder a locke,
And falsenesse raigneth in every flocke.
No man may come truth to,
But he must sing, si dedero.
Speake, spend and spad quoth Iohn of Bathon, and therefore,
Sinne fareth as wilde floud,
True lcue is a way that is so good.
And clarkes for wealth witcheth them woe,
God doth boote, for now is time.

I leaue out Iohn Carters Epistle, a libell, so named, &c.

A great number of the Commons being indited, and hauing iudgement, at S. Albons fiftene of them were hanged, and and fourscore imprisoned, and afterward by pardon released, and on the twentieth day of July the King removed to Berkhamstead.

Truce with the Scots.

Iohn Duke of Lancaster that a little before these troubles began, was gone Northward to be at the day of truce of march, as the manner was every yeere, when he heard of the hurling of the commons, in the time that they had the vpper hand ouer their Lords, he was meruellously amazed, and forecasting what might follow, thought it best, with speed to make peace with the Scots, which was done before those tumults came to the eares of the Scots, & by them confirmed by oth for 2. yeares truce, that they would faithfully keepe the same.

Willi. Courney Archebishop of Canterburie.

William Courtney son to Hugh Courtney, Earle of Deuonshire, Doctour of Law, first Bishop of Hereford, since Bishop of London, was now translated to the Arch-bishoprick of Canterburie on the ninth of September. And Robert Braybrooke succeeded in the Bishoprick of London.

Durham Colledge founded.

Thomas Hatfield Bishop of Durham deceased, he founded Durham Colledge in Oxford, he also builded Durham place, betwixt London and Westminster. Iohn Fordham Bishop of Ely was translated to the Bishoprick of Durham.

Parliament at London.

About the feast of All Saints, a Parliament was begunne, which indured long, to small purpose, by reason of contention among the Lords, especially the Duke of Lancaster, and the Earle of Northumberland, whose quarrell in the end was taken vp by the King, and then the Lords proceeded to treate of the Kings businesse and the Realmes, but they lingered so long in vaine, that when some effect was thought should haue succeeded, newes came of the comming to Calais of the new Quéene. The King had made his choyce before to haue this woman, and had bought her with a great price and much labour, for he gaue to the Emperour ten thousand pound, beside other great expenses, to make this marriage. Although the Daughter of Barnabe Duke of Millan was offered vnto him with an inestimable summe of golde. This Quéenes comming therefore being vnderstood, the Parliament was prorogued, to begin againe after Christmasse. There were diuers of the Nobles sent to méet the Bride, and she was conueyed with all the glory of the world into Douer, many both of her Countrey, and also of England, attending on her.

After the Feast of the Epiphany, also, the Nobilitie of the Realme assembled at London, to be present at the Kings Marriage, and to do their service according to the custome of euery one in ancient time vsed. This Virgin named Anne,

Anne, the daughter of Vesclaus King of Boheme, is at Westminst. consecrated the Kings wife, and by the Arch-bishop of Canterbury is crowned Quéene. There were iustes kept for the honour of such a solemnization, certaine dayes together, in which, both the Englishmen shewed their force, and the Quéenes Countrymen their prowesse.

The King married.

Piked shoes high heads, & long-tailed gowns, with women riding astride first vsed in England.

In this Quéenes dayes, began the detestable vse of piked shoes, tyed to their knees with chaines of siluer and guilt. Also noble women vsed high attire on their heads, piked hornes, with long trained gownes, and rode on side saddles, after the example of the Quéne who first brought that fashion into this land, for before women were vsed to ride astride like men. The solemnitie of the marriage being ended, the Parliament is now begun again, in which, many articles are proposed & decreed, to wit, of admitting strangers to sell personally their wares, without impeachment of the merchants of England: of the abrogating of furres, and siluer garnishing of girdles &c. of the price of wines, that is, that the tun should not exceed fiue markes, &c.

William Vfford Earle of Suffolke dyed suddainly.

William Vfford Earle of Suffolke, in this Parliament, being elected by the knights of the shires, to pronounce on their behalfes the businesse of the Realme, the very day and houre in which hee should haue executed the businesse hee had taken in hand, as he was going vp the staires that leade into the Chamber where all the Nobilitie of the Realme sate, hee sodainly fell downe, and among his mens hands that were wont to hold him, he yelded vp the Ghost, although being very merry, and feeling no euill a little before, as euen at that instant hee had entred Westminster Hall, of whose sodaine death, not onely all the Nobles of the Realme were greatly amazed, but all the meaner sort, for in all his life time he had shewed himselfe amiable to all men.

Custome of woolles, &c.

After his death the Parliament was ended, after the marchants of England had granted to the King a subsidie, and fiue customes of woll for foure yeares next ensuing, which the Commons called le Maltot.

In this Parliament, the Lords and Commons requesting it, Sir Richard Scrope knight was ordained Chancello, as the man which in excellent knowledge and inflexible iustice, had not his like for his calling in this Realme. Sir Hugh Segraue knight, was made Lord Treasurer.

An. reg. 6. Mortimer E. of March deceased.

Edward Mortimer Earle of March departed this life in Ireland, after he had brought that land all in manner vnto peace and quietnesse, hauing gouerned it most nobly and wisely.

About the feast of S. Iohn ante port latine, all the Nobles of the Realme were called to London, and other that of custome were wont to be called, although the Lent before there had béene another Parliament, as before we haue shewed, in which, by the petition of the knights of the shires, Iohn Wraw Priest, that was leader of them that did rise at Mildenhall and Iohn Wraw hanged.

Bury, was adiudged to hanging and drawing, though many beleeued that he would haue béene redeemed with money.

Earthquake.

The one and twentieth day of May was a great Earth-quake in England at nine of the clocke, fearing the hearts of many, but in Kent it was most vehement, where it sunke some Churches, and threw them downe to the earth.

Hist. Aurea.

There followed also another Earth quake the xviii. of May in the morning, before the Sunne rising, but not so terrible as the first. Sir Richard Scrope is deprived of the Chancellorship, which he had gouerned laudably, and Robert Braybroke Bishop of London, is made Chancellor.

There arrived in a great tempest, a Ship called a Carricke, at Sandwich, an huge bessell, and so freought with riches, that he might haue furnished the want of all the land, if the enuie of the inhabitants would haue permitted, but the marchants of London hauing much old wares, as fruits, spices, apples, and such like, they compounded with the Genowayes to forsake the hauen and to passe ouer into Flanders, and to for the conetousnes of a few, the whole Realm suffered great hindrance.

Sir Io. Burghley, Sir Sim. Burghley, Rich. Burghley Knight.

King Richard gaue to Sir Simon Burghley, his chamberlaine the keeping of his Forrest of Wolmoze in Southamptonshire, for the time of his life: he also gaue to Iohn Burghley, Simon Burghley, Rich. Burghley knights, and Gawdwine de Radington Esquire, all the manner of Parroke nigh to Graues-end.

Great flod.

About the Feast of Saint Thomas the Apostle, great raynes and inundations of waters chanced, so that the water rose seuen times more in height then before, drowning vp Villages and Cattaile, destroying Bridges and Milles.

1387.

Bishop of Norwich.

About the moneth of May, the Bishop of Norwich taried ouer the Seas into Flanders, with a great power, where he won the Townes of Graueling, Bzugh, Dunkerke, and Newport.

Whilest these things are thus doing in Flanders, the King of England and his Quéene, with their Bohemians visited the Abbeyes of this Realme, to the intent their comming was very chargeable, for they came with an excessiue number, all which came to take, but not to giue.

An. reg. 7. The Scots entred Northumberland.

The Scots taking occasion of the time, for that a great number were gone ouer with the Bishop of Norwich, entred into Northumberland, and did much hurt to the inhabitants, taking preyes in every place, and leading away the people prisoners, and carrying them into Scotland: they take the castle of Warke vpon the riuer of Twede, and burnt it.

Parliament at London.

About the feast of All-Saints, a Parliament was holden at London, in which, the halfe of a fiftene was granted vnto the King by the Lapitie, and shortly after the helpe of a tenth by the Cleargie, a portion of which money, the Lords of the North demanded, because in this Parliament they were appointed to defend those parts against the irruptions of Scotics, to whom answere was made by Sir William Wickham Bishop of Winchester, that they were made for that cause, of poore men, rich men and Lords, that they might the more frankly keepe the Scottes, and that the King and Lords of the South parties should bee the lesse troubled. And because the Scots came not to this parliament, according to couenant, and beside that, did displeasures vnto the inhabitants of the North-parts, it was decréed by this Parliament, that vnto faith-breakers, faith should be broken againe, and that a chosen power should be sent thither, forth of England, vnder the leading of Thomas of Woodstocke, to witte, a thousand Lances, and two thousand Archers, to restraine their attempts.

Thomas of woodstocke sent against the Scots.

These things being knowne, the Scots being afraid of themselues, in the end of the parliament came, and were desirous to intreat of peace or truce, but the Englishmen hauing lately their faithed so oftentimes, would neither treat nor compound with them, but commanded them to returne home, and warned them to saue their heads as well as they might, and to defend their rights. The Scots being returned, the Lords of the North take vpon them to defend the Countrey, till Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham was readie to come with a greater power.

Temporalties of the Bishop of Norwich seized.

In this Parliament the king toke the temporalties of the Bishop of Norwich into his hands, because he was disobedient to his commandement, when he sent to haue stayed him from his iourney into Flanders, & the knights that went ouer with him were put in prison, till they were redéemed with gold.

1384. King Richard held his Christmas at his Manor of Eltham, and with him his Quéene Anne.

Truce with the French.

After Christmas, John Duke of Lancaster which before Christmasse went ouer into France to treat of peace betwixt the Realms, returned into England, bringing with him an assurance of warre till the feast of S. Io. Baptist, at what time he was to returne to treate againe, and to confirme the peace if it might be agréed vpon betwixt the kings.

Lightning and thunder Iohn North-hampton alias Combertown.

The night of the Purification of our Lady, great lightnings and thunder happened, that put men in great feare: and shortly after Iohn Northampton, other wise called Combertown, that had béene the yeere before Maior of London, that with his seditions had filled the city full of comber, attempted new troubles, for in contempt of the Maior that was elected for that yeere, Sir Nicholas Brembar, knight, he went vp and downe with a multitude of seditious people to guard him, not once, but oftentimes, to the terrour of many. And when the said Brembar Maior would haue withstanded his attempts, the fauourers of the said Iohn Combartowne were turned into such a fury, that a cobler sewer of Newmarket, take vpon him as it were to be Maior, and required the voyces of the communaltie: for which cause, by the counsaile of Sir Rob. Knowles knight he was driuen out of his house, and cen mitted to prison as a stirrer of insurrection, which let not the time staid the commotion of the Commons, that were said to haue conspired, to haue murthered the elect Maior, and many other worthy men.

John Duke of Lancaster went toward Scotland.

When Lent approached, John Duke of Lancaster, with his brother Thomas of Woodstocke, Earle of Buckingham, & an innumerable number of knights, Esquires, and Archers went toward Scotland, but staid in the North vntill all the victuals in the Countrey were all consumed: he did more hurt to the inhabitants then the Scots had done before. At length about the feast of Easter, he entred Scotland, but did little good.

John Wicliffe died.

This yere maister Iohn Wickliffe sometime student in Canterbury College in the Vniuersity of Oxford, parson of Lutterworth in Leicester shire, hauing béene vexed with a palsy by the space of two yéeres, died, on the last of December, and was buried at Lutterworth. This man whiles hee liued, as also long after his death, was greatly fauoured by the students of that Vniuersity, as may appeare by letters testimoniall, made more then twenty yéeres after his decease, as followeth.

Letters testimoniall of the Vniuersity of Oxford of the life of Iohn Wicliffe.

To all children of our holy mother the church, vnto whom these presents shall come, the Chancellor and company of maisters of the Vniuersity of Oxford, sendeth greeting in our Lord euerlasting. For as much as it is not decent to compasse with continuall silence, the acts of the baliant, nor the landes and merits of the good, but that the same should be manifested to the world by true fame, for a witnesse of it selfe, and example of others, for that also the prudent discretion of humane nature, weeping mans cruelty, hath ordained this manner of remembrance, and this buckler of defence, against the blasphemous insulting of others, that when a testimony by word cannot alwaies be ready, a penne to write may supply: therefore it commeth to passe, that we hauing conceiued a special good mind, & tender care ouer the childe sometime of our Vniuersity Iohn Wicliffe professor of holy theologie, according to his deserts of his manners, doe testifie with heart, word, and writting, that his conditions, while hee liued, were commendable, whose honestie of manners, profundity of iudgement, and pleasantnes of flourishing fame, we count so much the more to bring to the knowledge of faithfull people, as the perfection of his conuersation, the diligence of his writings might be the more euidently knowne to tend to Gods glory, the wrale of his neighbor, & profit of the Church, wherefore we publish vnto you by these presents, that his conuersation from his tender yéeres continued till the time of his decease, hath béene héere right good & honest, so as there was neuer any motion or note of sinister suspition or infamie cast abroad of him, but in answering, reading, preaching, and soluting, hath behaued himselfe praise-worthy, like a stout Champion of the faith, vanquished by sentences of Scripture, like a Catholike man all those blasphemers of Christs Religion by their wilfull beggery. And therefore was not the foresaid Doctor condemned of heretical prautie, or yet by our prelates to be burnt after his burial. God defend therefore that our Prelates should haue condemned so good a man for an heretike, which in Logike, Philosophy, in Theologie, in Moralities, & Speculatiues, among all that hath written (as we thinke) in our Vniuersitie, without pere. All which things we desire to bring to the knowledge of all and singular persons vnto whose hands these presents may come, to the intent that the said Doctors fame may the oftner be had in remembrance. In witnesse whereof, we haue caused these our letters testimoniall to be sealed with our common seale.

Giuen at Oxford in our congregation house, the fifth day of the month of October. Anno 1406.

All this notwithstanding afterward (being excommunicated by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury) his bones, by a Doctor of Diuinitie of Oxford, named Richard Fleming Bishop of Lincolne, were taken vp and burnt, and the ashes throwne into the next water nere vnto Lutterworth 41. yéeres after his decease, in Anno 1425. by commandement of Pope Martine the fifth. Thus much for Wickliffe.

The custody of the Castle of Douer being voyd by the death of Robert Ashton, was then appointed to Simon Burley, who was made Constable there.

Simon Burley Constable of Douer. Parliament at Salisbury Iohn Duke of Lancaster accused.

After the Quindene of Easter the Nobles came together to a Parliament at Salisbury, whither a certaine Irish Fryer of the order of Carmelites, a Batchelor of Diuinitie named Iohn Latimer, hastes in an euill hower, for he had written a certain cedule in the which was conteined many horrible practises deuised (as he said) by the Duke of Lancaster, for it was in that cedule expressed, that the said Duke had determined lodainly to oppresse the king, and to take vpon him the kingdome, there was assigned the time, place, and other circumstances that might make euident proofe of the thing. The Fryer obtaining accesse into the kings presence, take the cedule to his owne hands, sweuring by the Sacrament of the bodie and blood of Christ, which that day he had receiued, that all written in that cedule was true. The Duke therefore being called to the king, ans hauing the cedule delinered into his hands, declared the king, that the Fryer might be put in safe keeping, till the day that he should shew the cause of those things which he had propounded against him, and belought the king, that Sir Io. Holland might haue speciall charge of him. This Ioh. Holland was the 2. brother by his mother, the sonne of the L. Tho. Holland, who gladly for the loue of his brother the Duke, did willingly accept the Fryer into his custodie. The night before the day giuen to the fryer to make his answere, I. Holland, & mother knight, called Sir Hen. Greene taking the Fryer, put a cord about his neck (some say about his armes) and with the same cord tying his eyes, hanged him vp from the ground, hauing a stone of weight of lead vpon his belly of such weight, that it might both torment him by streining him, as also kept his breath, & breake his backe bone, also a great fire was made vnder the soles of his feet, that might end his life, not with one kind, but with diuers kinds of torments, with violence whereof, the fryer being ouercome, died, but would neuer reuoke what he had said. The morrow after they caused the Fryers body to be drawne through the Towne as a traitor, that they might put away all suspition, that he were put to death wrongfully: but it is to be wondred at, that neither Esquire, Yeoman, nor Grome, or any other of mean estate, would harme the Fryer, but the knights did it themselues, they were Iudges, Officers, & executioners, and this was the fruit of this parliament, except that the king asked and had of the Laity halfe a fifteenth, & of the Cleargy halfe a tenth.

He had married the D. of Lancasters daughter and by whom he had children.

A Fryer tormented to death.

Irruption of the Scots Ann. reg. 8.

About this time, because the Scots ceased not to doe diuers damages to the Northumbers, the E. of Northumberland Henry Percy, prepareth to inuade Scotland. and to requite damage for damage, which enterprise accomplished, the Earle was no sooner returned, and sent home his armie, but that the Scots came againe, and heaped vp damage vpon damage in the countrey.

Sir Iohn Philpot deceased.

This Sommer, Sir Iohn Philpot a most faithfull knight, and Noble Citizen of London, that had a long time trauelled for the commodity of the Realme more then all other, and both with expences laid forth, and good affection borne, (for he had oftentimes relieued the king) departed this life, leauing none behind him, his like in good affections.

John Duke of Lancaster goeth into France.

About the beginning of August, the Duke of Lancaster went into France to treate with the French-men of peace, or else of truce to be had: the D. with his company of noble-men remaining long there, when it was thought that he should haue brought glad and ioyfull newes to his countrey, he returned with knowledge of warres, to follow the beginning of the next Sommer, the truce to endure but till the first of May, and so he returned, after he had spent 50000. Markes of siluer.

John Northampton rebuked, and committed to perpetuall prison.

Many of the Nobles assembled at Reading, to represse the seditious stirres of Iohn Northampton, late Maior of London, that at temptes ted great and haynous enterprises of the which he was conuict, his owne chaplein vttering many things that he went about and had deuised as well to the hinderance & harme of the king, as of the City of London, and when sentence should haue béene pronounced against him, the king being present, the wicked man made exclamation, & maintained that such iudgement ought not to passe in absence of his Lord the D. of Lancaster, but yet the iustice vsed such words, Iohn (saith he) the naughty deeds that are obiected against thee, thou oughtest to refell by battel, or els by the lawes of the land to be drawne, hanged, & quartered. And when he

London tale, nor would utter one word, it was decreed that he should be committed to perpetuall prison, and his goods to be confiscate to the K. vse, and that he should not come within one hundred miles of London during his life, & hee was sent therefore to the Castle of Tintagell in the confines of Cornewall, and in the meane space the Kings seruants spoyled his goods, Iohn More, Richard Northbery, and other, were likewise there conuict, and condemned to perpetuall prison, and their goods confiscate to the King, for certaine congregations by them made against the Fish-mongers in the Citie of London.

Parliament at London.

About the feast of Saint Martine, a Parliament was holden at London in the which nothing was done worth the memory, but that which still was in hand, and erecting of money of the clergy and common people, to maintaine the men of warre. And besides this, about the feast of Saint Andrew there was a combate fought in lists at Westminster, betwixt an Esquire of England named Iohn Welch of Grimesby, and one of Nauarre, called Mortileto de Vilenos, that had accused the English Esquire, of treason to the King and Realme, but the effect was, that when he was Captain of Cherbrough, he forced the wife of this Nauarois, as the said Nauaroys being afterward ouercome, and being ready to suffer death, did openly confesse, for the which cause, by the Kings iudgement, he was drawne and hanged, although the D. and many other did make earnest intercession to haue his life saued.

Combate at Lists.

Werwicke yeelded and won Calaise.

The Parliament was not yet ended, when newes came out of the North of the taking of Werwicke Castle by the Scots, the custodie where of the Earle of Northumberland, Sir Henry Percy did possesse, by right of his predecessors. The Scots by mediation of money, got entrance into that castle, by one that was put in trust with keeping of it; the Duke of Lancaster that loued not the Earle, was glad of this hap when hee knew it. It came to passe therefore by the Dukes procurement, that the Earle was condemned by iudgement of the Lords there present, the which execution was within a short while after released. The Earle of Northumberland, through the kings fauour restored to his life and possessions, without any long delayes, prepareth all furniture of war to besiege and win the said Castle of them that were within it, and after hee had gathered a mighty army, he lodainly besieged it, and after hee had laine about it a certaine time, it was compounded betwixt them without, and them within, that they within should forsake the Castle, and haue their liues and moueable goods, and for surrendring the Castle, they should haue of the Earle two thousand markes of English money, and by this meanes did the Earle recouer the Castle forth of the Scottish mens hands. King Richard kept a solemne feast of Christmas at Oltham with Queene Anne his wife, whom he solemne suffered to go from his face, there were at that feast the Bohemians, the Queenes Countreymen, that hauing once tasted the sweetnesse of this Iland, forgetting their owne country, like vnthankefull guests, would not goe home againe.

T. Walsing. hom.

Through certaine young men brought vp with the king, there arose great dissention betwixt him and the Duke of Lancaster, who departed from the Court, and went to his Castle of Pomfret, which he had fortified, but by meanes of the Kings Mother, this discord was appeased for a time.

The same time the conjunction of two of the greatest planets chanced, to wit, of Iupiter and Saturne, in the moneth of May, after the which a great mutation of Kingdomes followed.

The third of May was an Earth-quake.

The K. entred Scotland.

King Richard with a great Army entred Scotland, but the enemies would not shew themselues, wherefore hee burnt the countrey and returned.

The eighteenth of July there was an earthquake. Sir Iohn de Vienne that serued the French king, was sent into Scotland with a great multitude of shippes and men of warre, that ioyning with the Scots, they might infest all England, and that whilest they might draw the power of this Realme that way forth, the French king, with his Nauy and army, might the more at liberty enter other parts of the Realme, few or none being left at home to prohibite them their entry. The arrinall of this said Iohn being knowne in England, the King with all the Nobility prepared themselues to make a iourney thither: there came flocking vnto the K. such a number of knights, esquires, and Archers, as the like had not beene heard of in those dayes, in so much, as the number of hoyses amounted to three hundred thousand, as they were iudged, very large; the King reioyced hereat (as well he might) but the reioycing was shortly darkened at Yorke, by the fiercenesse of Sir Iohn Holland, the kings brother, that slew the Lord Ralph Stafford, son to the Earle of Stafford, in the way as he went to the Queene, whose seruant of houshold hee was, and greatly in fauour with her, and hee was no lesse beloued of the king, as hee that had beene brought vp with him, and beene his play-fellow from his tender age, where the king taking great indignation determined to pursue the said Sir Iohn Holland: hee caused therefore his goods to be confiscate. But Sir Iohn Holland fled to Beuerley, to enioy the liberties of the Church. The Lady Ione the kings mother, sent to intreat him for her other Sonne, and his brother, but when the messengers were returned to Wallingford, and that the Mother could perceiue no hope of grace to bee gotten in that behalfe, of the King, shee tooke it heauily, and fell sicke, and within foure or fiue dayes departed this life, her body being seared and cloſed in Lead, was kept at Wallingford, till the KING returne forth of Scotland, then to bee buried at Stanford, in the Church of the Fryers Pinors.

In the moneth of August, the K. of England with with a mighty power entred Scotland, with whose force the Scots and Frenchmen perceiuing themselues not able to match, they seeke to get them into the woods and places where they might be out of the way. The English army, then the which there hath not beene seene a fayrer, stronger, or greater, rideth through the Countrey, that was destitute of inhabitants, body of Cattell, and wanting victuals, for the Land was left desolate (as our men confessed) that they saw not so much as a bird, Owles only excepted. They found green corne on the ground, very faire and plentifull, which they either eate vp with their hoyses, or tread downe with their feete, but the enemies fleeing battell, our men did nothing to be accounted of, but burned the Abbey of Melrois, and the Towne of Edenborough, with such houses as they found by the way. When our army was come to Edenborough, and that victuals failed them, many of them beganne to waxe sicke, and some to die for hunger: whereupon the King returned with his army into England. While King Richard was in Scotland, the Scots and Frenchmen entred into England, burning Townes, taking spoyles, and leading away many prisoners, returned home into their Countrey.

The souldiers of Caleis went secretly forth into France, and got a booty of foure thousand sheepe, and three hundred head of great beasts, which they drew to their holds.

About the feast of Saint Martine, there was a Parliament at London, in which, the Laytie granted to the King a fifteenth and a halfe, with a condition, that the Clergy should giue a tenth and a halfe. William Courtney, Archbishoppe of Canterbury standing there against, said, the Church ought to be free, and in no wise to be taxed by the Laytie, yea, he would rather put his head in danger for this cause, then to suffer the English Church to be brought into such seruitude: which answer so much moued the Knights and Commons of the Shires, with some of the Nobles of the Realme, that they in great rage made request, that the temporalities might be taken from the Clergy and Church-men, saying, that the Church-men were growne to such pride, that it was a deede of charity, and almes, by taking away their temporalities, to compell them to bee more meeke and humble: this they cryed out for, this they presented in writing to the King, and such was their labour in this point, that they were in hope to bring it to passe. Here mought you haue seene the Knights pleasant and merry, talking of these things, euen as the temporalities of the Church had beene aligned to their abusing, this man promising himselfe thus much of that Monastery, that man of another, I heard my selfe (saith Thomas Walsingham) one of the Knights deepely sware, that of the Abbey of Saint Albones, hee would haue a thousand markes by yeere of the temporalities: But to such a mad will the King consented not, for hearing the inordinate crying out of the one side, and the iust answers on the other, hee commanded that bill to be cancelled, and such inordinate petitions to cease, saying, that hee would preserue the Church during his time, in as good state as he found it, or better: with the which answer, he so liked the Churchmen, that hee was thought worthy of great recompence, and of good law-men, also this answer was much commended. The Archbishop therefore, hauing made the Clergy pray, went to the King, and declared that he and his Clergy of their whole consents and free wills had promoted for his vse a tenth, which grant the King so gladly heard, and thankfully received, that hee openly affirmed, hee had rather haue this free grant, then any other foure times double the value, that was to be constrained; and so for that time, the vnsatiable couetousnesse of the enemies, to catch other mens goods, was made frustrate.

Bill put in against the Clergy for their temporalities.

The eleuenth of November, Robert Vere, Earle of Oxford, was made Marquesse of Dluelin in Ireland, and the King gaue him Lands to the value of a thousand markes by yeere, that belonged to the Lord Audley; he also made him Lord Iustice of Chester, he gaue to him the Castle of Flint in Wales, and also he gaue to him Iohn of Brittons, sonne and heyre to Charles de Bloys a prisoner, for whom he had 20000. pounds. Thomas of Woodstocke was made Duke of Glocester, and his brother Edmond Earle of Cambridge, Duke of Yorke. Michael de la Pole, Chancellor of England, was made Earle of Suffolke, and had giuen him by the King, a thousand marks by the yeere. In the Parliament, the Earle of March, Mortimer, was proclaimed heire apparent to the Crowne, which Earle was shortly after slaine in Ireland by the wilde Irish. Also, King Richard at the earnest requests of the Bishops, restored to the Bishop of Norwich his temporalities which hee had holden from him many yeeres. King Richard, with Queene Anne his wife, kept their Christmas at Eltham, whither came to him Lion, King of Ermony, vnder pretence to reforme peace betwixt the Kings of England and of France, but what his comming profited, hee onely vnderstood: for beside innumerable gifts that hee received of the King and of the Nobles, the King lying in the Royall at the Queenes ward, one in London, granted to him a Charter of a thousand pounds by yeere during his life. Yee was (as hee affirmed) chased out of his Realme by the Tartarians, and for that cause, hee got great gifts of the Christian Princes. About the feast of Easter, Iohn, Duke of Lancaster, with the Lady Constance his wife, & a great company of Knights, Esquires, and Archers came to take their leaue of the King and Queene, at whose departing the King gaue to the Duke a crowne of Gold, and the Queene gaue another like crowne of Gold to the Dutchesse. Moreouer the King commanded his people to call them King and Queene of Spaine, and giue them kingly honour. And shortly after, the Duke prepared to goe into Spaine, which was due to him by the inheritable right of his wife, the Lady Constance, daughter daughter sometime to Peter, King of Castile, and Lion, to that now hée went to challenge it, eyther with consent of the inhabitants, or by law of Armes. Hee with a great power, tooke the Seas at Plimmouth, and landed in Spaine, at the Hauen of Gioyne, on the éuen of Saint Laurence, with all his Nauy in safety.

Hee had with him twenty thousand chosen people, of whom was 3000. armed men, and 5000. Archers. Hee appointed for Admirall of his whole Fléete, Thomas Percy, Sir John Holland, brother to king Richard, by his mothers side, after created Earle of Huntington (and had married one of the Dukes daughters) was ordeined Constable of the hoste: Sir Richard Burghley, Marshall, and after him, Sir Thomas de la Molenceaux was Marshall, Sir John Marmion Chamberlaine, &c.

This peere, rumours were raised of the French Kings purpole to beséege Caléis; many baltant men therefore were sent out of England to résist his force, among whom was Sir Hen. Percy, a young Gentleman, in whom the proofe of all prowesse and chiualry did shine, which after hée had stayed about Caleis idlely, taking indignation, declared that hée hated such idleneśse, and before this, whilest hée was Captaine of Barwicke, hee compelled the bnquiet Scots to be quiet, for which cauls, they called him Henry Hotespurre: This Henry assembling his companions, maketh inuasion vpon them about Murwin, and else-where in Picardie, taketh prayes, exercising laudable facts, and when he vnderstood that the French King meant not to beséege Caléis, but rather to inuade England, he returnes home, that he might here incounter them.

Henry Percy went to Caleis.

An.Reg.10. The Londoners vnderstanding that the French King had got together a great Nauy, assembled an army, and set his purpose strmely to come into England, they trembling like Leuerets, fearefull as Mise, séeke darting holes to hide themselues in, euen as if the City were now to be taken, and they that in times past, bragged they would blow all the Frenchmen out of England, hearing now a baine rumour of the enemies comming, they runne to the walls, breake downe the houses adioyning, destroy and lay them flat, and doe all things in great feare, not one Frenchman yet hauing set foote on shipboord, what would they haue done, if the battell had beene at hand, and the weapons ouer their heads?

About the feast of Saint Michael, the Nobles came to the Parliament at London with great numbers of armed men, to the end they might bée ready to withstand the Frenchmen, who were supposed to be comming. Michael de la Pole, Earle of Suffolk, and Chancellor of England, caused to be called almost forth of every part of the Realme, men of armes, and Archers vnto the marches about London, that being ready, they might beat backe the Frenchmen with their King, if they had come. Rochester bridge was beaten downe by the Londoners, to be the more sure. But being wearied with long waiting, they were at length sent home againe, with great misery for want of money to buy them victuals.

In this Parliament, John Fordham, Bishop of Durham, was discharged of the Treasurership, and in his place was set, Iohn Gilberta, Frier Preacher, Bishop of Hereford. Also Michael de la Pole was put from his Chancellorship, and in his place was set, Thomas Arundale, Bishop of Ely, by consent of the whole Parliament. This being done, Michael de la Pole, was charged with many crimes and committed to prison in Windsore Castle, from whence he was sone delinered by the King: all the possessions of de la Pole purchased whilest he was Chancellor, to the yerely value of 1000. pounds, were for euer by the iudgement of the Parliament, confiscate to the Kings coffers, and further, to restore to the King the value of 12000. pounds, which he had gained by lingering his affaires, as they said. They chose also 13. Lords which should haue the ouersight vnder the King of the whole Realme. Of which, 3. were the new officers, to wit, the Bishop of Ely Chancellor, the Bishop of Hereford Treasurer, and Sir John Waltham Keper of the priuy Seale, and 10. other, which were William, Archbishop of Canterbury, Alexander, Archbishop of Yorke, Edmond Langley Duke of York, Thomas of Woodstocke, Duke of Glocester, William Wikham Bishop of Winchester, Thomas, Bishop of Exceter, Nicholas Abbot of Waltham, Richard, Earle of Arundale, Iohn, Lord Cobham, S. Richard Scrope and S. Iohn Curofe, Knights, to these they gaue full power to determine caules from the time of king Ed. the third, vntill that present, as well within the Realme, as without, &c. They granted to the King a tenth of the Clergy, and a fiftenth of the Laytie: they granted him 3.s. of euery Tunne of wine comming into the Realme, and of euery pound of merchandise going out, or comming in 12.d. wull, leather, and fell excepted.

The French King hauing in the meane time, laid in Flanders, ready to spoyle the Realme of England, if God had not stopped his purpole; from the first of August, till the Euen of All-Saints there never blew winde for his passage, but only for a few houres of that very Euen, the wind rising, they loosed anchors, hoysed vp sailes, and set forth of the Hauen: but when all the ships were in the Sea, 20. miles from the hauen, the wind came contrary, drone them backe, that diuers of their vessels entring the hauen of Sluce were broken, by which occasion England was deliuered out of danger, and the French King returned home. The number of his ships in that Nauy, were reckoned 1200. Froisart saith, the ships were 1287. hee had there with him of Dukes 16. of Earles 26. of Knights 3500. and of fighting men 100000. King Richard, with his wife, Quéene Anne, and the Bohemians, as hée had béene accustomed, kept his Christmas very solemnly at Westminster.

Barley sold for 11.d. the quarter.

In the beginning of this yéere, at Leicester an hundred quarters of Barley, were sold for an hundred shillings.

About the beginning of March, according to the decree of the late Parliament, Richard Earle of Arundell, Admirall of the fléete, adioyning vnto him the Earle of Deuonshire, and Thomas Moubrey Earle of Nottingham, went to the sea in a happy houre, for within a small time they met with their enemies on the Vigill of our Lady the Annunciation; a great Nauy of Flanders, France and Spaine fraught with men of warre, and diuers engins, was discouered; with whom the Earles encountred, and tooke of them 100. ships and more, the which contained 1111. tunnes of wine, they brought to diuers parts of England whereby wine was then sold for thirtéene shillings foure pence the tunne.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland forsooke his wife, a young Lady, noble and faire, borne of the Lady Isabell daughter to the noble King Edward, and married another that came with Quéene Anne forth of Boheme: the was called in the vulgar tongue of her countrey Lancecrona. The Lords take indignation herewith, especially the Duke of Glocester, vncle to the young Lady that was forsaken. The Duke of Ireland studied how to take the D. of Glocester out of the way. Easter was now past, the time in which the Duke of Ireland should haue transported into Ireland, but left there should be too much stirre in the Realme among the Lords, the King as if were to bring him to the water side, goeth with him into Wales, as not to leaue him, but there to keepe him, that they might deuise how to take away the D. of Glocester, the Earles of Arundell, Warwicke, Darby, & Nottingham, with other. There were with them the Earle of Suffolke, Michael at Pole, Robert Trisilian Iustice, and many other, which no more slowly then the D. of Ireland conspired the death of the sayd noble men. After a great time was passed, the King, as if the Duke of Irelands iourney had béene forgotten, returned with him and the other forth of Wales, to the Castle of Nottingham, there to treat of the death of the said noble men: there therefore he sent for diuers from London, whom he knew would be ready to which way soeuer they should be moued: hee called thither also all the Sheriffes & Iustices of the Realme, & there interdicted the Lords of many crimes which the King had imagined against them. In the meane time the rumour of this doing came to the Lords eares, whereupon first of all the Kings vncle, Duke of Glocester, that hee might mitigate the Kings displeasure, before the Bishop of London, and many other Nobles, sweating vpon the Euangelists, tooke it vpon his oath, that he neuer had imagined any thing to the Kings hinderance, or done any thing to his displeasure, except that he had not giuen good countenance to the D. of Ireland, nor would hereafter giue him any, who had dishonested his kinswoman, the which he firmely had determined to reuenge.

An.reg.11.

The D. of Glocester calling together secretly the Earles of Arundell, Warwick, & Darby, that were in like danger of condemnation, if they prouided not the more speedily, he discouered to them the matter: they therefore gathered their armies together, determined to talke with the K. vpon the premises. Contrarily the K. for his party did deliberate how he might take each of them by themselues out of the way, and first he sent to the Castle of Rigate, where the E. of Arundell lay, the E. of Northumberland with many other to arrest him, who perceiuing a great number of men of war about him, fearing to do that he was commanded, departed without doing his errand for which he came. After whom there were sent many that by night should haue taken him, as haue saine him, but a messenger sent from the D. of Glocester, prsuented their coming, that caused him to ride all night, so that in the morning he was come to Yaringey, hauing passed with his army 30. miles, not without great trauaile, where he found assembled the D. of Glocester, and the E. of Warwicke, with a great power of men. The K. being informed of this assembly in Yarneley wood, as is said, demanded of his familiars what was to be done in this case, but in the end, by the mediation of them that came betwixt them, the matter was brought to this issue, that the Lords should come to Westminster to receiue answere before the K. of those things, the Bishop of Ely with many other men of worthy credite, taking an oath for the K. part, that no fraud, deceit, or perill, should be prepared. When the Lords had prepared themselues according to the couenant, the foresaid mediators for peace sent them word, that treason was deuised by an ambush layd for them, in a place called the Newes, nere to Charing Crosse, and therefore willed them not to come, but with sure hand, whereupon they stayed there: & the K. demaunding why the Lords kept not couenant, the Bp. of Ely answered, because (saith he) there is an ambush laid of a thousand armed men or more in such a place, contrary to the couenant, and therefore they neither come, nor repute you to be faithfull: the King moued forthwith, ware he knew of no such thing, and therefore commanded the Sheriffes of London, that going to the Newes, they should kill, if they found any assembled there for that cause: but Tho. Trinet, and Nicholas Brembar knight, had secretly sent away the armed men to London; the K. therefore sent againe to the Lords, who straightwayes came to Westminster with a strong power, against whole comming, the K. adorning himselfe with Kingly robes, with crowne and scepter, entreth West. hall, where the B. of Ely L. Chancellor, speaking for the K. demanded the cause of their assembling of such a power, whereunto the Lords answered, that it was done for the Kings profit, and the realmes, to pluckе from him the traytoꝛs which he kept about him, whom they named to be Robert de Vere D. of Irelmo, Alexander Neuell Archbi. of Poꝛke, Michael at Pole E. of Suffolk, Robert Trisilian, a falſe Juſtice, Nicholas Brembar a falſe Knight of London, & thereupon they threw downe their gloues, ſwearing that they would proſecute it by battell: nay, ſaith the K. it ſhall not be ſo, but in the next parliament which was appointed to be holden the moꝛrow after the purification of our Lady, all this was pacified foꝛ that time.

Strange likeneſſe of fire. Henry of Leiceſter.

A maner of exhalation in likeneſſe of fire, appeared in the night in many places of England, which went with men as they went, and ſtayed as they did, ſometime like a wheele, ſomtime like a barrell, ſomtime like a timberlogge, but when many went together, it appeared to be farre off.

Battell at Radcote Bꝛidge.

The Lords departing from the King, notwithſtanding kept together, which ſeemed great wiſedome in them, foꝛ the Duke of Ireland in the parts of Cheſter and Wales had aſſembled a great number, whoſe Captaine was the Conſtable of Cheſter, Thomas Moleneux, a man of great wealth, and hardy. The Duke of Ireland with ſuch a multitude haſted towards London, that iourning with the Londoners, he might make them both as it were an invincible army. But the D. of Ireland riding forth in ſtately and glorious array with the Army of 5000. men, thinking none durſt haue encountred him: Neuerthelelle in the vigill of S. Tho. the Apoſtle, when he came to Radcote Bꝛidge in Oꝛfoꝛdſhire were vnto Farendon vpon Thamis, not paſt foure miles from Cheping-Noꝛton, which bꝛidge, if he could haue paſſed, he had bin out of danger, ſodainly, as he looked on the one ſide, he beheld where the hoſt of the Lords was ready not far from them tarrying his comming, in the midſt of the valley, with which ſight his heart ſtraightway failed: and he ſaid, friends I muſt fly, foꝛ a greater puiſſance ſeemeth to be yonder, againſt you they haue no quarrell, ſo that I being ſhifted away, ye ſhall eſcape well enough, and forthwith ſetting ſpurres to his hoꝛſe, he ſtaſht away. There was then the foreſaid Thomas Moleneux that prepared himſelfe to the battell, foꝛ the Lords were not yet all come to that place, who when he had fought awhile, being wearied, entred the riuer which was therebe. Among other Sir Thomas Mortimer Knight exhoꝛted him to come vp, oꝛ elſe he would ſhoot him thꝛough in the riuer: if I doe come vp, ſaith Thomas Moleneux, wilt thou ſaue my life? I doe make no ſuch pꝛomiſe (ſaith he) but either come vp, oꝛ thou ſhalt ſtraight die foꝛ it. To whom hee anſwered, ſuffer me to come vp & let me fight either with thee oꝛ ſome other, and die like a man. As he came vp, the Knight caught him by the helmet, and pinched it off his head, and ſtraightwayes with his dagger ſtrucke him into the braines.

Thor: Mouleneux ſlaine.

The Duke of Ireland ſeeing, came to the riuer of Thames, and foꝛced his hoꝛſe to enter, in the which being made of an hoꝛſeman a ſwimmer, he got to the other ſide: his hoſe, helmet, gantlets and breaſt-plate came to the ſhare of the Lords, ſo that he was thought long after to be dꝛowned, but he got ouer into Flanders.

Archbiſhop of Poꝛke fled.

The Arch-biſhop of Poꝛke fled, and Robert Triſilian, and Michael de la Poole got him to Caleis. The Lords being returned from the battell, which had bene nere to Burford, ſaſt by Wallack, made great iop foꝛ the ouerthꝛow of their enemies, but much lamented the eſcape of the Duke of Ireland.

The Lords haſted to London, where the K. kept his Chriſtmas in the Tower of London, they having aſſembled an army of nere hand foꝛty thouſand, the moꝛrow after Chriſtmaſſe day came to London, and muſtred in the fields, where they might be ſeene of them in the towꝛer: the Londoners were then in great feare, weeping diuers perils, as the Kings diſpleaſure, if they opened their gates to the Lords, and if they ſhut them foꝛth, the indignation of the vndiſcreet multitude.

1388. The Lords came to London.

The Duke of Glocester with other entred the Tower, and having a little talke with the King, they recited the conſpiracie, whereby they had bene inuited, and they ſhewed foꝛth alſo the letters, which hee had ſent vnto the Duke of Ireland, that he ſhould aſſemble an army to their deſtruction, &c. in the end the King promiſed on the next moꝛrow to come to Weſtminſter, and there to intreat at large foꝛ reformation of all matters.

The Lords came to & being then in the towꝛer of London.

In the moꝛning the King came to Weſtminſter, where, after a little talke, the Nobles ſaid, that foꝛ his honour and commodity of his kingdome it was behouefull, that the Traytoꝛs, whiſperers, flatterers, and vnpꝛofitable people were remoued out of place, and that others might be placed in their roomes.

The King commeth to Weſtminſter.

The King, although loꝛe againſt his mind when hee ſaw how the Lords were bent, and that he wanted power to withſtand them condeſcended to doe what they would haue him, and to conclude, the King at the requeſt of the Lords commanded the ſuſpected perſons of his Court, and family, to be auoided to priſon, to anſwere at the next Parliament, which perſons were ſir Simon Burghley ſir William Elmham, ſir Nicholas Dagworth, ſir John Golefare, which was not yet returned out of Fꝛance, all theſe being Knights,

Sir Simon Burghley & many other committed to priſon.

Richard Clifford, & a Prieſt called Nicholas Slake Deane of the Kings Chappell were appointed to Nottingham Caſtle. To the Caſtle of Dower were appointed Sir John Beaucham of Holt Steward of the Kings houſe, Sir Thomas Triuet, Sir John Salisbury, & John Lincoln. To the Caſtle of Bꝛiſtow ſames Berners, and Richard Medford Clearke. To the Caſtle of Rocheſter was appointed Alexander Neuell Arch-biſhop of Poꝛke, but he was cauſed as ye haue heard, and Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, which was ſtrd. To the Caſtle of Glocester were deputed Robert Triſilian chiefe Juſtice of England, which was not yet found, & Nicholas Brembar who found ſureties to ſtand to the lawes of the Realme.

Many perſons remoued out of the K. court.

Theſe were remoued alſo from the Court, but not ſent to priſon, John Fordham Biſhop of Durham, the Lord Beaumont, Lord William de la Souꝛch of Harnewoꝛth, the Lord Burnell, Sir John Loudl, the Lord Thomas Camoys, Thomas the ſon of the Lord Clifford with Baldwin Burſoꝛde, Thomas Ruſhoke a Frier, Biſhop of Chicheſter the Kings Confeſſour, Aubery de Vere, R Aberbery, John Woꝛth, the Lady Mait. ,ye Lady Poines, and the Lady Molineaux, all which were to anſwere at the next Parliament.

Parliament that wrought wonders.

The third day of Febꝛuary, the Parliament began at Weſtminſter, which parliament continued till the 12. of June next following, except from the Nigil of Palme-ſonday, until the Octaues of Eaſter; this Parliament was named the Parliament that wꝛought wonders. The Lords came to this Parliament with a ſufficient army foꝛ their owne ſureties. The firſt day of this Parliament were aꝛreſted as they ſate in their places, all the Juſtices, except Sir William Skipwith, & ſir Roger Fulethorpe ſir Robert Belknape, ſir John Carey, ſir John Holte, ſir Wil. Boꝛow, and John Aleſton the K. Serieant at law, all beſides theſe were ſent to the Towꝛer, and there kept in ſeuerall places.

The Juſtices aꝛreſted as they ſate in Parliament.

The cauſe was foꝛ that where in the laſt Parliament diuers Lords were made Gouernours of the Realme both by aſſent of the Parliament, and alſo by the aduice and counſell of all the Juſtices, and yet notwithſtanding, the ſaid Juſtices, in a counſell holden at Nottingham, did the contꝛay, whereupon it was now determined that they ſhould make anſwere to their doings. Moꝛeouer, in the beginning of this Parliament were openly called, Robert Vere Duke of Ireland, Alexander Neuell Aꝛch-biſhop of Poꝛke, Michael de la Pole Earle of Suffolke, Sir Robert Triſilian Lord chiefe Juſtice of England, and Nicholas Brembar whom the K. had oft times made Maioꝛ of London againſt the will & aſſent of the Citizens, to anſwere before Tho. of Woodſtocke D. of Glocester, Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Beauchampe Earle of Warwicke, Henry Earle of Darby, and Tho. Earle of Nottingham, vpon certaine articles of high treaſon which theſe Lords did charge them with: & foꝛaſmuch as none of them appeared, it was ordained by the whole aſſent of the Parliament, that they ſhould be baniſhed foꝛ euer, & their lands & goods to be foꝛfeited and ſeized into the Kings hands, their lands entailed excepted, which ſhould deſcend to their heyꝛes. The pꝛoceſſe againſt theſe fiue Lords are compꝛiſed in eight and thirty Articles, which I ouꝛpaſſe in this place.

Rob de Vere D. of Ireland, the Arch biſhop of Poꝛke and other baniſhed.

The foreſaid Lords being fled as is afoꝛeſaid, Robert Triſilian a Corniſh-man, Lord chiefe Juſtice to the King, had hid himſelfe in an Apothecaries houſe in the Sanctuary nere to the gate of Weſtminſter, where he might ſee the Lords going to the Parliament, and comming foꝛth thereby to learne what was donne, foꝛ all his life time he did all things cloſely, but now his craft being eſpied was turned to great folly. Foꝛ on Wedneſday the ſeuenteenth of Febꝛuary he was betrayed of his owne ſeruant, & about eleuen of the cloke before-noone, being taken by the Duke of Glocester, and in the Parliament preſented, ſo that the ſame day in the afternoone he was dꝛawne to Tyborne from the Towꝛer of London thꝛough the Citie, & there had his thꝛoat cut and his bodie was buried in the gray Fꝛyers Church at London. This man had diſfigured himſelfe, as if he had bene a poore weake man, in a fuſtie coat, all old and torne, and had artificially made himſelfe a long beard, ſuch as they called a Paris beard, and had defiled his face, to the end he might not be knowne but by his ſpeach. On the moꝛrow, was executed ſir Nicholas Brembar, who had done many oppꝛeſſions, & cauſed ſeditions in the Citie, of whom it was ſaid, that whileſt he was in full authoꝛitie of Maioꝛaltie he cauſed a common paire of Stocks in euery ward, and a common axe to be made to behead all ſuch as ſhould bee againſt him, and it was foꝛther ſaid, that he had indited 8000. men of the beſt and greateſt of the Citie, but it was ſaid that the ſaid Nicholas was beheaded with the ſame Axe hee had pꝛepared foꝛ other: this man if he had liued, had bene created Duke of Tꝛoy, oꝛ of London by the name of Tꝛoy.

Chiefe Juſtice taken and executed at Tyborne.

Sir Nicholas Brembar executed.

On the fourth of March Thomas Vske, Undertheꝛiue of London, & John Blake Eſquire, one of the Kings houſhold, were dꝛawne from the Towꝛer to Tyborne and there hanged and beheaded, the head of Thomas Vske was ſet vp ouer Newgate, to the oppꝛobꝛy of his parents, which inhabited thereby. The goods of the Biſhop of Chicheſter were confiſcate, and on the eleuenth of March the Parliament was pꝛoꝛogued vnto the quinden of Paſch.

Sim. Burghley beheaded.

The firſt day of May Sir Simon Burghley Conſtable of Douer, and Chamberlaine to the King, an intollerable pꝛoud man and a great oppꝛeſſoꝛ of the poꝛe, &c. was condemned of treaſon, but the King diſpenſed foꝛ his dꝛawing and hanging, ſo that he was with his hands bound behinde him led thꝛough the Citie of London, and had his head ſtricken off vpon the Towꝛer hill on the xxtenth day of May, his heires were by Henry the 4. reſtoꝛed in blood & inheꝛitance, except the lands giuen to the new Abbey on the Towꝛer hill, to S. Stephens at Westminster, and to the Fryers at Langley. This man might by inheritance dispend twenty markes by yere, but in few yeares hee so grew in service of the King, that he attained to value of 3000. markes of yerely reuenues, of whom it was said that hee gaue at Christmas for liueries of Knights & Esquires, yeomen & others as well of the Kings Court as of his owne family, sometime forty clothes, sometime 160. clothes, and sometime 220. of great price, as of Scarlet, &c.

Also on the 12. of May Iohn Beauchampe of Holt Lord Steward of the K. house, whom the King had thought to haue made Baron of Bridge-north, was condemned to be drawne, and hanged, but by the Kings fauour, he lost his head on the Tower hill.

Sir Iohn Bernes Knight of the Kings Court a lusty young man, was in the same place beheaded, Sir Iohn Salisbury Knight was drawne from the Tower to Tyborne and there hanged.

There were condemned also in the same Parliament these Iustices, sir Robert Belkape, Sir Io. Carre, sir Io. Holte, sir Roger Fulthorpe and Sir William Brough, Iohn Locton Serieant at the Lawe, Richard Gray Iustices, with the Lords before fled, were all banished.

There was granted to the K. of the Clergie halfe a tenth, and of the Laity halfe a fifteenth, and of the Merchants twelue pence of the pound, three shillings of the tunne, three and fifty shillings foure pence of the sacke of Wol. The Duke of Glocester, and Sir Iohn Cobham asked pardon of the Abbot of Westminster for violence done in the Sanctuary of Westminster, in the taking of the Iustice Trisilian. The last saue one of May there were deliuered out of the Tower W. Elmham, T. Triuet, and Nicholas Dagworth Knights. Also the first of Iune, Iohn Holland the Kings brother was created Earle of Huntington.

K. Richard renewed the Oth which he had taken at his Coronation.

The third day of Iune, the K. in the Church of Westminster renued the oth, which hee toke when he was crowned, and all the Lords sware homage and fealtie to him, and all the Bishops did excommunicate all those that would goe about to hinder the Statutes of this last Parliament, or the great Charter.

There was then in the same Towne Sir Henry Percy, the younger, and Sir Ralph his brother, both destrous of warlike renowne, and soge enemies vnto the Scots. This Sir Henry came vpon them on the sodaine, and assailed them in the Campe, making great slaughter of them. William of Iames Douglasse, after Froisart also chiefe Captaine of the Scottes, beholding the thing that a thousand times he had wished, that is, Sir Henry Percy within his campe, rideth against him, but was slaine by the said Henry; then commeth the Earle of Dunbarre with an excellent number of Scots, and take the said Henry with his brother Ralph, slaying many English-men to the number of 1100. in that place at the which time there were innumber 30000. put to flight, and take the water at Otterborne: but yet the Scots lost many of their best men. tring the West parts of England destroying men, and women and children, sucking babes, and such as lay in childe-bed, in the countie of Gilofland in the Dominion of the L. Dacres, and shutting vp of the poore of houses full of people, they burnt the vp without mercy to the number of two hundred in some one house. Against these was sent Thomas Moubray Earle of Nottingham with 5. hundred speares to reuenge their attempts, but for that his power was so small in comparison of theirs, hee preuailed little against them.

On the Thursday before Easter, the Lord Beamount captaine of Carlile entred Scotland by 40. miles, and spoyled the market of Fowike, preying and spoyling at his pleasure, and led many prisoners into England.

King Richard discharged the old officers of his Court, and also his Councellers, appointing other at his pleasure: he toke the seale from Thomas Arundal Arch bishop of Yorke, and deliuered it to William Wickam Bishop of Winchester, and made him Chancellour: the Bishop of Ercester his Treasurer, hauing taken that office from the Bishop of Hereford, and Edmond Stafford keper of the priuie seale, and made many new officers, putting downe the old, he remoued from off the Counsell, the Duke of Gloucester, the E. of Warwicke and other worthy men, and put in their places such as pleased him.

John Duke of Lancaster returned into England.

In the moneth of Nouember, Iohn Duke of Lancaster came from the parts beyond the Seas into England, after hee had bidden in Spaine & Galcoigne, three yéres space, who in Spaine first tasted great mis-fortunes, yet in the ende brought his matters to very good case not with the force of men, but by the fauour of God: for when hee came first to the parts of Spain with an army sufficient enough, through want of victuals, they first dyed through hunger, and after through sure, so that 1000. famous Knights of his Army dyed miserably, the residue leaning the D. fled to the French Armie.

1390. King Richard with his Quéene Anne helde their Christmasse at Woodstocke, and the Duke of Lancaster in the Castle of Hertford.

The same time, Iohn Hastings Earle of Penbroke, he was destroyed to Iust, hee was stroken about the pitme parts by the Knight that came against him, called Sir Iohn Saint Iohn where he died. King Richard caused the Castle of Canterbury to be repayred.

A woefull variance rose in Oxford, for the Welch and Southerne Schollers assaulted the Northern, whereby many murders were done on each side, and a field was appointed, but by the helpe of the Duke of Glocester it was appeased, and the Welchmen banished.

Iusting in Smithfield.

The tenth, eleuenth and twelfth of October the King held a great Court at London in the Bishops palace and a great iusting in Smithfield, to the which Court came many straungers south of France, Almaine, Zealand, and many other parts, bringing with them horses and armour, in which pastimes there was giuen strok of the badge of the white Hart with golden chaines and crownes. And vpon S. Edwards day the King held his Feast in his Regalibus, sitting crowned at Dalle with his Scepter, &c. and likewise the Quéene, and they sate likewise at the table of Kennington crowned, at which solemnitie were present the Earle of S. Paul, and his wife Mawd Courtney Sister to the King of England, and the Earle of Ostreuant who was made Knight of the Garter.

Parliament at London.

On the Friday next after the Feast of all Saints, a Parliament began at London, in the which halfe a tenth, and halfe a fifteenth was granted to the King, which money he should have for the treaty to be had for peace with the French-men, which treaty the Duke of Lancaster should procure. Also conditionally was granted to the K. a full tenth, & a whole fifteenth, if that peace he made any journey against the Scots, & this was the fruit of this Parliament.

Dearth of Corne, and provision made by the Maior of London for remedie therof.

This yeere passed to poore and meane people very hard and sore, for dearth of corne now almost continued for two yeres, whereby it came to passe, that when the time of fruits, as nuts, apples, &c. came, many people through unrefreshing thereof caught the Flixe, and died of the same, & the dearth had been farre greater through famine, if the commendable diligence of Adam Baume then Maior of London had not relieved the Commons, who with continuall care provided, that from the parts of beyond the Seas, corne was brought to London to the reliefe of the whole realme, whereas otherwise without doubt, neither had the Countrey sufficed the Citie, nor the Citie have holpen the Countrey. To the furtherance of this good worke in relieving the poore, the Maior and Citizens of London tooke out of their Orphanes chest in their Guild-hall two thousand markes to buy corne and other victuals, from beyond the Seas, and the Aldermen each of them laid out twenty pounds to the like purpose of buying of corne, which was bestowed in diuers places, where the poore might buy it at an appointed price, and such as lacked money to pay downe, to put in surety to pay in the yere following: in the which yere when Haruest came, the fields yelded plentifull increase, and so the price of Corne began to decrease.

Sir Hugh Calueley was made Warden of the Iles of Jernsey, Gernesey, Norke, Aurney, &c.

This yeare a certaine Jewe at London became a Christian, & was baptized by the name of William Piers, and had two pence the day for terme of his life given him by the King, as appeareth of record in the Tower.

King Richard with Quéene Anne his wife, foure Bishops, as many Earles, the Duke of Norke, many Lords, and fifteene Ladies, held a royall Christmas at Langley nere to S. Albons. The same Christmas day a Dolphin came forth of the Sea & played himselfe in the Thames at London to the bridge, foreshewing happily the tempests that were to follow within a weeke after, the which Dolphin being seene of Citizens, and followed, was with much difficulty intercepted, and brought againe to London, shewing a spectacle to many, of the height of his body, for he was tenne foote in length. These Dolphins are fishes of the sea, that follow the voices of men, and rejoice in playing of instruments, & are wont to gather themselues at musicke. These when they play in riuers, with hasty springings or leapings, doe signifie Tempest to follow. The Seas containe nothing more swift nor nimble, for oftentimes with their skips, they mount ouer the sailes of Ships.

A Dolphin of the Sea came vp to London Bridge.

The King sent to the Londoners requesting to borrow of them one thousand pound, which they flatly denyed, and also euill entreated, beat and neere-hand slew a certaine Lumbard that would have lent the King the said summe, which when the King heard, he was maruellously angried, and calling together almost all the Nobles of the land to Stamford on the fine and twentieth day of May, he opened to them the malitiousnes of the Londoners, and complained of their presumption, by which noble men gaue counsell that their insolencie should with speede be repressed, and their pride abated. By the Kings iudgement therefore was the Maior of London and the Sherrifes, with other the best Citizens arrested to appeare at Nottingham, where on the eleuenth of June, Iohn Hinde Maior was deposed, & sent to Windsor Castle, the Sherriffes were also deposed, and sent the one to the Castle of Wallingford, the other to the Castle of Odiham, and the other Citizens to other prisons, till the King with his Councell had determined what should be done with them. And there it was determined, that from thencefoorth the Londoners should not chose nor haue any Maior, but that the King should appoint one of his Knights to be ruler of the citie: their priuileges were reuoked, their liberties disanulled, and their lawes abrogated.

T. Walsingham.

The Maior of London and Sherrifes deposed and committed.

The King then on the one and twentieth of June first appointed to be Warden of the Citie a certaine Knight called Sir Edward de Dalingrige, but he was quickly deposed by the King, because (men said) he fauoured the Londoners, and Baldwin Radington was constituted in his place.

An. Reg. 16.

In the meane time, through suite of certaine Knights, but specially of the Duke of Glocester, the King is somwhat pacified, and by little and little abateth the rigor of his purpose, calling to mind the diuers honors, and the great giftes hee had receiued of the Londoners, whereupon he determineth to deale more mildly with them, and to call them to some hope of grace and pardon, he sendeth commandement to them to come to Windsore, there to shewe their priuiledges, liberties and lawes which being there shewed, some of them were ratified & some condemned, but they could not obtaine the Kings full fauour, till they had satisfied the King for the iniuries which was said they had done. The King at this assembly at Windsor had had got together almost all the Lords, and to great an armie, that the Londoners had cause to be afraid thereof, about the which preparation he was at great charges, for the which it was sure that the Londoners must pay. They therefore not ignorant that the end of these things was a mony matter, submitted themselues to the Kings pleasure, offering ten thousand pound. They were yet dismissed home to returne againe, uncertaine what satisfaction and sum they should pay.

When the Citizens were returned, and that the Nobles and others were gone home: the King hearing that the Londoners were in heauinesse, and dismayed, he said to his men, I will goe (saith he) to London, and comfort the Citizens, and will not that they any longer despaire of my fauour, which sentence was no sooner knowne in the Citie, but all men were filled with incredible ioy, so that euery of them generally determined to make him, and to be as liberall in gifts, as they were at his coronation. The King therefore as he came from Shine in Surrey to London, with Quéene Anne his wife on the 29. of August, the principall Citizens all in one liuery to the number of 400. horsemen rode to meet them at Wandsworth, where in most lowly wise, they submitted themselues vnto his grace, beseeching him of his speciall pardon, in all such things, as they before had offended him, and the Recorder of the Citie, in the name of the whole citizens, instantly required him, that he would of his great bounty take such paine vpon him as to ride through his chamber of London, to the which request hee graciously consented, to be held on his iourney till he came to S. Georges Church in Southwarke, where they were receiued with procession of Robert Braybroke Bishop of London, and all the Clergie of the citie, who conueyed them through London, the Citizens of London, men, women, and children in order meeting the King at London-bridge, where he was by them presented with 2. faire white steedes, trapped in cloth of gold, parted of red and white, hanged full of siluer belles, the which present he thankfully received, and after he held on his way through the Citie toward Westminster.

The K. riding toward London, receiued by the Citizens.

And as they passed the Citie the streets were hanged with cloth of golde, siluer and silke. The Conduite in Cheape ran with red and white wine, and by a childe Angel-like he was presented with a very costly Crowne of gold, and the Quéene with another. A table of the Trinitie in gold was giuen to the King, valued worth eight hundred pound, and another to the Quéene, of Saint Anne, because her name was Anne, with diuers other gifts, as hozles, trappers, plate of gold and siluer, clothes of gold, silke, veluets, Basons and Ewers of gold, also gold in coyne, precious stones, and Jewels so rich, excellent, and beautifull, that the value and price might not well bee esteemed, and so the citizens recouered their ancient customes and liberties, and then the Kings Bench from Norke, and the Chancery from Nottingham, was returned to London. And it was granted to them that they might choose them a Maior as before time they had done. The Londoners beleeued that by these gifts they had escaped all danger, and that from thencefoth they should be quiet, but they were deceiued, for they were compelled to giue the King after this 10000. pound, collected of the Commons in great bitternesse of minde, for the which summe, the King became benevolent to the Citizens, and forgaue them all trespasses, by his patents dated at Westminster the 23. of February, and so the troubles of the Citizens came to quietnesse; which trouble the Dolphin in Thamis at Christmas last past did happily signifie a farre off. A fabulous booke compiled by a nameless Author, but printed by William Caxton (and therefore called Caxtons Chronicle) reporteth these troubles to happen through a Frap in Flétrétte, about an hose-loafe which was taken out of a Bakers basket, by a Woman of the Bishop of Salisburies, & that the same troubles were pacified, and their liberties were again restored by meanes of Richard Grauesend Bishop London, in reward whereof the Citizens repaire to the place of Burtall in the middle Ile of Saint Paules Church, &c. But all that is untrue, for at this time Rob. Braybroke was Bishop of London, and Richard Grauesend had been Bishop, and deceased in the time of Edward the first, in Anno 1303. almost 90. yeres before this time. After whom succeeded in the Bishopricke Ralph Baldoke, Gilbert Segraue, Richard Newport, Stephen Grauesend, Richard Wentworth, Ralph Stratford, Michael Nothbroke, Simon Sudbury, William Courtney, and Robert Braybrooke that late Bishop of London from 1381. untill the yere 1403.

A great fable reported.

Moreouer, the place of buriall in S. Pauls, whereunto the Maior and Citizens of London haue repayred, is of William who was Bishop of London in the time of William Conqueror, who purchased the first Charter of the said King William, for the same citie, as I haue before declared.

After the Feast of Christmas, a Parliament was holden at Winchester, in the which was granted to the King by the Clergie halfe a tenth, and by the Commons halfe a fifteene, for the expences of the Duke of Lancaster and Glocester, that were to goe into France to create a peace betweene the kingdomes.

There was then in the same Towne Sir Henry Percy, the younger, and Sir Ralph his brother, both destrous of warlike renolune, and sone enemies vnto the Scots. This Sir Henry came vpon them on the sodaine, and assailed them in the Campe, making great slaughter of them. William of Iames Douglasse, after Froisart also chiefe Captaine of the Scottes, beholding the thing that a thousand times he had wished, that is, Sir Henry Percy within his campe, rideth against him, but was slaine by the said Henry; then commeth the Earle of Dunbarre with an excedine number of Scots, and take the said Henry with his brother Ralph, slaying many English-men to the nnmber of 1100. in that place at the which time there were innumber 30000. put to slight, and take the water at Otterborne: but yet the Scots lost many of their best men. This battell was at Otterborne, the sozest fought that euer was betwixt Englishmen and Scots, saith Froisart.

The same yere Aubery de Vere Uncle and heire to Robert the late Duke of Ireland was restored in bloud, and created Earle of Orford. John Deuereis, Knight, Constable of Douer, and the Kings steward, died sodainly, in whose roome, Thomas Percy, that before was vice-chamberlaine, was made Lord Steward, and Thomas Beaumond was made Constable of Douer, and William Scrope was made vice-chamberlaine, who about the same time bought of William Mountacute Earle of Salisbury the Ile of Man, with the regalitie thereof, for the Lord of this Iland is called King, to whom it was lawfull to weare a crowne of gold. Thomas Percy the younger was made Warden of Berdeaux.

The Dukes of Lancaster and Gloucester passed ouer into France, to make somewhat of the truce, or to conclude a finall peace betwixt the kingdoms: but it was not so brought to passe, as it was wished, by reason of the French Kings sickenesse.

Such abundance of water fell in October, that at Bury in Suffolke, the Church was full of water, & at Newmarket it bare downe wals of houses, so that men and women hardly escaped drowning. The same yere Lord Thomas de Ros, as hee returned forth of the Holy land, in the citie of Paphos in the Ile of Cyprus, through intemperancie of the ayre departed this life there. In the Octaues of S. Thus the King, the Duke of Lancaster, and his son the Earle of Darby, were widowers all at one time: for the Lady Constance Dutchesse of Lancaster, daughter to Peter King of Spaine, was but lately deceased, whilest the Duke her husband was in France. And the same time also deceased the Countesse of Darby, wife to Henry Earle of Darby. Constance Dutchesse of Lancaster deceased.

Sir John Haukwood.

Also this yere deceased that famous Knight, knowne to the world, Sir John Haukwood, whose deeds (saith Thomas Walsingham) require a speciall Treatise. I finde by good record, that this John Haukwood was borne in Essex, in the Parish of Hingam Sible, the sonne of Gilbert de Haukwood Tanner, in his youth he was bound as an apprentice with a Taylor in the City of London, & from thence was preft in the musters for service of King Edward the third in the warres of Fraunce, wherein he served first as a common soldier in the towne of an Ferher. Afterward hee was made a captaine and had some charge committed vnto him, which he so well performed, as he was aduanced to the order of Knight-hood, and stood in good perfection to haue growne to great preferment by those warres, if they had indured: for when the peace was concluded at Bretaine, beside Chartiers, in the yere of Christ 1360. he was then a poore knight, and had reaped small commodity of those warres. Wherefore he ioyned himselfe with the companies, called the late comuers, who assembled in great numbers, a fine or sixe-thousand English horsemen, and seeking after better gaine, made great spoyle of all the East parts of the Kingdome of France, passing through Champaine, Burgondy, and Dauphin, euen to the very gates of Auignion in Prouence, where his acts, life, and death.

Clement

Clement the seuenth, Bishop of Rome, then held his residence and Court of Cardinals: from whence he departed in to Lombardy, hauing the leading of that part of the companies, which was called the white hand, with whom he serued valiantly in the warres of Ioh. Marques of Mount-ferrato. But when Leonell Duke of Clarence, sonne to Edward the third King of England came into Italy, to marry the Lady Violent, daughter of Galasius, Viscount Lord of Millaine, he forsooke that seruice, and attended the Duke to that Marryage.

At which time Barnabe the brother of Galasius had great warres with the territorie of the State of Mantua, and obtained of the duke of Clarence, that Sir John Hawkwood being a Captaine, and principall man of his retinue might come to aide him in his warres, for Barnabe being himselfe a warlike Prince, had a great desire to make some tryall of the discipline and prowesse of the English-men. Sir John Haukwood therefore hauing in sundry skirmishes with great courage, and consideration, happily taken aduantageable occasions of victorie, & the Englishmen demeaning themselues worthily with their bowes and arrowes, did draw Barnabe into that admiration of them that he commended the discipline of this Nation, and greatly regarded the prowesse and discretion of Sir John Haukwood. And in short time after, to wit, the first yeare of K. Richard, good liking increasing betweene them by entercourse of fauours and courtesies, he desired to haue him his sonne in law, and gaue him in marriage the Lady Domnia his Daughter, whom he had begotten of a Noble woman, named Porra, with the value of ten thousand Florens of yerely reuenew, and after that time he married not any other.

This aliance being made in respect of his valour in warre, was the occasion of the increase both of his pay, and of the renowme of the English-men throughout all Italy: That a most puissant Prince in warre, had not without sufficient cause to inforce him, conceiued so good opinion of the valour of a man that was a stranger, and for this cause his seruice was required by the Princes and free Cities of Italy. For at that time all martiall affaires amongst the Italians were managed by forraine forces and Captaines.

It fortuned that vpon some displeasure conceiued, the Englishmen that were left at Alba, where the Duke of Clarence dyed, for the alliance past, made a sodaine reuolt frō the friendship of Galasius and Barnabe, and ioyned themselues with their enemies, by which change of affections, many of the Townes of Lombardy came to be wasted, by the outragious spoyles of the English-men, amongst other they tooke the Towne of Faera, & Banacanallo, whereof he solde one to the Marques of Este for 20. thousand Crownes, and the other he kept, and after that Sir John Haukwood, hauing both his forces & pay increased, determined to take new hopes, and new aduentures. He went first to the ayde of Pope Gregorie the twelfth, and hauing with great commendation recouered the Cities of Prouence that had reuolted from him, for his seruice therein, was worthily rewarded with the dominion of fiue Townes. From him, he went to the Florentines, who proffered great pay, and from them, not long after to the Pisanes, and then againe to the Florentines, vnder whom he serued with such a number of our Nation both horse-men and foote-men, that all Italy reared him, with that successe and increase of his commendation, and glorious renowme, that he was easily reputed to be the best Souldiour of that age, for he had learned by his long experience in the warres, hauing an exceeding ripe and quicke conceipt, to force occasions, to frame his resolutions, and to make speedy execution, being alio, as occasion required, both hot in his fights, and notable for his delayes, in so much as sundry great Captaines, who were afterward highly renowned, proceeded out of his Schole, as from an exact Master of martiall affaires. The exploytes that he had atchieued, with good successe, were accounted for sure grounds & principles of Discipline, as well amongst his very enemies, as also amongst his owne followers.

After infinite victories, obtained, and incomparable renowme amongst all men for the same, he deceased at Florence, being then an olde man, and was most honourably buryed in the great Church of the same Citie, where after his death, the Senate in rewarde of his good deserving, bestowed vpon him the honor of a Tombe, with the Image of a man on horse-back, as great as a mighty Pillar, for a Monument and testimony of his great prowesse in warre, and exceeding fidelitie to their state. Notwithstanding his executours, & afterwise his friends here in Engl. to wit, Robert Rockeden senior, Robert Rockeden iunior, and Iohn Coe, raised a Monument, or Tombe arched ouer, and ingraued to the likenesse of Paukes flying in a web, in the Parish Church of Hyngham-sible where he was borne, and founded there for him a Chantrie, and another in the Priory of Pyngham Castle, to remember Iohn Hawkwood Knight, Iohn Oliuer, and Thomas Newenton Esquires.

About the moneth of August Proclamation was made that all Irish people should auoyde the Realme, and get them home before Candlemas. The feast of the nativity of our Lady, vpon paine of life.

Irish people to auoid England.

King Richard went ouer into Ireland, and the Duke of Glocester with him, & the Earles of Arech, Salisbury Arundell, Nottingham, and Rutland. The Irish-men being afraid of such preparation as was made, durst not shew themselues openly, but with secret assaultings they often troubled the Kings army, yet when the English-men preuailed, many of the Lords of the land submitted themselues to the King, of which some the King held with him, least they should attempt some new stirre.

K. Richard went into Ireland.

And

1395. The King held his Christmas at Dublin in Ireland, and after that feast held a Parliament there: also the same time the Duke of Yorke, the Lord Warden of England, called a Parliament at London, to the which came (being sent forth of Ireland) the Duke of Glocester, the which before all the states shewed the Kings need, who had now spent his treasure amongst the Irishmen, so that a tenth was graunted by the Cleargie, and a fiftenth by the Laity.

Parliament at London.

The same time the fauourers of Wickliffes opinions, set vp on the gates of Saint Pauls Church in London, and on the gates of Saint Peters Church at Westminster, vehement accusations of the Cleargie, and conclusions such as had not not beene heard of, among the which were these verses following.

Libels against the Cleargie.

Plangunt Anglorum gentes, crimen Sodomorum,
Pauis fert, horum sunt facta causa malorum.
Surgunt ingrati, corrupto semine nati,
Alemem prelati, hoc defensare parati,
Qui Reges estis, populis quicunque praestis,
Qualiter his gestis, gladius prohibere potestis.

They were maintained in this their doing, by some Nobles men and Knights of this land, among which as chiefe were Sir Richard Stury, Sir Lewes de Clifford, Sir Thomas Latimer, Sir John Mountague, which did instigate them to confound if they might, the religious men: whereuppon the Arch-bishop of Yorke, the Bishop of London and other, as messengers from the whole state of the cleargy passed ouer into Ireland, where to the King they made a grieuous complaint, beseeching him that he would returne with speed, to helpe the faith and Church that was now incredibly afflicted by Lollards, (as they termed them) how they might take away all the possessions of the Church, and that worse was, how they might take and destroy all Canonicall sanctions. King Richard hearing these things, determined to returne home the sooner. And when he was returned, he called before him, and rebuked certaine of the Nobles bitterly, threatning them, if they from thenceforth fauored these Lollards, or in any wise did comfort them, he would extreamly punish them: he tooke an oth of Sir Richard Stury, that from thence forth, he should not hold such opinions, which thing being done, the King said, and I sweare to the that if thou euer violate thine oth, thou shalt die a shamefull death; other hearing such roaring of the Lion, plucked in their heads and lay close.

Sir John Froisart of S. Patricks Purgatorie.

About this time Sir John Froisart Chanon of Chimay in the Carledome of Heynalt, as himselfe reported, came into England, he demaunded of Sir William Lisle (who had been with the King in Ireland) the manner of the hole that in Ireland is called Saint Patricks Purgatory, if it were true that was said of it, or not: who answered that such a hole there was, and that himselfe and another Knight had beene there while the King lay at Dubline, & said they entred into the hole, and were closed in at the Sunne set, and abode there all the night, and the next morning issued out againe at the Sunne rising: he said, that when he & his fellow were entred and past the gate that was called the Purgatory of Saint Patricke, and that they were descended and gone downe three or foure paces, as into a cellar, a certaine hote vapour rose against them, and strake so into their heads, that they were faine to sit downe on the staires which were of stone: and after they had sate there a season, they had great desire to sleepe, and so fell into a slumber and slept there all night. In the which sleepe they had maruellous dreames, otherwise then they were wont to haue in their Chambers: but in the morning after they had issued out, they had cleane forgotten their dreames and visions.

King Richard sent messengers the Earle of Rutland, the Earle Marshall, the Arch-bishop of Dublin, the Bishop of Ely, Lewes Clifford, Henry Beaumount, Hugh Spencer, and many other to Charles the French King, to treat with him for a marriage to be had betweene the King of England, and the French Kings eldest Daughter named Isabell of eight yeres old, who was already promised to the Duke of Bitons sonne, by a Treaty that was made at Toures in Touraine. This was hard to be broken, for the French King and his Uncles had sealed with the Duke of Britaine.

K. Richard sent messengers to treat of a marriage with the French K. daughter.

Now sometwhat of the former voyage of King Richard into Ireland, as the same was reported to Sir John Froisart, by an Esquire of England, named Henry Christall. Sir John (quoth he) it is not in memory, that euer any King of England made such prouision for any iourney into Ireland, nor such a number of men of Armes nor Archers. The King was a nine moneths in the marches of Ireland to his great cost, and charge to the Realme, for they bare all his expences: and the marchantcities, & good Townes of the Realme thought it well bestowed, when they saw the King returne home againe with honour. The number that he had thither, were foure thousand men of armes, and thirty thousand Archers, well payed weekly. But to shew the truth, Ireland is one of the euill countries of the world: to make warre vpon or to bring vnder subiection, for it is closed strongly and wildly with high forests, and great waters and marishes. It is hard to enter to doe any of the countrey any damage: nor ye shall find no Towne, nor person to speak withall. For the men draw to the woods, and dwell in Caues or small Cottages, vnder trees and among bushes, like wild and sauage beasts: and when they know that any man maketh warre against them, being entred into their Countries, then they draw together to the straits & passages to defend them, so that no man can enter into it ouer. And when they see their time they will soone take their aduantage on their enemies, for they know the Country, and are light people. For a man of armes, being neuer so well beseen, shall run on foote as fast as he, and ouertake him, yea, and leape by vpon his horse behinde him, and throw him from his horse: for they are strong men in their armes, and haue sharpe weapons with large blades, two edged, wherwith they will slay their enemie, whom they neuer repute to be dead till they haue cut his throate, & opened his belly, and taken out his heart, which they carry away with them, some say they eate it, and haue great delight therein: they take no man to ransome. And when they see that they be ouer-matched, then they will depart & hide themselues in bushes, woods, and caues, so that no man shall finde them: Sir William Windsore, who had most vsed the warres in those parts of any other English man, could neuer learne the manner of the Countrey. They be hard people, and of rude wit: and they set nothing by lollity, nor fresh apparell, nor by noblenesse, for though their Countrey be soueraignely gouerned by Kings, whereof they haue many, yet will they abide and continue in their rudenesse.

Ireland somewhat described.

Truth it is, that 4. of the principall Kings, and most puissant after the manner of the countrey, are come to the obeysance of the King of England, by loue and faire meanes, and not by battell, or constraint. The Earle of Ormond, who marcheth vpon them, hath taken great paine, and hath so intreated them, that they came to Dubline to the King, and submitted them to him, to be vnder the obeysance of the Crowne of England, wherefore the King and all the Realme reputeth this for a great & honourable act. For King Edward did neuer so much vpon them, as King Richard did in his voyage. The honour is great, but the profite is but small, &c. The names of the foure Kings were these, first, the great Oneale King of Neth, the second Otrine of Thomond, King of Mhoumond, the third Arthur of Mackquemur King of Leinster, the fourth Ocomor King of Cheueno & Dzape, they were made Knights by King Richard in the Cathedrall Church of Dublin: these 4. Kings watched all the night before in the Church, and the next day at high Masse time, were made Knights, and with them Sir Thomas Orphew, Sir James Pado, and Sir John Pado his cousin.

The cōquest of Ireland by K. Richard.

These Kings sate that day at the Table with King Richard, they were regarded of many people, because their behauiour was strange to the manner of England.

When Sir John Froisart desired to know how it came to passe, that foure Kings of Ireland were so sone brought to the obeysance of King Richard, when King Edward the Kings Grand-father, who was so valiant a Prince, could neuer subdue them: Sir Henry Christall answered, he could not tell, but as men said, the great puissance that the King had ouer with him, and remaining there nine moneths, abashed the Irishmen. Also the Sea was closed from them on all parts, whereby their marchandises might not enter into their countries, though they that dwell farre within the Realme cared little for it, yet such as liue on the marches of England and by the sea coast, vse feate of merchandise.

King Edward in his time, had to answere so many warres in France, Britoine, Gascoigne, and Scotland, that his people were diuided in diuers places, wherefore he could not send any great number into Ireland. But when the Irishmen saw the great number of men of warre that King Richard had in this last iourney, they aduised themselues, & came to obeysance.

Edward the Confessor his seruice.

Moreouer, there was of old time in England a King named Edward, who is canonized as a Saint: This King in his time subdued the Danes, and discomfited them by battell on the Sea three times: This Edward the Irishmen loued, & dread him much more then any King of England that had beene before. And therefore King Richard this yere past, when he was in Ireland, in all his armories and deuises, he left the bearing of the armes of England, as the Leopards and Flower-deluces, and bare the armes of Saint Edward, that is, a Crosse patent gold and gules, with 4. white Partelets in the field, whereof it was said, the Irishmen were well pleased, and the sooner inclined to him, and haue done to him faith and homage in like manner as the Predecessors sometime did to King Edward. Thus haue I shewed the manner how King Richard had this yere accomplished his voyage in Ireland.

In this meane space the English Lords rid from Caleis to Amiens, and to Claremont in Beauuisyn, and so to Paris, where they were lodged about the Croste of Tyreuer, they were fiue hundred horses. The French King was lodged at the Castle of Loubre, and the Queene with her children at the house of S. Paul vpon the riuer Saine. The Duke of Berrey at the house of Nelle, the Duke of Burgoine at the house of Arthois, and the Duke of Burbon in his owne house, the Duke of Orleans, the earle of S. Paul, and the Lord Cowsey at their owne houses.

The King had assembled there all his councell, to the intent to make the better answere to the Embaillodors of England. He commanded euery day to be deliuered to these Embaillodours 200. Crownes, for their small expences, and for their horses. And the chiefe, as the Earle Marshall, & the Earle of Rutland, were oftentimes with the King and dined with him. These Lords desired euer to haue answere, and hauing beene at Paris 22. dayes, and their charges paid by the French King, a reasonable answere was giuen them, so that they were put in great hope to bring about that they came for, howbeit the French men sayd it could not be done shortly, because the Lady was so young and also that she was affianced to the Duke of Britaines eldest son, wherefore they must treat to breake that promise, or they could proceede any further, and thereupon the French King should send into England the next Lent, to shew how the matter went. With which answere the Englishmen were contented, they take their leaue and departed from Paris to Caleis, and so to England, the King was ioyous of their comming, and well contented with their arriuere.

The Duke Lancaster returned out Gascoigne.

About Michaelmas the Duke of Lancaster returned out of Gascoigne into England, for that hee had not beene received in Gascoigne, as hee thought hee should haue beene, for the people there did vtterly reiect him, from bearing gouernment ouer them. The King made him good cheere, and all the Winter following oft times sent to the French King, concerning the marriage, and was well enclined to haue peace, these pursuits and treaties toke such effect, that their matter drew neere to a point, so that such Embassadours as were first sent out of England into France, and were againe lodged in Paris, were in number fiue hundred, and soiourned in Paris more then three weekes.

T. Walsingham. Pirates of Denmarke rob the English.

This yere England suffered great losse by pyrats, that belonged vnto the Queene of Denmarke, who spoyled mariners and marchants, especially the men of Norfolke that assembled a multitude together, and toke vpon them to fight with them, but the enemies preuailing many of them were slaine, and very many taken prisoners, were reserued for ransome with the losse of twenty thousand pounds, which they had aboord with them to make their marchandise.

Bishop of Salisbury another deceased.

This yere deceased Iohn of Waltham Bishop of Salisbury, Treasurer of England, who had pleased the King so greatly, that (though many murmured at it) he commanded him to be buried at West-minster among the Kings. After him Roger Walden the K. Secretary and treasurer of Caleis, was made Treasurer. Iohn de Metford Bishop of Chichester was translated to Salisbury, and the Arch-bishop of Diuelin to Chichester. Also Thomas Brantingham Bishop of Exceter deceased, after whom succeeded Edmond Stafford bearer of the priuy Seale. Henry Wakefield Bishop of Worcester deceased, vnto whom succeeded at the Kinges request, a Monke of Chester, called Tideman a Physitian.

Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland.

In the moneth of November King Richard caused the body of his deare friend Robert de Vere Duke of Ireland, to be brought from Louane, and after to be buried in the Priory of Colin in Esser, with solemne funerals, which he honoured with his presence, and caused the Coffin of Cipres, wherein his body being embalmed lay, to be opened, that he might behold his face, and touch him with his fingers, openly shewing his loue to the dead carcasse, which he bare him when he was aliue; there were at the same funerals with the King, the Countesse of Oxford, mother to the deceased Duke, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, many other Bishops, Abbots, Priors, and other religious men, but yet there were few of the Nobles, for they had not digested the hatred they had conceiued against him.

Froissart.

The Embassadours of England being at Paris with the French King, their matters tooke such effect, that it was fully agreed that the King of England should haue in marriage Isabell the eldest daughter of King Charles, & by vertue of procuration, the Earle Marshall affianced and espoused her in the name of the King of England, and so from thencefoorth shee was called Queene of England. The Englishmen toke their leaue and departed to Caleis and so into England. The King was glad of their returne, and so were other, but wholsoeuer was glad of this marriage, the Duke of Glocester vncle vnto the King made no ioy thereof, for hee saw well that by reason of that Marriage and alliance, peace should be betweene the Kings, and their Realmes, which grieued him, and of this matter he would oftentimes speake with his brother the Duke of Pozke, and dzone him as much as he could to his opinions, for he was but a soft Prince. But to the Duke of Lancaster his eldest brother, he durst not speak ouer-largely, for he saw well that he was of the Kings opinion, and was well pleased with the Kings Marriage.

This yere the King helde his Feast of Chrismas at Langley, whither came to him the Duke of Lancaster, and hee receiued the Duke with honour, but not with loue, as was thought, hee therefore taking leaue of the King, departed from the Court toward Lincolne, where Catherine Swinford then lay, whom after the feast of the Epiphanie, (all men wondering at the strangenesse of the deed) he toke to wife. This woman was borne in Henault, daughter to Sir Paine Ruit, a Knight of that countrey, she was in her youth brought by in the Duke of Lancasters house, and attended on his first wife Blanch the Dutchesse of Lancaster: and in the dayes of his second wife the Dutchesse Constance of Spaine, she kept the said Catharine to be his concubine, who after was married to a Knight of England named Swinford, that was now deceased. Before shee was married, the Duke had by her 4. children, three sonnes, and a daughter, one of the sonnes hight Iohn Bewford, the second Thomas de Bewford, & the other Henry, who was brought vp at Aton in Almaine, proued a good Lawyer, and was after Bishop of Winchester, and Ioane a daughter: for the loue the Duke had to those his children, he married their Mother the said Katherine Swinford, being now a widow, as before is said. The great Ladies of England, as the Dutchesse of Glocester, the countesse of Darby, the countesse of Arundell, and others descended of the blood royall, greatly disdained that shee should be matched with the D. of Lancaster, and by that meanes accounted second person in the Realme, and be preferd in rome afore them; and therefore they said they would not come where the should be present, for it should be a shame to them, that a woman of so base birth, that had beene concubine to the D. should goe and haue place before them.

1396. John Duke of Lancaster marryed Katherine Swinford.

Hector Boet.

This yere during the peace, many Noblemen of England frequented Scotland, and many many Scots frequented England, through the which, ofttimes, many honourable turnaments were done betwixt Englishmen and Scottes, in defence of their honours & glory in Armes: Among whom was not a little praised the honourable victory gotten by Dauid Crauford on the Bridge at London, against the Lord Welles in this manner: The Lord Welles was sent Embassadour into Scotland, concerning certaine high matters betwixt the two Kings of England and Scotland, and when hee was at a solemne Banquet, where Scottishmen and English-men were communing of deedes of armes, the Lord Welles said, Let vs (sirs) haue no place, if ye know not the chiualry and valiant deedes of English-men, appoint vs a day and place when ye list, and ye shall haue experience. Then said Dauid Earle of Crauford, I assent, and incontinently, by consent of either partie, a day and place was assigned. The Lord Welles chose the Bridge of London for the place, and S. Dauid chose S. Georges day for the time. Thus departed the Lord Welles toward London. After the day Earle Dauid came with thirtie persons well appointed to London: As soone as the day of battell was come, both the parties were conueyed to the Bridge, and soone after by sound of trumpet, the two parties ran hastily together, on their barbed Horses, with square grounden speares to the death. Earle Dauid notwithstanding the valiant dint of speares broken on his helmet, and visage, fate so strongly, that the people moued with vaine suspition cryed, Earle Dauid contrary to the law of armes, is bound to the saddle: Earle Dauid hearing this murmure, dismounted off his horse, and with out any support or helpe ascended againe into the saddle. Incontinent they rushed together with the new speares, the second time with burning ire to conquer honour: but in the third course the Lord Welles was sent out of his saddle, with such a violence, that hee fell to the ground: Earle Dauid seeing his fall, dismounted hastily from his horse, and tenderly embraced him that the people might vnderstand, hee fought with no hatred, but only for the glory of victory: and in signe of more humanity, hee visited him euery day, while he recouered his health, and then returned into Scotland.

Justing on London-bridge.

Froissart.

The same season was sent into England from the French King, Valerian Earle of S. Paul with certain articles concerning the treaty of the peace. The King received him ioyously, and heard well his message, and said vnto him apart. Faire brother, as to the treaty of peace betweene me and my Father of France, I am right well inclined thereunto, my brethren, and two vncles of Lancaster & Pozke incline right well thereunto: but mine vncle the Duke of Glocester, who is a right perilous man, letteth it as much as he can. Sir, quoth the Earle of Saint Paul it behoueth you to win him with fayre words, and giue him great gifts. In the name of God (said the King) ye say well, and thus shall I doe. The Earle of Saint Paul said, the French King with his Vncles should come to Saint Omers, and bring with him his daughter, so that the King of England would come to Caleis, and so betweene Saint Omers and Caleis the two Kings should meete and speake together, whereby should increase loue and amity: And if they could not conclude on some peace, yet at the least the truce might be prolonged to endure for thirty or forty yeeres, betweene the two Realmes and their allies: this deuise seemed good.

K. Richard sailed to Caleis.

And so when euery thing was readie, the King and the Earle of Saint Paul sailed ouer. And the K. of England with his Vncles came to Caleis, with many Lords and Ladies: and the Duke of Burgoyne one of the French Kings vncles came to Saint Omers, and from thence to Caleis, to the King of England, and there consulted together on certaine articles of the peace, whereunto the K. of England lightly inclined. The Duke of Burgoyne & Earle of Saint Paul returned to S. Omers, &c. And the King of England with his vncles into England, leauing their wiues at Caleis, till their returne.

Ann. regni 20.

William Courtney Arch-bishop of Canterbury, deceased on the first of August, after hee had sate Arch-bishop of Canterbury 15. yeres and more: this William Courtney vpon the dissolution of the Hospitall, called Nouum operis at Maidstone, erected there a Colledge of secular priests, the matter to be a Prebend, which Colledge at the generall suppression was valued in land by yere at 139. pounds 7. shillings five pence: he builded much at Maidstone: he gaue by Testament 1000. markes towardes the amendment of the bodie of the Church of Christ in Canterbury, where hee was buryed. Thomas Arundell brother to the Earle of Arundell succeeded him in the Archbishoprieke of Canterbury, he had beene first Bishop of Ely, where hee had much large building in the palace, he gaue to the Church there a table of gold and precious Stones, valued at 3. hundred markes, he built the great gate house of his Inne in Holborne of London: hee was from thence translated to Pozke, where besides his great building and rich ornaments giuen, hee gaue to that Church, of plate two great basons of siluer and gilt, two great censers, 2. other basons of siluer, and two cruses, he gaue to the vse of the Vicars a siluer cup of great weight, and a bole of siluer of an higher price, for the vse of the Chapter, &c. and was now translated to the see of Canterbury, he forthwith renoured his office of Chancellor, whereunto was admitted Edmond Stafford Bishop of Exceter.

Courtney & Arundell Arch-bishops of Canterbury deceased.

Pe haue heard how the King of of England, Parliament. was returned from Caleis into England, and at Westminster there remained till Michaelmasse, that the parliament at Westminster should beginne. In the meane season great preuision was made at Caleis, & Guisnes, for the King & his Lords sent from the ports of England on that coast, also great prouision was had of Flanders, all which came by sea to Caleis. And likewise for the French King and his brother the Duke of Orleans, and his Uncles and other Prelates and Lords of France, great provision was made at Saint Omers, at Ayre, at Tyrwin, at Arde, Hesdin, Montoire, and at all other houses & Abbeyes thereabout, there was nothing spared on either part, especially the Abbey of S. Bertine was well replenished of all things to receive the kinge.

The Parliament beganne at Westminster at Michaelmasse, & it was ordained to endure eight and fortie dayes, but it was abridged; for the King would not tarry there more then five dayes, wherein he declared the thinges pertaining to the Realme, especially such matters as touched himselfe, and the cause why he came from Calets. Which things being dispatched, the King returned againe to Calets, with his Uncles of Lancaster and Glocester, and other Prelates and Lords of England. The Duke of Yorke tarried still in England with the Q. of Darby to governe the Realme in the Kings absence. Assoone as the French King knew that the King of England was returned to Calets, he sent to him the Earle of Saint Paul to shew him what order was taken in France concerning his marriage, which the king liked well.

When the Duke of Lancaster and his son, the Duke of Glocester and his sonne, the Earle of Rutland, the C. Marshall, Earle of Huntington, the Kings Chamberlaine and many other Lords and Knights, Esquires and Ladies, rode with the Earle of S. Paul to Saint Omers, where they were well received of the Duke of Burgoine, and of the Dutchesse, the D. of Britaine and other. All the chere that could bee devised was made to the English Lords and Ladies: there was the Dutchesse of Lancaster, her sonne, and two daughters, there was great gifts given of plate, of golde and silver, nothing was spared, insomuch that the Englishmen had marvell, especially the Duke of Glocester, who said to his Counsell, I see well there is great riches in the Realme of France, there was much given to him: he take ever all their gifts, but allwayes he ranne in his heart: which the D. of Burgoyne well perceived. When the Lords and Ladies of England had beene royally feasted, then was communication had how the two Kings should meete and speake together, and how the Lady should be delivered, whereupon appointment was made, and leave taken on all parts. The English part returned to Calets to the King, and shewed what chere they had, and what Presents had beene given them, which newes pleased well the King.

Anone after the French King came to S. Omers, having the Duke of Britaine in his company, where it was ordained that the three D. Berry, Burgoyne, and Burbon, should goe to Calets to speake with the King of England, where they were joyously received, and had as good chere as could bee devised. The 3. Dukes had secret communication with the K. and his Counsell, from whence they returned to Saint Omers to the French King, & shewed how they had sped. Then the French King went to the Basted of Ard. the Duke of Burgoyne to Hountoire, the Duke of Bytaine to the Towne of Esquie, and the Duke of Berry to Balingham. In every part about, there were pitcht by tents and pavilions, and all the Country full of people, what of France and of England. The King of England came to Guisnes with the Duke of Lancaster, & the Duke of Glocester to Hames.

Thus on the eve of Simon and Jude, about ten of the clocke in the foze-noone, the Kings departed out of the tents, the which were pight not farre a sunder, and came unto the one to the other, & met at a certaine place appointed, on the one side there was araigned 400. knights of France, armed with their swords drawne: And on the other part, 400. knights of England in like manner, so the two Kings passed thozow them.

The Dukes of Lancaster and of Glocester ledde the French King, and the Duke of Berrey, and of Burgoyne ledde the King of England, thus came forth the 800. knights, all which knights, when the two Kings came iust together, kneeled downe, the two Kings met together bare-headed, and a little inclined, and tooke each other by the hands, then the French king led the king of England into his tent, which was noble and rich, and the foure dukes tooke each other by the hands, and followed the 2. Kings, & other knights after, the Frenchmen on the one side, and the Englishmen on the other side: and so they stood regarding each other till all was done. So the two Kings hand in hand entred the French Kings tent. Then the 4. Dukes kneeled downe before the Kings, and they raised them up and so talked together: then the two Kings went a little apart, & talked a certaine space. In the meane time wine and spices were brought, the Duke of Berry served the French King of spice, and the Duke of Burgoigne of wine: And the dukes of Lancaster and Glocester served the K. of England, and other Knights and Esquires served the other Prelates and Lords. This businelle done, the two kings take leave each of other, and so returned to their tents, and take their hozses and rode, the King of England to Guisnes, the Dukes of Lancaster and Glocester to Hames, and the other to Calets: the French king rode to Cozdie, & the Duke of Orleans with him, the duke of Berrey to Dozman, and the duke of Burgoyne to Hountoire.

On Simon & Judes day, about 11. a clocke, the king of England & his Uncles and other Lords came to the French king into his tent, where they were received right honourably. Then tables were set up, & the 2. kings sate at one table alone, the French king on the right hand, the Dukes of Berrey, Burgoyne, & of Burbon served the two Kings. This dinner was taken in the French kings tent, and after wine & spices taken, the yong Q. was brought forth accompanied with a great number of Ladies dies and damosels, and there she was delivered to the King of England, and every man toke their leave to depart. The young quéne was set in a rich litter, and there went no more French Ladies with her but the Lady of Coloyn, there were Ladies of England, the Dutchesse of Lancaster, Yorke, Glocester, the lady Namure, the Lady Poynings, and many other, who received the Quéne with great ioy. Thus the K. of England and his yong Quéne, with their company rode to Calets the same night. And the French K. and his company to Saint Omers.

After the Kings returne to Calets, ere Allhallowne, day in solemne wise, he married the Lady Isabell in the Church of S. Nicholas at Calets, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury doing the office, at the which time there was a great feast and great larges.

K. Richard married Isabell the French K. daughter.

On the next morow the Dukes of Orleance and Burbon came to Calets, to see the King and the Quéne, and on the next morow they toke their leave, and departed to S. Omers to the French King, and the same day the King and the Quéne toke their ship, & had faire passage: for within 3. houres they arrived at Douer, notwithstanding by tempest they lost their tents and houshold-stuffe: from Douer they rode to Rochester, to Dertford, to Eltham, & so to London, whereof the Citizens being warned, made out certaine horsemen well appointed, all in one liuery of colour, with devises imbroidered on their sleeves, that every company might be known from other, the which with the Maioz and his brethren, clothed in Scarlet wrate the King & Quéne on the blacke Heath, and there doing their duties, and attended upon them till they came to Newington, where the King commanded the Mayoz with his company to returne, for that he was appointed to lodge that night at Kennington.

Q. Isabell Crowned.

The 13. of November, the young Q. was conveyed from Kennington, through Southwarke, with great pompe unto the Tower of London, at which time there went such a multitude of people to see her, that upon London bridge nine persons were crowded to death, of whom the Mayoz of Triptoz in Essex was one, and a worshipfull Matron that dwelt in Cornhill was another. The morow after she was conveyed to Westminster, and there crowned with all the honour that might be devised.

Parliament at London.

The 22. of January, a Parliament began at London, in the which the Duke of Lancaster caused to be made legitimate, the issue which he had begotten of Katherine Swinford, before she was his wife. And the same time John son to the said Duke of Lancaster and the said Katherine, was created Earle of Somerset, and the Duke gaue him to surname Sir Bello Forto or Bowfort. It was ordained in this Parliament, that Justices should not haue to sit with them any as assistant: there was a tenth granted by the Cleargy to the King. At this time K. Richard contrary to his oath, revoked Robert Belknape, John Holt, William Brugh Knights of the Wath, and Justices forth of Ireland.

Knights of the Bathe.

This yere when the Realme of England seemed to enioy the chiefest peace that might be, by reason of the K. marriage, and the great riches that were heaped up together by the same, and by the reason of the truce of 30. yeers established, and the presence of so many Noblemen, as the like no forraine Realme was able to shew, sodainly all things were troubled and brought into a turmoyle, whiles the K. at Plashy in Essex, upon a sodaine tooke his uncle the D. of Glocester by force of armes, he suspecting no such thing, and caused him to be conveyed to Calets, there to be kept in prison, and caused the E. of Warwicke to be arrested and imprisoned, the same day that he had bidden him to dinner, notwithstanding that he shewed him very good countenance, and had promised him great friendship: beside that he deceived the Earle of Arundell with faire words (who was well able to have defended himselfe, & to have delivered his friends, the Duke of Glocester and the E. of Warwicke) and notwithstanding he yelded himselfe quietly, hee sent him to the Ile of Wight, there to be imprisoned untill the parliament. And to the end there should be no commotion among the commons for the imprisoning of the nobles, he caused to be proclaimed that the apprehension of them, was not for any old displeasure, but for new transgressions committed against the K. thereby after he caused the said nobles to bee indited at Nottingham, & subpoened such as should appeach them in the next Parliament, to wit, Ed. Earle of Rutland, Thomas Moubrey Earle Marshall, Thomas Holland Earle of Kent, Io. Holland Earle of Huntington, John Beawford Earle of Somerset, John Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, & Tho. Spencer, Wil. Scrope the K. Chamberlaine. And in the meane season the King assembled together to guard his person, many malefactors of the County of Chester which kept watch and ward both day and night about him. Then the King caused a great and generall parliament to be summoned at Westminster, where he caused a great Hall to bee builded in the midst of the Pallace betwixt the clocke tower, and the doze of the great Hall: This Parliament began about the fifteenth of September, at the beginning whereof Edward Stafford Bishop of Exceter L. Chancellor, made a proposition or sermon, in the which he affirmed that the power of the King was alone and perfect of it selfe, & those that impeached it were worthy to suffer paine of the law: to this Parliament all the Nobles came with their retinue in armes, for feare of the King: the proclocutors were Knights, in whom no goodnesse at all could be found, but a naturall covetousnesse, unstiable ambition, intolerable pride, & hatred of the truth, their names were I. Bushy, William Bagot, and Thomas Greene. These required chiefly to have the Charters of pardons revoked and disanulled: and Bushy said to the King, because we are charged to say what they bee that have committed any offence against your maiestie, and regall authoritie, we say that Thomas Duke of Glocester and Parliament at Westminster.

T. Walsingham.

Bushy, Bagot, and Greene.

Richard Earle of Arundell, in the 18. yere of your raigne, have trayterously compelled you, by meane of the new Archbishop of Canterbury then Chancellor, to graunt to them a commission to governe your realme, & to dispose of the Rate thereof, to the prejudice of your maiestie and royalty. The same day was that commission disanulled with all articles depending thereupon. Also the generall pardon granted after the great Parliament by them procured, and one especiall pardon for the Earle of Arundell were revoked.

Also there was petition made by the commons, John Bushy speaking for them, that the generall pardon procured and got forth, by the Archbishop of Canterbury then Chancellour procuring it, should be disanulled: and he to be judged a traytor, for granting to it: whereupon the Archbishop rose and would have answered, but the King said, to morow, to morow: but he came not into the Parliament house againe: the King said, that he would deliberate of the Commons petition.

Also it was established, that any traytour confessed to stand against the Kings regality, should be adiudged worthy to suffer punishment to be appointed for such offence.

Fower thousand archers compassed the Parliament house, ready to shoote.

And it was enacted, that criminall causes from thenceforth should be determined in every Parliament, and then licence being had to depart, a great stirre was made as is bled, whereupon the Kings Archers, in number 4. thousand, compassed the Parliament house, thinking there had bin in the house some bzyple or fighting, with their Bowes bent, their Arrowes nocked, and drawing, ready to shot, to the terror of all that were there, but the King herewith comming, pacified them. On the next day, the Prelates were inioyned, upon paine of losing their temporalties, that they should the same day agree upon some procurator, to consent in their names to all things in that parliament, to be dispatched, and the King had these words: Sir John Bushy, because many desire that I would explaine the fifty persons exempted in the generall pardon, I will briefly: that what man soeuer beareth this, is worthy of death: first because he sweth: secondly, because I have excepted those that are to be impeached in this parliament: thirdly, because other of their associates hearing them appealed, would be afraid where no feare is. On the next day, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury commeth to the Pallace to appeare in the Parliament, but the King commanded him by the Bishop of Carlile that hee should returne to his house, & from thence forth he appeared not. The Prelates made Thomas Percy the Kings Steward of Lousholde, their procurator, to consent in all things in this Parliament to be done. Also sir John Bushy had these words, our Soueraigne Lord the King, because the second article in the Parliament is for punishment to be appointed for such as violate the Kings royall authoritie, I beseech your grace that you will authorize me by way of appealing, of accusing, or any casing, with licence to make declaration from one to the rest so often and when to me and my fellowes it may seme expedient, & it be granted: then Bushy had these words, I accuse Th. of Arundell, Archbishop of Canterbury, of three fold treason.

First, of the commission in granting the regiment or gouernement of the Realme to Thomas Duke of Glocester, and to Richard Earle of Arundell at his instance, who rather because he was your Chancellor, should have refused it.

Secondly, for that under pretence of that commission, they trayterously usurping the iurisdiction of your royall authority, held a solemne parliament traiterously in prejudice of your regalitie.

Thirdly, because that by the said usurping, Sir Simon de Burley, and Sir James Barnes Knights, & faithfull Leiges to you, were trayteronsly murthered, and put to death, of which things, we your commons demand iudgement, worthy of so high treason, to be terribly pronounced by you, and because the Arch-bishop is a man of great consanguinity, affinity, power, & most politike wit & cruell nature, for the preservation of your estate, & the whole kingdomes, by the petition of this present Parliament, I require that he may be put into safe custody, until the final execution of his iudgement.

The King hereunto answered, that for the excellence of his dignitie he would take deliberation till the next morow, and all other that were put into the same commission, he pronounced them to be his faithfull Liege people, and void from that treason, and especially Alexander Neuell, late Arch-bishop of Yorke, & then Sir Edmond of Langley, D. of Yorke, Uncle to the King, and Sir William Wickham Bishop of Winchester, that were put into the same Commission, with teares fell downe on the ground before the King, & gaue him humble thankes for that grace and benefite bestowed on them.

Also on S. Matthewes day, Edward Earle of Rutland, the Erles of Kent, Huntington, Nottingham, Somerset, and Salisbury, with the Lords Spencer and Scrope, in a suite of red gownes of silke garded, and bordered with white silke, & embroidered with letters of gold, propounded the appeale by them to the King at Nottingham, before set forth: in the which, they accused Thomas Duke of Glocester Richard Earle of Arundell, Thomas Earle of Warwicke, & Thomas de Mortimer knight, of the premised treasons, and of an armed insurrection of Haringey Park, traiterously attempted against the King, and putting in sureties for the prosecuting of their appeale. Richard Earle of Arundell was arraigned in a red gowne, and a Scarlet hood, and faithfully the Duke of Lancaster said to the Lord Neuell, take from him his girdle and hood, and so it was done, and herewith the Articles of appeale being to the said Earle declared, with a baliant and a bolde minde, hee denyed that hee was a Traytour, and required of Arundell the benefite of the pardon, protesting that arraigned he he would not go from the fauour of the King & his grace. The D. of Lancaster said to him, thou traytour, that pardon is reuoked. The Earle answered, truely thou lyest, I was neuer traytour. Also, the Duke of Lancaster said, why diddest thou purchase thy pardon & the Earle answered to escape the tongues of mine enemies, of whom thou art one, and verily, as farre forth as toucheth treason, thou hast more need of pardon then I. The King said, make answere unto thine appeale. The Earle answered, I see well that these persons have accused me of treason, shewing the appealements, but truely they all lie, I was neuer traitour, but I aske allwayes the benefite of my pardon, the which your grace graunted to me within these fiue yeres now last past, being of full age, and of your franke good will and proper motion. Then said the King, I did so grant it that it should not be against mee: then said the Duke of Lancaster, then the graunt availeth not. The Earle answered, truely of that pardon I knew lesse then thy selfe, that was then on the further side the Seas. Then said Sir John Bushy, that pardon is reuoked by the King, the Lords, and by his faithfull people: the Earle answered, where be those faithfull people? I know thee well and thy companie, how pe are gathered together, not to deale faithfully, for the faithfull people of the realme are not heere, and therefore the people doe lament for me, and well I know that thou hast beene euer false. And then Bushy and his fellowes cryed out. Behold soueraigne Lord and King, how this traytour goeth about to raise sedition betwixt vs, and those people that are at home. The Earle answered, ye pe, I am no traytour. Then rose the Earle of Darby and said, diddest thou not say thus to me at Huntington, where wee were first assembled together to rise, that it was the best, afore all things to take the King. The Earle said to the Earle of Darbie, thou lyest on thy head, I neuer thought of my Soueraigne Lord the King, but that that was good, and for his honour. Then said the King, diddest not thou say to me in time of thy Parliament, in the Bathe behind the White-Hall, that Sir Simon de Burley was worthy of death for many causes? and I answered, that I knew no cause of death in him, and yet thou and thy fellowes diddest trayterously put him to death, and then the Duke of Lancaster pronounced Iudgement against him in this manner: Richard, I Iohn, Steward of England, Iudge thee to be a Traytour, and I condemne thee to be drawne and hanged, to bee beheaded and quartered, and thy landes tayled and not tayled, from thee and from thine heires of thy body descending, to bee confiscate: then thy King for reuerence of his blood, commanded him onely to bee beheaded, and then was he led to the Tower-hill, and there beheaded: the Augustine Fryers in London tooke vp his body and buried it in their Church, on the North side of their Quire; and after on his graue a sumptuous Tombe was set of Marble stone. Also the same day, the King appointed the Lord Cobham (accused by the commons) to be arraigned. Also vpon the Saturday, Sir Thomas de Mortimer was summoned vpon paine to bee banished as a Traytor, within fiue monethes to come to be tryed in iudgement: and then said the King, peraduenture the Earle of March cannot take him, and therefore I will so long stay for his certificate out of Ireland.

Earle of Arundell beheaded.

Richard E. of Arundell arraigned.

Also, a declaration was made, that all benefices or gifts, granted or alienated by those that were already condemned, or after were to be condemned in this Parliament, and other whatsoeuer, granted sithence the tenth yere of this Kings raigne, should be reuoked. Also, on Monday following, the certificate giuen in of the Earle of Nottingham, then Captaine of Calets, in whose custodie the Duke of Glocester was, that the same Duke might not be brought to be tryed in iudgement, because hee was dead in his custody at Calets, at the petition of pet of the said appellants, the same sentence was pronounced against him which had beene pronounced earst against the E. of Arundell.

D. of Glocester condemned to die after he was dead.

Also the Archbishop of Canterbury, first his temporalties being confiscated was banished the realme. On the Tuesday, Rikell one of the Kings Iustices, borne in Ireland, read certaine confessions drawne in writing vpon the said treasons, affirming that the same were the confessions of the said D. by him put from body or discouered, and written with his owne hand.

Archbishop of Canterbury banished.

Also, the Carledome of Chester was annexed to the honor of a principalitie, by annexing thereto the lands of the said Earle of Arundell confiscate.

Also, the same day, John Earle of Salisbury made request to haue a Scire facias granted to him against the Earle of March, for the Lordship of Denbigh in Wales, and the King answered thereupon that he would take deliberation. Also, on the Wednesday, it was ordained that the lands of the said Earle of Arundell, annexed to the Dutchie of Chester, should enioy the liberties of the same Dutchy, excepted that to the twelfthmen of those parts, their old lawes & customes should still remaine & be continued.

The Castle of Lyons with the Seigniory of Bromfield, & Yale, to the said Castell belonging. The Castell of Chirke with the Seigniory of Chirkland to the said Castell belonging. The Castle of Oswalds stracte, with the Towne well walled with stone, with the hundred, and the eleven townes to the said Castell belonging. The castell of Isabell, with the seignioy to the same, belonging to the Castell of Dallilay, with the appurtenance in the Countie of Shropshyre, and the reuersion of the Seignioy of Clone with their appurtenances, which Edward Earle of Rutland then held for terme of his life. All which Townes, Castels, and Seignories aforesaid were belonging to Richard late Earle of Arundell, and which by force of the iudgement giuen against the said Earle in the said Parliament, forfeit to our Soueraine Lord the King, and shall be from henceforth answered to the principality, or Dukedome of Chester. Also it was ordained that such as gave either counsell, ayde, or favour to the children of them that were condemned, or that should be condemned in this Parliament, should be punished as Traytors.

Archbishop of Canterbury banished the Realme.

On Friday, the King appointed a prefixed day to the Archbishoppe of Canterbury, to wit, the third of the first weeke, to depart the Realme.

Also it was ordained, that all the Lords spirituall and temporall, should sweare inviolably to observe whatsoever in this Parliament were enacted, and that the censures of the Church should be pronounced by the Prelates against all those that should goe against the same.

E. of Warwicke arraigned.

Also, the Earle of Warwicke was arraigned, and his hood being taken off, and the appeale read, as hee had beene some miserable old woman, confessed all things contained in appeale, weeping, wayling, and howling, to be done traytorously by him, and submitting himselfe to the Kings grace in all things, forrowing that ever hee had beene affociate vnto the appellants. Then the King demaunded of him by whom he was allured to ioyne with the n, and hee answered, by Thomas Duke of Glocester, and the Abbot of S. Albones, & a Monke recluse in Westminster, & besought the King of grace and mercie, and the King granted him life to be led in perpetuall prison out of the Realme, his goods moueable and vnmoueable to be confiscate, as the Earle of Arundels had beene, and the King commanded that hee should be had to the Tower of London, and after, to bee conueyed ouer to the castle within the Ile of Man, vnder the wardship of William Scroope, then Lord of the said Ile, to remaine there in perpetuall prison, and on the morrow, the K. granted to him and his wife fiue hundred markes yeerely, during their liues. Also, the writ of Scire facias was granted to the Earle of Salisbury, against the Earle of March, for the said Lordship of Denbigh, fifteene dayes respite being given to put in an answere. Item, it was ordained, that those which ought money to Rochester Bridge, should be put in execution for the payment, to the vse of the same Bridge.

Westminster hall repayred.

K. Richard caused the great Hall at Westminster to be repayred, both the walles, windowes, and roofe, with a marueilous worke, and great costs, which he leuied of strangers banished out of their countries, who obtained licence to remaine in this country, by the K. Charter which they had purchased with great summes of money.

Parliament at Shrewsbury.

This yere King Richard kept his Christmas at Lichfield, where he spent in the Christmas time 200. tunns of wine, and 2000. oxen with their appurtenance, and then take his iourney toward Shrewsbury, where the parliament lately prorogued, began again, in the which it was ordained, that all Statutes ordained at Westminster in the ri. yere of the Kings Reigne, should be reuoked and disanulled, and all the Articles of the same, and the heyres of them that were adiudged in the said Parliament, should be reconciled, and restored to all their lands, inheritances, and possessions: excepted, that they should haue no claime against the withholders of the profits, and reuenues of those lands in the meane time. On the morrow it was ordained that the heires of them which were iudged and conuicted in the foure Articles of high treason, should not enioy the landes, nor any possessions of their progenitors, but should be excluded from all and euery action and clayme for euer.

The first Article of high treason was this, if any man of what condition soeuer he were, did imagine the Kings death.

The second Article was if any man should haue an imagination to depose the King.

The third, if any man did ride armed within the Realme of England in manner of warre against the King.

The fourth was, if any man disclaimed the Kings homage.

Also the same day the Lord Cobham was arraigned, to make answere vnto the two Articles of high treason.

The first was, that the said Lord Cobham was in counsell to make one commission against the state of the King: and likewise that hee vsed the same commission in doing iudgement against the Kings will, and to the preiudice of him.

The second, that he sate in iudgement to iudge Sir Simon de Burley, and Iames Barnes Knights of the Kings: in his absence, & against his will: and vpon this, hee was conuict and iudged to perpetuall prison within the Ile of Jersey.

Henry Duke of Hereford accused Thomas Mowbray D. of Norfolke, of certaine words by him spoken, as they rode betweene London and Bainsford, tending to the dishonour of the Kings person, which the Duke of Norfolke bitterly denyed to haue spoken: whereupon a combate was granted them them by the K. to be fought at Couentry, vpon the seuenteenth of September.

A fifteenth and a halfe was granted, and fyue cuttomes of Woolles, fifty shillings of euery Sacke of euery Englishman borne, and three pound of euery Stranger.

This Parliament ended, the King visited many places in the West part of England, as Worcester, Hereford, Bristow, Glastenbury and Bath.

An. reg. 22.

After this also, the K. caused a Theatre to be made at Bristow, for a combate to be fought betweene two Scots, to wit, the one being an Esquire appellant, and the other a Knight defendant, and the apellant was ouercome and hanged: but after this time, he made a great and marueilous strong Theatre at Coventry for the Combate betwixt the D. of Hereford and the Duke of Norfolke, and gaue them day for the fight, the 16. of September, to wit, the feast day of S. Edith, at which day and place, a great concourse and assembly of people was there gathered out of all parts of England. When the said Champions appeared in the Lystes, ready to fight, the King commanded them to be quiet and not to fight, and then the king sitting in his royall apparell within his tent girt with his sword, hee commanded his decree to be proclaimed, & this was the Kings decree, that Henry Duke of Hereford, for his disobedience towards the King, should be banished for tenne yeres, and likewise the Duke of Norfolke to be banished for euer out of England, taking of his reuenues a thousand marks by yere, till the towne of Calcis were repayred.

Dukes banished.

At the feast of S. Michael, the King caused seauentene Counties in East England to be indited, and laid to their charges, that they had bene against him, with the Duke of Glocester the Earles of Arundell and Warwike, wherefore he sent honorable men to indite the Lords both spirituall, and temporall, to make a submission by writing, sealed with their owne hands, acknowledging themselues to be traytors to the King, though they neuer offended him in word or deed. Moreouer, he compelled all the religious gentlemen and commons, to set their seales to blankes, to the end he might as it pleased him, oppresse them seuerally, or all at once: some of the Commons paid 1000. markes, some 1000. pounds, &c.

Blanke Charters.

Vnaccustomed othes.

Also, he ordained through euery prouince in England, that all gentlemen, and men of substance, should be sworne firmely to maintaine according vnto their possible power, all the Statutes, Articles and constitutions ordained in the last Parliament.

1399. Great Iustings and feastings.

This yere the K. kept a most royall Christmas, with euery day iustings and running at the tilt, wherevnto resorted such a number of people, that there was euery day spent xvbii. or xvbi. oxen, and three hundred sheepe, besides foule without number. Also the king caused a garment for himselfe to be made of gold, siluer and precious stones, to the value of 3000. markes.

On Newyers day, there vnto Lodelow, a very deepe water which ranne betwixt the Townes of Dwell one and Harselwood flood sodainly still and dryed it selfe, so that by the space of three miles, the bottome remained dry, which wonder many a one thought, did signifie the diuision of the people, and falling away from the king, which happened shortly after.

E. of March & Ulster in Ireland.

Roger Mortimer Earle of March, and of Ulster in Ireland, lying there in a Castle of his, there came on him a great multitude of wild Irishmen to assaile him, and hee issuing out, fought manfully, till he was by them slayen to peeces, whose death the king determined to reuenge.

Cr. Per. Collidge. Wi. Wyllums.

D. of Lancaster deceased.

The third of February died John of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster, at the Bishop of Elies Inne, in Holborne by London, and was honourably buried in Saint Paules Church at London by Blanch his first wife, his son Henry Duke of Hereford being then beyond the Seas.

K. Richard saileth into Ireland.

About Whitsontide, King Richard with a Nauy of 200. shippes, sailed from Milford haven, towards Ireland, and arriued at Waterford on the last day of May, from whence, he marched with an army of 30000. to Kilkenny, fourescore miles within the country, and there remained fourtene dayes, tarrying for Edw. Earle of Rutland Duke of Aumarle, that kept not the right course.

An. reg. 23.

On Midsomer euen he went from thence towards the Countrey of Mackmur, who remained amongst the Irish with 2000. men, right hardy, and such as seemed but little to feare the Englishmen. At the entring of the woods, the King commanded fires to be vsed, so that many a house, and many a village was burnt, and there the king made Henry the D. of Hereford son knight, who was afterward King Henry the fifth, with tenne other, 2500. pioners were appointed to fell the woods, and make wayes for the Englishmen. The Irishmen feared greatly the shot of the Englishmen, but yet with their darts they assailed, and slew diuers as they caught them at aduantage. The vncle of Mackmur came in & yeelded himselfe to the King, with a wyth about his necke, and many other naked and bare legged, did the like, all which the king pardoned. After this, the King sent to Mackmur, promising him, that if he would come in as his vncle had done, with the wythe about his necke, he should be pardoned: but he vtterly refusing, said, he would fight to death in defending his right, for hee knew the English-men wanted victuals, and more then they had brought with them could not be bought for siluer or gold. There was already such scarcity, that there were some some, some fyre, that had but a small loafe of bread to line by the day, and some that eate not a graine in fiue dayes together. In this estate they remained eleuen dayes, many of their horses were lost for lacke of meate. In the meane season yet came three shippes from Dublin fraught with victuals, for the which was great strife and presse especially for the wine of Offery and Spaine. The morrow after the Kin: departed from thence, keeping the hye way toward Dublin, mangre all the noise of the enemies: at what time Mackmur sent a meſſenger with notice to the King that he would be his friend and aſke him mercy, or els if it pleaſed him to treat of peace, to ſend ſome noble men to him, whereupon the Earle of Glocester was ſent, who led with him the reverend whereof he was Captaine, being two hundred launces, and a thouſand archers, betwixt two woods farre from the ſea in the declining of an hill they met with the Iriſh. Mackmur himſelfe rode on a white horſe without ſaddle or other furniture, that coſt him (as was ſaid) foure hundred kine, which horſe he ran downe the hill, that the beholders reported they never had ſeene Hare nor Deere to haue runne ſo ſwiftly. In his right hand he bare a Dart great and long, which he threw exceeding well. He was a mighty ſtrong man of perſonage. There the Earle and he talked a good while, about the murthering of the Earle of March, and after of other things, but agree they could not, and ſo departed.

Mackmur a good horſeman.

The Earle adverriſed the King what he had found, which was nothing, but that the enemy would cry mercy, ſo as he might be ſure to haue peace without other griefe, otherwiſe he would (ſo long as he lived) defend himſelfe: where, the K. (in his wrath) not knowing what ſet might happen, ſware, that he would never depart Ireland, till he had him either alive or dead. The hoſte diſlodged for lacke of victuals, they were a thirtie thouſand of them comming over, that lay then at Dubline fifteene dayes, the King forthwith dividing his army into three partes, ſent them out to ſeeke Mackmur, promiſſing an hundreth markes to him that he could bring him in, which offer was well hearkened vnto, for it ſounded well, but he could not be caught: and the ſame day Edward Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumale Conſtable of England, arrived with an hundred ſailes, of whoſe comming the King was very glad, though he indeed had tarried long, and might haue come much ſooner.

They remained five weekes at Dubline, and heard no newes out of England, the paſſage was ſo dangerous: the wind being contrary and tempeſts ſo great, at the length came a ſhip with heauy newes, how the Duke of Hereford, and now by the deceaſe of his father, D. of Lancaſter, was arrived in England at Ravenſpore faſt by Birdlington beſides Wadlington in Yorkſhire, and had beheaded William Scroope Earle of Wiltſhire, Treaſurer of England, John Buſhy, Henry Greene and other, and had cauſed Thomas Arundell Archbiſhop of Canterburye to preach againſt K. Richard, who alſo ſhewed a Bull procured from Rome, promiſſing remiſſion of ſinnes to all thoſe which ſhould aide the ſaid Henry, in conquering of his enemies & after their death to be placed in paradiſe, which preaching moued many to cleaue to the Duke.

The Duke of Hereford returned into England.

Upon this newes the King being perſwaded to make haſte over, the Duke of Aumarle ſaid, it was better to ſtay till his ſhippes might be brought together, for there were but an hundreth ready to make ſayle, whereupon John Mountacute E. of Salisbury was ſent with a power, whileſt the King going to Waterford might gather his fleete, who promiſed within five dayes to haue followed him. The Earle of Salisbury landed at Conwey, where hee was ſoone aduertiſed how the Duke had taken the more part of England, and that all the Lords were got to him, with more then threeſcore thouſand men. The Earle of Saliſbury, cauſed to ſummon the Welch-men and them of Cheſhire, to come to him, ſo that (hauing the King had beene arrived at Conwey) within foure dayes there were come together forty thouſand men, ready to goe againſt the Duke of Hereford, where they ſtayed fourteene dayes, but when they ſaw the King came not, they ſtealed away, & left the E. of Saliſbury, in maner alone, ſo that vnneath he had an hundred men with him. The D. of Hereford aduanced towards the E. of Saliſbury, who wiſhed him to Conwey. The K. through euill Counſell ſtaid after the Earles departure 18. dayes, and then arrived at Milford Hauen, with the Dukes of Aumarle, Exceſter, & Surrey, & diuers other of the Nobility, with the biſhops of London, Lincolne, & Carliſle, and many other that hee might with an Army meete the Duke before he had gotten his aſſiſters together, but after his comming into England, and vnderſtanding the Dukes preparation, hee let fall his courage to giue battell, knowing for certaine that the people aſſembled againſt him would rather die then giue place, as well for the hatred as feare, which they had conceiued of him: whereſore leauing his army with the Earle of Rutland, Duke of Aumarle, Conſtable and chiefe gouernour of his Army at Milford, went from thence priuily about midnight following, diſguiſed like a Prieſt, for feare to be knowne, with fourteene perſons onely, who went to Conwey, thinking the Earle of Saliſbury had there ſtaid the field. There were with him the Dukes of Exceſter and Surrey, & the Earle of Glocester, that continued faithfull vnto the laſt houre.

K. Richard returned out of Ireland and landed at Milford hauen.

There were three Biſhops alſo, of which, two did not like good men, the Biſhop of Lincolne, and S. Dauids, but the third continued faithfull, that was the Biſhop of Carliſle.

He had alſo two Knights, Stephen Scroope, and William Firby, and Ianico a Gaſcoigne. The King rode ſo warily by nights, that he came to Conwey at the breake of a day. Great ſorrow and lamentation was made by the K. and the Earle at their meeting, for that the Earles hoſte was diſperſed and gone, ſome to the Duke, and ſome other wayes.

The Duke of Aumarle, Conſtable and chiefe gouernour of the Kings army at Milford immediately when the Kings departure was knowne, ſaid vnto the ſouldiers, let vs ſhift for our ſelues maſters, for the King is fled, whereupon euery man truſſed and away. Sir

Thomas

Thomas Percy Steward of the houſhold, talking with the Conſtable alſo departed, and take their way through Wales.

The Welchmen ſeeing ſuch diſorder, aſſembled them together, and ſpoyled the Engliſhmen of all their goods, and ſent them packing in their dublets, with white ſtaues in their hands, for there rode, here tenne, here twenty, here fifty, here an hundred, and ſo the Welchmen comming downe the mountaines, the Engliſh loſt that they had. The King had many horſes of the beyond Sea brode, and great riches in apparell and iewels, which was in the keeping of S. T. Percy, who with the Conſtable came to D. Henry of Hereford, and more then 500. of their company, all naked, whom the Welchmen had diſpoyled, and beaten well.

The K. being at Conwap in great diſcomfort, ſent the Dukes of Exceſter & Surrey, to Henry D. of Hereford and Lancaſter, to know what his meaning was, himſelfe remaining ſtill at Conwey in great perplexity, and with him the E. of Saliſbury, the B. of Carliſle, Sir William Ferebe Knight, S. Stephen Scroope mine author, and another Frenchman, in all but 16. perſons, then was newes brought to the K. how his Conſtable had demeand him, & likewiſe his Steward, that had caried his riches to be brought a land, and going through Wales with it, the Welch-men had taken it.

The King then by the aduiſe of the Earle of Saliſbury departed from Conwey vnto Beawmarels, a ten miles off, and from thence, hee went to Carnarnan. Beawmarels was a ſtrong Fortreſſe if it had beene manned and victualled. Carnarnan is a fayre Towne, and a ſtrong Caſtle, but thoſe were vnprouided of all things, ſo that for fiue or ſixe nights he lay very hard and baſe, & for victuals ſhe was none: whereſore he returned againe to Conwey, where he ſore lamented his eſtate. The Dukes of Exceſter and Surrey entring the City of Cheſter, which Duke Henry had taken, were brought ſtraight to the Caſtle to the Duke, who was glad to ſee them, as he profeſſed, & forthwith aſked the Duke of Exceſter what newes, who told him from point to point what ſhame and diſhonor it would be to him, if he dealt ſo vnkindly toward his Prince, and that through him he were depoſed: he therefore demanded anſwere with ſpeed, but the Duke of Lancaſter was as ſlow to diſpatch him, and told him he ſhould not goe ſo one waye from him, & that the K. was not well aduiſed to ſend him: & his fellow, being men of ſuch calling, ſith he had other inough of meaner eſtate to do the meſſage: ſo they remained to their great diſcomfort. The D. of Exceſter D. Henry ſtill kept his company, but the D. of Surrey was comitted to ſafe keeping within the caſtle of Cheſter.

There is a Caſtle fiue miles from Cheſter, called Beſton Caſtle, builded on a rocke, very ſtrong by ſituation, therein were 100. men of armes choſen and able men, but not baſtant by faithfull to King Richard, for they deliuered it to the Duke, where they might well enough haue kept it, the aſcending is ſo ſteepe: it was victualled for fiue yeares. There was found within it coyne better worth then an hundred thouſand markes, beſide other iewels which King Richard cauſed to be kept, to the value of two hundred thouſand markes, all which Duke Henry tooke with him, and returned to Cheſter, and there taking counſell of his friends what was beſt to be done, the Archbiſh. of Canterbury tooke vpon him to ſpeake, and ſaid: that ſith the King was in Wales, which was a countrey ſtrong by reaſon of the Mountaines, ſo that it was impoſſible for an army to paſſe with bagge and baggage, he thought it beſt to ſend vnto King Richard and to make him beleeue that he ſought nothing but peace and a Parliament to be made, where in, thoſe that had offended in putting to death his vncle the Duke of Glocester, ſhould be puniſhed, and ſo from thenceforth the King & the Duke to be good friends, and that it ſhould bee at the Kings pleaſure to appoint the day & place for this Parliament; for without this ſhift, ſhould it be impoſſible for the D. to get him into his hands, for he might depart to ſea when he would, hauing retained at Conwey ſhips for that purpoſe.

All the other Lords aſſenting to this counſell the D. appointed the Earle of Northumberland to goe to the King with foure hundred launces, and a thouſand Archers, which Earle, when hee came to Flint caſtle, had it deliuered to his hands: from thence he haſted to Rudland, which was alſo giuen ouer to him: this Rudland is but tenne miles from Conwey, where the King was, greatly marualling, that hee heard nothing of his brother the Duke of Exceſter being now eight dayes ſince he was ſent to the Duke of Hereford. The Earle of Northumberland laid vnder a rocke, nere to the Caſtle of Rudland two great ambuſhments of his people, with commaundement to keepe that paſſage. Then hee went with fiue other in his company and went by the ſea-coaſt, till he came before the towne of Conwey, and then he ſent an Herault to the King for a ſafe conduct, to come to his preſence, to declare his meſſage frō the D. about an agreement, which ſafe conduct being granted, he paſſed the water, and entred the Caſtle of Conwey, where he found the King and the Earle of Saliſbury, he declared to them that peace would be made if he would be a good Iudge and a true, and cauſe thoſe that ſhould be named, to be tryed by Iuſtice at a certaine day of Parliament at Weſtminſter, which he and the D. ſhould hold together, and that the D. might keepe his place of high Iudge as his father and other anceſtors before him had done, for the ſpace of one hundred yeres. Thoſe that he would haue to be tryed by the law, were the D. of Exceſter, the Duke of Surrey, the Earle of Saliſbury the Biſhop of Carliſle and Thomas Marke, which fled, had giuen the King counſell to put his vncle the Duke of Glocester to death, and then if it ſhould pleaſe him to pardon the Duke his wrath, he would be ready to come to him on his knees to aſke him mercy, and so they might goe to London together, or the one one way, and the other another. The Earle offered to sweare that all this should be performed, and that the Duke had assured him by oath to stand to it. The King liking well that it should be at his liberty to go either in company with the Duke, or alone vnto London, purposed to take the offer, and so to pretend some excuse of his going alone, after hee should meete with the Duke: as lacke of victuals or such like, & so to take a by-way through Wales, and there to raise a power, for he promised the Lords neuer to suffer them to come to iudgement, discoursing with them, how hee would auoid all the danger, and surely hee reuenged vpon his enemies, namely on Duke Henry of Lancaster, who with the rest should die for it, hee accorded to goe to the Duke, and then (Maisse being celebrated) the Earle of Northumberland sware vpon the hoast, that the Duke should hold all that hee had told the King. The Earle hasted the King forward to horseback, but the K. prayed the Earle to goe before vnto Rutland, there to prepare dinner. The Earle rode apace vntill hee came where he might see his people vnder the mountaine, whom hee much commended for obserning his commandement.

K. Richard betrayed.

The King passing the water rode a foure miles before the came to the rocke, where when hee saw the ambushes hee was sore abashed, knowing well he was betrayed by the Earle, for hee was in such a place as he could not escape. The sea beating on the one side, and the rocke keeping him in on the other, and if he should haue fled backe, they would haue caught him, ere he could haue come to Conwey, for he had not past three and twenty in all of his company. The King descending the rocke, the Earle came, and kneeling downe excused the matter, saying, he had caused those people to come to guard his person, but the King told him fewer would haue serued, and that it was contrary to his oath, for he had promised to haue but fiue in his company, and said therefore that hee would goe backe to Conwey, but the Earle answered, that now sith he had him, hee would leade him to the Duke as he had promised ten dayes since, and so he caused bread and wine to bee brought and offered the King, who durst not refuse it, and after leaping on horse-backe againe they rode to Rutland to dinner, and after to Flint, where they lay that night.

Rutland. Flint.

The morrow being the two and twentieth day of August, the King got him to the Castle walles, where he beheld the Duke with all his hoste of an hundred thousand men comming by the lawes: there came before, that were departed from the army, the Arch-bishop of Canterbury, Sir Thomas Percy, and the Earle of Rutland, from whom the Duke had taken the office of Constable, more for a colour then for displeasure, for they bare the Dukes owne, and not the heart, in hich was the Kings, the Arch-bishop entred first, and after the other with a great traine, they went vp to the dungeon and then the King came downe from the walles, vnto whom they did reuerence lowly on their knees; the King tooke them vp, and drew the Arch-bishop apart, and they two talked long together, but the Earle of Rutland kept him aloofe. They tooke horse againe, and rode towards the Duke that now was approching nere.

The King went vp againe to the walles, lamenting sore when he saw the Dukes hoste within two bow shoots of the Castle, who compassed it round about downe to the Sea. The Earle of Northumberland went forth to the Duke, who after long talke concluded that the Duke should not enter the Castle before the King had dined, for he was talking: so the Earle returned, and the K. was set to dinner, with whom sate his assured friends the Earle of Salisbury, and the Bishop of Carleile, Sir Stephen Scrope, and Feribe, they sate long and eate little, for they had no haste to rise.

After dinner the Duke entred the Castle all armed, his basenet excepted. King Richard came downe to meete the Duke, who as soone as he saw the King, fell downe on his knees, and comming nere vnto him, hee kneeled the second time with his hat in his hand, and the King then put off his hood, and spake first; faire cousin of Lancaster ye are right welcome: the Duke bowing low to the ground answered, my Lord, I am come before you sent for me, the reason why I will shew you. The common fame among your people is such, that ye haue for the space of twenty or xxii. yeeres, ruled them very rigorously, but if it please our Lord I will helpe you to gouerne better. The King answered, faire Cousin of Lancaster, sith it pleaseth you, it pleaseth me well.

The Duke spake as ye haue heard to K. he spake also to the Bishop of Carlile, to Sir Stephen Scrope, and to Feribe, but to the Earle of Salisbury he spake not, whereby the Earle perceiued that the Duke hated him deadly.

The Duke with a high sharpe voyce, badde bring forth the Kings horses, and then 2. little nagges not worth forty Franks, were brought forth, the King was set on the one, & the Earle of Salisbury on the other: and thus the Duke brought the King from Flint to Chester, where he was deliuered to the Duke of Glocesters sonne, and to the Earle of Arundels sonne that loued him but a little, for he had put their Fathers to death, who led him straight to the Castle. Chester

The third day they went from Chester to Nantwich, and the next day to Newcastle, and there the Earle of Warwickes son met them, and so iourneying forth, the next day they came to Stafford, and after they departed to Lichfield, where the King thought to haue escaped, slipping downe into a Garden out of a Window of a great Tower, but he was espied and thrust into the Tower againe: from Lichfield the Duke went to Couentry, but before they could come hither, the Welchmen did them much much harme & slew many of them, and the Englishmen, when they by great chance could take any of the Welchmen, they tied them to their horse tayles, and drew them after them, through wayes full of stones, and caused them to die miserably.

The Duke passed from Couentry to Deintris, the next day to Northampton, from thence to Dunstable, and then to Saint Albons, and a fine, or fiue miles before his comming to London, the Maior and the Companies in their liueries, with great noyse of Trumpets met the Duke, doing more reuerence to him then to the King, reioycing that God had sent them such a Prince that had conquered the Realme within six moneths space.

When the Duke came within two miles of the Citie, the Duke caused the host to stay, and then said to the Commons of the Citie: My Masters, behold here your King, consider what ye will doo with him. They answered, they would he should be led to Westminster, whereupon he was deliuered vnto them, and they led him to Westminster, and from thence by water to the Tower of London.

The Duke entred into London by the chiefe gate, and rode through Cheape to Saint Pauls where hee was after lodged in the Bishops Pallace fiue or sixe dayes, and after at Saint Johns without Smithfield, where he remayned fifteene dayes, from thence hee removed to Hertford, where he abode three weekes, & then came backe to London, to holde the Parliament that began the first Wednesday of October in Westminster hall, which they had hung and trimmed sumptuously, and had caused to be set vp a royall chaire, in purpose to chose a newe King, nere to the which the Prelates were set, and on the other side sate the Lords, and after the Commons in order, first sate the Duke of Lancaster, then Edmond of Langley Duke of Yorke, the Duke of Aumarle, the Duke of Surrey, the Duke of Exceter, and the Marques Dorset then in order the Earles of Arundale, Norfolke, March, Stafford, Penbroke, Salisbury and Deuonshire, the Earles of Northumberland & Westmerland sate not, but went vp and downe, and oftentimes kneeled as it fell in doing their offices. Parliament in Westminster Hall.

The Arch-bishop of Canterbury made a Sermon and tooke for his Theame. Habuit Jacob benedictionem à patre suo, which Sermon being ended in Latine, a Doctour of the Law, stood vp and read an Instrument, in the which was contained, that King Richard had by his own confession disabled himselfe to be worthy to raigne, & that he would resigne the Crowne to such a one as was sufficient to rule. This Instrument being reade, the Arch-bishop perswaded them to proceed to the election of a new King, and perceiuing they were all contented, (for there were not past 4. persons that were of King Richards part, and they durst say nothing) he asked each of them whom they would haue to their King, whether the D. of Yorke or not: and they answered no: he asked if they would haue his eldest sonne the Duke of Aumarle: and they said no: he asked if they would haue his youngest sonne, and they said no: and so of diuers other: then staying a while, he asked if they would haue the Duke of Lancaster: and then they answered they would none other. This demaund being made thrice, they drew certaine Instruments and Charters, and read them in presence of all that were there. Then the Arch-bishops comming to the Duke, fell on their knees, declaring to him how he was chosen K. and willed him to take regard if he would consent thereto. Then the Duke being on his knees, rose and declared that hee accepted the Realme, sith it was obtained by God. Then the Arch-bishop read what the new King was bound vnto, and with certaine ceremonies signed him with the crosse, then hee kissed the Arch-bishop, and they take the ring, with which the Kings he wedded to the Realme, and bare it to the Lord Percy, that was Constable, who receiuing it shewed it to all the assembly, and then put it on the Kings finger, the King then kissed the Constable, and then the Arch-bishops led him to the siege Royall, and the King made his prayers on his knees before it, and after spake vnto them all, first to the Prelates, and then to the Lords and all other, and so set him downe in the seat: and thus he was inuested, and King Richard put downe, he sate a good while and kept silence, and so did all the rest: for they were in prayer for his prosperity in his gouernment, and when they had ended, where the offices were void, the King created the Lord Percy Constable, and take him the staffe: Then was chosen Ralph Earle of Westmerland Marshall, John Scirle, or Serle Chancellor, Sir Richard Clifford Keeper of the priuie Seale, and many other officers were newly confirmed. After this the Arch-bishop spake certaine things in latine, praying for the Kings prosperity, and the Realmes, and after spake in English vpon this following: Vir dominabitur in populo. reg. 9. &c. And then exhorting all there present to pray the like, euery man sate downe. Then the King rose and made his eldest sonne Prince of Wales, then the Lords were sworne to be true to the Prince as before they had done to his father: his second sonne was there made Duke of Lancaster. Thus Robert Iewes K. Richard deposed, when he had raigned scale. 22. yeers, 2. moneths, and odde dayes, in such sort as ye haue heard, whose royalty had beene such, that wheresoeuer he lay, his person was guarded by 200. Cheshire-men, he had about him 12. Bishops, besides Barons, Knights Esquires, and other moe then needed, insomuch that to the houshold came euery day to meate 10000. people, as appeared by the meates told out of the Kitchin to 300. seruiters, &c. He was murdered on the 14. of February next following, as shall be shewed in place conuenient, and was buried first in the Church of the Friers Preachers at Langley besides S. Albons. And after by commandement of King Henry the fift, remoued to Westminster.

The Life and Reigne of King HENRY the FOVRTH.

An. Reg. 1. HENRY Plantagenet, borne at Bolingbroke, in Lincolneshire, sonne to Iohn of Gaunt Duke of Lancaster was crowned King of England, more by force then by lawfull succession or election: hee began his Reigne the 29. of September, in the yere of our Lord God 1399. Reco. Tower. He forthwith made new officers, to wit, Thomas his second son Steward of England: Henry Percy Earle of Northumberland, Constable of England: Ralph Neuill Earle of Westmerland, Marshall of England: Sir John Scerle Chancellour of England, Sir Richard Clifford Keeper of his priuie seale: Iohn Norbury Esquire Treasurer, Thomas Chaucer Constable of Walingford Castle, & other officers, and then was crowned at Westminster the 13. of October, by Thomas Arundale Archbishop of Canterbury: The Dukes of Yorke, Surrey, Aumarle, and the Earle of Glocester bare the Canopie ouer him, Sir Thomas Dimmocke was champion, and rode three times about the Hall. This was a noble and valiant Prince, and after the ciuell warres were appeased, shewed himselfe louing to his subiects.

After the solemnitie of the coronation, the Lords and commons straight proceeded to the parliament. In which it was inquired out of the death of the D. of Glocester, & how he had beene murthered at Calais by the D. of Norfolke, vpon the kings commandement. King Henry created his eldest son Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornewall, Earle of Chester, and D. of Aquitaine. In this Parliament it was ordained that the Statutes made in the Parliament holden in the 21. yeare of King Richard at Westmin. & after prorogued vnto Shrewsbury, with all the circumstances to be disanulled, reuoked, made voyde, and vtterly blotted out. Also that the Parliament holden at Westminster, in the 11. yere of King Richard, be holden firme and stable. Also that the Lords and other persons which were iudged forth in the Parliament holden the 21. yere of King Richard, and their heyres that be dead, should be wholly restored to their possessions without any suing liuery thereof to be made, excepted that the Lords and other shall haue nothing of the issues receiued in the meane time. The King gaue to the Earle of Northumberland the Ile of Man, to be holden of the King by seruice, to beare the sword with which he entred into England. And to the Earle of Westmerland he gaue the countie of Richmond. Also iudgement was giuen against the Appellants of the Duke of Glocester in this manner: the Lords in this present Parliament by the Assent, iudge that the Dukes of Aumarle, Surrey, and Excester now present and were appellants, shall lose their names of Dukes and honours from henceforth, together with the dignities, of Dukes, and that the Marques Dorset that is present, lose his name of Marques, and the Earle of Glocester which is, lose his name for him and his heires, as the above named persons doe theirs, and that all the Castles, possessions or mannors which they had of them that belonged to those whom they appealed from the day of the arrest of the Duke of Glocester, and the other Lords, or after at any time, simply and without fauour or mercy, they shall lose them: and that all other Castles, possessions, Mannors, Lordships, Dominions, and liberties, which they held of the Kings gift that day or after should rest in the Kings grace from that houre, and that all Letters Patents and charters, which they or any of them had of the said names Castles, Dominions, possessions, and liberties, should bee surrendred vp into the Chancery, there to be cancelled, & that they stand in state which they had in name and possession before the said day of the said arrest.

Dukes lose their names and honors.

The King to shew to all men in all Countries about by what right and title he had taken vpon him the crowne & realme, sent Embassadours to Rome, Iohn Trenecant Bishop of Hereford, Iohn Cheyne Knight, and Iohn Cheyne Esquire. Into France he sent Walter Tricklow Bishop of Durham, Thomas Percy Earle of Worcester, and William Heron. Into Spaine Iohn Trenor Bishop of S. Dauids, and Sir William Par Knight: Into Almaine the Bishop of Bangor with other.

Messengers sent into diuers Countries, to declare the confession of K. Richard.

The Scottes in time of the Parliament taking occasion by the absence of the Northerne Lords, and because the same time the Northparts were sore oppressed by a great pestilence entred as enemies, & tok the castle of Warke, and kept the same a certaine time, but at length spoyled and vtterly ruinated it, & many other mischeifes they did in the Countrey. Thomas Moubrey duke of Norfolke, which was exiled, died at Venice, in his returne from Jerusalem. Also the Duches of Glocester died, and her son and heyre Humfrey died of the pestilence when he was sent for forth of Ireland.

D. of Norfolke deceased.

1400. The King held his feast of Chrismasse in his Castle of Windsor, where Iohn Holland late Duke of Exceter and Earle of Huntington, Thomas Holland late Duke of Surrey and E. of Kent, Edward late Duke of Aumarle and E. of Rutland, son to the Duke of Yorke, Iohn Mountacute Earle of Salisbury, Thomas Spencer, Sir Ralph Lumly, Sir Thomas Blunt, Sir Benedic Cely Knights, with others that fauoured King Richard, conspired against K. Henry, & appointed priuily to murder him, vnder the colour of Iusting & other pastimes pretended. And the time approching of their purpole, they sent messengers to London with letters to the Duke of Aumarle, that he should not faile to come at that day appointed with his company, to helpe to doe the feate whereunto he was sworne: but his minde being altered, he dare the Letters straight to his Father the D. of Yorke, who caused a number of his men forthwith to carry his sonne to the King, where hee shewing his letters, the King, would not beleeue them: but the same morning came the Maior of London to the Court, and informed him of the matter, whereupon the King made no tarriance, but got him forth toward London, in company of the Maior and other. But before the King could get London on his backe, his enemies came to Windsore, and there entred the Castle with an armed band of 400. men on the fourth of January at night, where vnderstanding that the King was escaped their hands, being sore amazed, they with-drew from Windsore, vnto Sunning, a certaine Mannour neare to Reading, where the Quéene wife to King Richard then lay, where they perswaded her household, that King Richard was escaped out of Pomfret Castle, and they would goe to him: from thence they went to Wallingford, and after to Abingdon, mouing the people to take armes vpon them, and to goe méete there King Richard. After this they came to Faringdon, in the Vale of White Horse in Barkeshire, and the same day to Circester, on the xii. day late in the euening, and there harboured, with a great number of men of armes and many Archers: there they buted that K. Richard was escaped forth of prison, and that he was there with them, and to make their words to haue the more credite, they had got a Chaplein of K. Richards called Maudelen, so like to him in all proportion and fauour, that one could hardly be discerned from the other: many times (saith mine Authour) I haue seene him in Ireland ride with the K. his Master: so faire a Priest and goodly a person, I had not lightly seene. They put him in armour with a crowne on his Helmet, so as all men might take him for King Richard. On the morrow being Wednesday, the people of that towne misliking of their proceedings, fought against them, and at length toke the chiefest of them, and led them to the Abbey there, and put them in a faire chamber, vnder safe custodie. And on Thursday the said Lords, fearing the people, imagined how to escape out of their hands, and caused some of their seruants to set fire on certaine houses in the towne, thinking that thereupon the people would depart from them, and seeke to saunch the fire: but it chanced contrary, for the people turned into marueilous rage against them, ran vpon them with great violence, and drew them into the market-place, and there they beheaded Iohn Holland the Duke of Exceter, Thomas Holland Duke of Surrey, and the Earle of Salisbury, the third day after the Epiphanie: their seruants that were with them were by and by taken, and as prisoners bound, and brought to Oxford, and on Monday following were beheaded in the Castle there to the number of 26. Persons. Also Sir Thomas Blunt Knight was beheaded with them. The Weeke next following was beheaded Thomas Spencer Earle of Glocester at Bristow: not long after was Sir Barnard Brocas beheaded at London, and a Priest named Iohn Maudelen, that was like King Richard, and another Priest called William Feribe. The Bishop of Carlile was attached and condemned of conspiracie, but was pardoned.

Maudelen a Priest counterfeited K. Richard.

Dukes of Surrey and of Excester executed.

Maudelen Priest and other executed.

The first day of February King Henry caused the blanke Charters, made to King Richard, to be burnt, at the Standart in Cheape of London.

Blanke charters burnt.

King Richard was imprisoned in Pomfreit Castle, where by dayes and nights they vexed him with continuall hunger, thirst and cold, and finally bereft him of his life, with such a kinde of death as neuer before that time was knowne in England (saith Sir Iohn Fortescute.) He died the xviii. day of February, whose body was brought to the tower of London, and so through the City to Pauls Church bare faced, where he stood three dayes for all beholders, and had seruice, where King Henry was present. From thence he was carried to Langley, and there buried in the Church of the Friers Preachers. Vpon his death the famous and excellent Poet Iohn Gower, wrote certaine verses, which may be englished thus,

O Mirrour for the world meete, which should in gold be set,
By which all wife men, by foresight, their prudent wittes may whet.
Lo, God doth hate such rule-rs, as heere viciously doe liue:
And none ought rule, that by their life,
doe ill example giue.
And this King Richard witnesseth well,
his end this plaine doth shewe:
For God allotted him such ende,
and sent him so great woe,
As such a life deserud: as by the Chronicles thou mayst knowe.

Here vnder shut verses in Latine in his booke called Vox clamantis.

The King with a great armie went into Scotland, spoiled the countrey and returned to Yorke, where 2. Knights, the one a Frenchman, the other an Italian challenged to fight within lists against Sir Iohn Cornwall, and Sir Iohn Cornewall obtaining the Kings fauour, married the Kings Sister, that had béene wife to Sir Iohn Holland Earle of Huntington.

Challenge of combate at Yorke.

The Welchmen taking occasion by the Kings absence when he was in Scotland, began to rebell, by the setting on of Owen Glendouerdew Sonne to Griffith Vicham an Esquire of Wales, and so called Glendour, because his dwelling was in a place called Glendowdwy, for Glyn in Welch is a vale, and Dor is water, because the place was in a dale, at the side of the water or riuer of Dew in the parish of Corwen in the county of Merioneth in Northwales. He serued King Richard, at the time of his oppression by Henry Duke of
